CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: We have a quorum and I would like to begin the morning's discussions by recapping the cross-border shopping hearings that we have had to date. Perhaps Anne could take us through some of the information.

Ms Anderson: Thank you. I would just like to point out at the beginning a memo that I included with today's package, giving some information about the autopass that was announced yesterday by the United States. It is a program that is going to help people go from the Niagara region into the US much more quickly. They preregister, effectively, and then they have a decal on their car and can get waved through. So there is additional information on that.

I also had sent around last week, I think, the report on the retail council meeting, which hopefully you have got. It includes a copy of a study that was done for Industry, Trade and Technology on the pricing system within distribution systems for three particular products. It got some press, which you may have read as well. I just wanted to point out that those were there.

I have briefly put together a summary of the recommendations and the concerns that people have had. I think maybe the easiest thing to do would be just to go over that as a way of reviewing what you have heard to date.

A number of people have made estimates of how big the problem was and how many people were involved and what sort of size. I think they are all estimates at this point. I am on page 2 if you want to look at the summary. The estimate that comes up most frequently is $1 billion in retail sales over 1991, and that one has been referred to by John Winter and the Retail Council of Canada. But I believe they are all still very much estimates based on surveys that then get extrapolated out to larger regions in various ways. I am not sure there is a lot of hard information about how much is involved, whether it is the number of people or the number of sales or the amount of revenue that has been lost by the province.

Everybody had ideas of what causes cross-border shopping. Some specific things that were listed were the lower prices in the US, the free trade agreement, value of the dollar, the recession and the economic uncertainty, reduced enforcement, non-collection of the provincial sales tax, high Canadian taxes and the regulatory burden, gasoline prices, marketing practices of the US retailers, word of mouth and media attention, GST, Sunday shopping, the US discount malls and new attractions in the US border. Those are sort of specific causes that were looked at.

A lot of people, too, talked about the competitive situation in general and how cross-border shopping was really just a symptom of bigger structural difficulties: that it was just the tip of the iceberg, both in terms of the impact on the border communities, its spread throughout Ontario and the impact on the retail sector, and in terms of how it was spreading backwards down the chain to manufacturing and to food processing and agriculture as well. So the problem is sort of diffusing through to a much wider extent.

A number of the issues that were talked about were federal as well as provincial. The biggest thing people talked about were the price differentials, and various reasons were offered for that. One was the smaller Canadian market, which precluded economies of scale, and the other geographic factors like the wide dispersal of a small population, the northern climate, which restricts the growing season compared with southern parts of the US and the role of government in food retailing—this was particularly from the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors. A number of people talked about gas as being one of the drawing cards for people who live near the border. There was some evidence presented that one of the biggest discrepancies in gas prices between Canada and the US was the level of taxation, both federal and provincial.

The price of groceries was also another factor, particularly for dairy products, which again is attributed to marketing boards and the different price support systems between Canada and the US. Other reasons were the larger purchasing power of American retailers and wholesalers, so that they can buy at a lower unit cost, and Niagara as one of the dumping zones of the US for seconds and end-of-lines. Residential occupancy costs were a factor, in terms of the rent or leasing costs that applied to Canada and the US. One of the issues there was the availability of commercial space. There is far more commercial space available in the US, so the rent is lower than it is here.

Municipal taxes are higher in Ontario, according to John Winter and also the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. Labour rates are sometimes higher. One item, too, that John Winter stressed was that the cost of a product to retailers in Canada was often higher than the final retail price of retailers in the US. I think a number of people were quite concerned about the distribution structure and the differences between the two countries and how the costs got built in all the way along the manufacturing-distribution chain.

Some solutions suggested by Mr Winter for retailing were to develop price clubs in Ontario to help compete with the cheaper prices and also, in northern Ontario, to source out of neighbouring states rather than from Toronto.

Some witnesses talked about the free trade agreement as being one factor that increased the extent of cross-border shopping. I think generally it was felt that it was a perception of lower prices that the free trade agreement would bring rather than a reality, and that, when they found they did not immediately get lower prices, people were going across the border to find them there. The retail council's brief has nothing much to do with the cross-border shopping issue.

The exchange rate was another area that was mentioned several times. The exchange rate had gone up since 1987, roughly in the same way that the increase in cross-border shopping has gone up. However, the value of the dollar was as high as it is today in the 1980s and did not appear to make much difference at that point in the level of shopping. I think other witnesses felt it would require a very large change in the value of the dollar to make much effect on the enormous price differentials. If you have got a 50% price differential, then changing the value of the dollar will be only a small part of that.

On supply management, various studies have been carried out by Agriculture Canada which looked at the price of milk and cheese in New Brunswick and British Columbia. They were doing a similar study for Ontario. They found that the prices were considerably cheaper in neighbouring US states. In New Brunswick they found it was between 40% and 70% cheaper in the US and in British Columbia, between 36% and 60% cheaper in the US.

One of the documents that was at the meeting that the retail council put on last week and which I have enclosed today was a study that Agriculture Canada had done on comparative grocery prices. They took seven pairs of cities across Canada and compared 113 items in each of those pairs of cities and in comparable stores and found that, on average, grocery prices were 10% lower in the US, although certain items in Canada were the same or cheaper. Those were things like beef, pasta, sugar, pork and some items like that. The ones that were cheaper in the States were dairy products, very largely. I forget the others offhand.

The United Food and Commercial Workers, UFCW, also pointed out the way the American support system works for farmers. The way they get subsidies does not affect the shelf price in the same way that marketing boards affect it here. A big issue with many witnesses, too, was border controls. Many people felt controls at the border were not enforced efficiently because of the number of people and the long lineups. Even the rules that there were were not being enforced, so people were getting waved through without paying duties or GST or PST at the border.

There were some recommendations to try to counter that. One was to charge a levy on shoppers crossing the border. Another was for Revenue Canada to hire additional people to help deal with that in the way one might do it in a supermarket: you need more checkout counters. At the meeting last week, Revenue Canada indicated that they were unlikely to hire any additional people, given the current hiring climate in Ottawa.

The view of enforcement was countered somewhat by people who wanted to ensure that whatever regulations were put in place at the border did not deter US tourists from coming into Canada as well. There was a note of caution that that might not help. There was also mixed reaction from the retailers about the federal experimental fast lane, the PACE lane, which has happened in British Columbia and which is going to allow Canadians who have pre-registered to come back across the border more quickly by filling in a computer form by which any duty applied would be charged to their credit card. Retailers on the whole seemed to feel that would encourage smuggling and encourage cross-border shopping rather than helping enforce it.

One of the differences in the prices is a result of the non-collection of the provincial sales tax. Again, it is a small amount but there were a lot of witnesses who very strongly urged that provincial sales tax be collected. At the moment it is voluntary, but there should be some way of collecting it.

A number of suggestions were made. One was that the provincial sales tax be harmonized with the GST. The federal government will not, I understand, consider collecting the PST for the provinces at least until there is harmonization because of the different tax bases. However, I was talking with them and I understand that of the two provinces that have harmonized at the moment, Saskatchewan has asked for a collection but no decision has been made at the moment as to whether or not the federal government will collect and Quebec is still considering whether to ask for collection. Another suggestion was that perhaps the federal government could be asked to add a line on the duty form and the federal government would then forward the forms to the province which would then bill the residents for that amount.

Mr Stockwell: Did the federal government not say to us to comply before they would collect? All provinces would have to comply before they collected? Or they would look at singular applications?

Ms Anderson: I have heard that informally. When I spoke to the person in the federal government, in the memorandum of understanding that goes with the harmonization of the GST there is a phrase that says they will then agree to discuss collection. But it does not speak to it specifically. So Saskatchewan has discussed and requested. Quebec has not.

Gasoline pricing. As I mentioned, gas is one item that many people feel is the drawing card for those who live near the border in particular. There is a certain amount of evidence given on the different pricing structures of gasoline on either side of the border, where it appears that gas in the US is around half the price of gas in Canada, and a lot of that is due to the different federal and provincial sales taxes that are added on.

The Ontario Border Communities Task Force had requested, as it did during the pre-budget consultations, that a zoning formula be implemented so that the taxes were lower nearer the border and increasing as you get further away from the border, similar to the Quebec system. The Ministry of Revenue here has indicated that the Quebec system was moderately successful in the short term but not so successful in the longer run because of marketing practices, which adjusted to that, and because there was a lot of evasion involved in monitoring and administering the different tax zones. It was expensive and complex.

John Winter also suggested that perhaps there could be a test market for a gas station on the Canadian side of the border that could sell gas at a similar rate as it was being sold in the US.

An issue that was brought up a number of times was Sunday shopping. There were a variety of opinions on that. Some people felt it had nothing to do with cross-border shopping; other people felt it was a factor but a small factor. Sault Ste Marie, for instance, has had Sunday shopping for a while and felt it would exacerbate the present situation if it no longer had Sunday shopping. But on the whole, it was not one of the issues that people raised.

A number of witnesses really focused more on the larger, competitive situation rather than on the smaller, more specific causes and the individual causes. It seems to be related very much to a larger problem of competitiveness and the whole structure of the Ontario and Canadian economies compared to the US. There were suggestions at the Premier's council mandate should be expanded to address this somewhat. Also, there were suggestions that there should be studies or task forces between the various levels of government, including labour and business as well, because it was an issue that covered a wide range of sectors and all levels of government and it needed to have everybody working together in order to address that issue rather than people doing it individually.

In particular, the pricing system seemed to be one area that people felt needed more study to understand the differences in the pricing systems between Ontario and Canada and the US.

Ms Harrington: Was there a definite suggestion of what you were saying, about who should establish this committee? Did you say the retail council?

Ms Anderson: No, there was not a definite suggestion about who should do it. I think one of the difficulties has been that a lot of people have been establishing their own committees or their own task forces and doing their own studies, and there has not been much in the way of a co-ordinated way. There were suggestions that there should be one. The retail council has taken some initiative in organizing the meetings that we did last fall and this follow-up one, which included government and industry and the others.

Ms Harrington: Can you tell me specifically what recommendation came out of that meeting on the 22nd with regard to committees?

Ms Anderson: That was one of the studies that came. They wanted to continue this, but there was no funding to continue this study on the pricing and distribution systems. There were a couple of motions that came up. Can I just get back to that in a moment?

Ms Harrington: Okay.

Ms Anderson: I think that particular organization felt they wanted to continue. They did not really have a name. They wanted to form themselves into a sort of coalition but there was no real resolution, I think, of how they would go about it. There are various subcommittees, and subcommittees were going to continue to meet, but there was not a sort of formalized structure.

Ms Harrington: Are they ongoing or are they not?

Ms Anderson: They did not set another date, as I recall.

Ms Harrington: But the subcommittees are continuing?

Ms Anderson: I think the subcommittees are continuing. At least one of them is. We should be getting some information from them, some minutes of that meeting as they get produced. I will circulate those as soon as they come.

Other recommendations concerning general competitiveness were that new legislation should be examined for its competitive effect, from the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors. The CFIB, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, presented some research on the taxes borne by different retailers in Toronto-Buffalo and Thunder Bay-Duluth, which found that the tax burden, particularly between Toronto and Buffalo, was greater on retailers in Toronto and that the largest different component was municipal taxes. They did mention that for small businesses, payroll taxes are also a considerable burden because they are independent of profit.

Ms Harrington: Would you say that municipal taxes in Canada generally are very high compared with American municipal taxes? Is that the bottom line there?

The Chair: According to the report, it is about four to five times higher in municipal taxes.

Ms Harrington: You say that would be between Buffalo and Toronto?

Ms Anderson: I would think it would vary from municipality to municipality.

The Chair: In the International Falls and Fort Frances areas, according to the report, it is about the same. I will see if I can find it.

Mr Hansen: But you have the point that the services are different between the two towns that are compared. One has a volunteer fire department and the other one has a regular fire department. It is not apples with apples; it is apples with oranges. So it is not a true comparison.

Mr Stockwell: When you pay your tax bills, it is apples to apples.

Mr Hansen: But when somebody is knocking at your door and he is ready to rob you, it is a little bit different.

The Chair: But the bottom line is that when we are discussing cross-border shopping in terms of prices, all of what you say is true. We have a better police force. We have a better fire department. We have better health care. We have all of these things that are better. That is a reality, but also the reality is that the prices are lower across the border and somehow we have to deal with that and in a concrete way that will keep people here.

Mr Hansen: I just want to get that point across that you have to sit on your wallet.

Ms Anderson: When the mayors came before the committee, one of their recommendations was that the blue ribbon task force should be put together with ministers from federal, provincial and municipal governments as well as national presidents of business, industry and labour groups. That is sort of an example of one of the recommendations of these joint groups.

The CFIB was concerned that the cost of business not be increased any further, as certainly was the chamber of commerce. The Canadian shoe retailers also were a group that suggested a committee of provincial and federal ministers to look at the whole issue and co-ordinate planning that will help competitiveness.

A number of people felt that some more information was needed, really, that there was not sufficient. John Winter suggested looking at why suppliers are charging Ontario retailers more than US retailers, and also to include shoppers who go across interprovincial borders as well as the international border and to examine the issue of bilingual labelling outside Quebec. The Ontario Border Communities Task Force also felt that it would be useful to gather more information on the different product categories and the cost structures that are involved, and looking at why people go over to shop in the US; there is more background information needed on that. It was suggested that the province could help continue the funding of the Industry, Science and Technology study that was looking at pricing and distribution.

A recommendation that came from a number of people was an education or awareness campaign of what the impact was on their communities in Ontario of shopping across the border, combined with a marketing campaign for the local retailers and the local communities. The CFIB points out that such a strategy is only useful when the prices are fairly comparable, but while the price differences are still very great, then marketing or an awareness campaign may have only a small effect. The UFCW, however, felt that it would be a very useful and positive thing to do.

Many of the causes seem to relate to the federal government, and I just will list those briefly. Actions that people wanted the federal government to take would be to reduce interest rates, reduce the value of the dollar, eliminate the GST, develop policies that promote fair taxation for Canadian workers and policies that promote full employment and the development of the economic potential of all Canada's regions, as well as the reduction of tariffs for third-country imports to a level that was similar to the American level. One of the factors in the different pricing appeared to be that for many products the Canadian tariff for goods from third countries was often almost double the level of the American tariff from third countries.

That sort of rounds up the suggestions that were made by the witnesses who came in front of the committee. I do not know whether you feel there are other witnesses you would like to hear from at this point or whether you want to go into sort of a discussion of what else you might need or what the next step is.

Ms M. Ward: Have there been any studies done by consumers' groups or any input from them at all, like the consumers' association, or whatever their proper name is?

Clerk of the Committee: I contacted the Consumers' Association of Canada, Ontario division. They were unwilling to come before the committee because they had not at this point formulated a policy or any sort of response to the issue of cross-border shopping. A representative of the consumers' association was at the Niagara Falls conference that Anne and I attended and basically reiterated that position at the conference, that they had not come to any sort of policy or response position on the issue.

Ms Anderson: We had Mark Adler here, who was one advocate for the consumers.

Ms Harrington: You were talking about the gas tax zones as not being workable. Did you mean strictly in an administrative sense, or were there other reasons that you said it was not workable?

Ms Anderson: They are difficult administratively to work. The Ministry of Revenue in Ontario had indicated that they seemed to have some impact in the first couple of years they were in place, but after that the marketing practices of the private sector made some adjustments to the different pricings so there was less of a difference. That is my understanding.

Ms Harrington: I do not quite understand. People were saying it did not have any effect, so that means people would still go across the border, for example?

Ms Anderson: I had a look at the legislation for the Quebec border zones, and in fact there are reduced rates for three different kinds of areas in Quebec. One is for areas that are within about 20 kilometres of the Ontario border and the New Brunswick border, one is the area that is along the border with the US and one is all northern Quebec. So effectively you get left really with the axis that is between Montreal and Quebec City that is at the high rate and almost everyone else is at the low rate.

Ms Harrington: So there are two rates. Is that all?

Ms Anderson: No, there are about five rates.

Ms Harrington: What kind of price differentials are there? Is it a cent a litre?

Ms Anderson: Something like that, yes, it is a couple of cents.

Ms Harrington: But my real question was why, after a couple of years, would people ignore that price differential and go across the border?

Ms Anderson: The price differential in Ontario is anywhere between, say, around 20 cents a litre, which is the government tax—around that; I think it varies somewhat. If you reduce that by five cents a litre, it is still not enough to give you a very big saving.

Ms Harrington: You are saying in the first year or so people thought, "Okay, we'll try this," staying at home, and after that they thought, "Well, this is really not—"

Ms Anderson: It slowed down the reduction in the—

Ms Harrington: In the cross-border trade. But it went back up to previous levels is what you are saying?

Ms Anderson: I do not think they measured cross-border trade so much as the level of sales in the gas stations in those various zones. I have not got any very great details on it. I can get them for you from the Ministry of Revenue here. They are the people who have done that kind of analysis and looked at it.

Ms Harrington: It would be helpful to say that it did not work or does not work.

Ms Anderson: I will see if I can get some more information on that.

Ms Harrington: To see why.

Mr B. Ward: Just to follow up on what Margaret was saying, part of the information inferred that the marketing practices of the private sector in the oil industry led to a modifying of prices in the province of Quebec. If the oil companies lower their retail price across the province, or once it is whatever the market will bear, did the prices slowly come up even though the tax was reduced? Could we know that?

Ms Anderson: I do not have enough specific information on that, but the implication I got from them was that there are levelling. Whether it was coming down or going up I do not know. But one of the oil companies that had stations on both sides of whatever these zones are may choose to—

Mr B. Ward: Yes, what do you know? Did they raise the prices or lower them, on which side of the road?

Ms Anderson: I will see if I can find that out.

Mr B. Ward: If you can find out as part of Margaret's inquiry, I think that information would be appreciated.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, I am not sure how we were planning to proceed at this point, whether we were planning on doing the report at this time. If so, I was just wondering whether you wanted some suggestions as to maybe how we could develop the report. Would we follow a similar format in terms of how we did the pre-budget one where we would ask the research staff to kind of maybe elaborate on what is here under the different headings and then come back and then we would sit as the committee in terms of developing the recommendations, maybe based around those headings or based around the recommendations we wanted to pursue and thought would have some input? I would think we may want to do that. I think we all realize there are many people out there in the different communities, particularly the border communities, waiting to see what we are going to recommend and whether we have been able to put our collective wisdom together to find the solutions or just even start making a little dent in the problem.

Mr Kwinter: On behalf of my colleagues, what we would like to recommend is that we wait to listen to the Treasurer this afternoon to hear what he has to say. We can question him about whether he is going to be doing anything about some of the concerns that have been raised or some of the things that we want to do, and then we would like to be able to have some time among ourselves to work on some recommendations and come back next time so that we know what recommendations we want to make. But I think that until we hear from the Treasurer it would be premature to start making recommendations, because we do not know what kind of leeway we have.

The Chair: I think we have a problem with this afternoon. We may not be able to hear the Treasurer this afternoon. It is entirely up to the Conservative caucus.

Mr Kwinter: If we do not hear from the Treasurer this afternoon, will we hear from him ever?

The Chair: I am open to input, but I have a feeling from what I am hearing that we would like to hear from the Treasurer and perhaps, if he cannot come this afternoon, extend an invitation for Thursday morning next.

Mr Stockwell: If our party is introducing motions, I will give the Treasurer the undertaking that those motions will be continuing and it would allow him the opportunity to come down here and address the committee.

The Chair: He cannot.

Mr Stockwell: He cannot? Okay. Then I go along with the request to invite him for Thursday morning.

I would like to ask staff in the meantime if they could look at one item that I find very interesting. With the cross-border shopping issue, some retailers and manufacturers were talking about the interest rates and the dollar. I have concern with the province heading out looking for 10 billion new dollars in the marketplace right now. It would appear to be some portion of that $10 billion will have to come from offshore somewhere, probably Tokyo, Frankfurt, New York maybe.

My concern is, if we are going to raise that money, along with the federal government out raising equally large sums of money, we know full well that if they are looking to borrow those it is going to drive up the interest rates to attract people to buy the dollar, which obviously will drive up the dollar. Is there any way you can measure how much of an effect this $10 billion will have on at least the Canadian interest rate or the Canadian dollar itself? I have heard a lot of talk in the past from the party in power about that being one of the two main reasons for concern in the business sector. It appears that they are in fact exacerbating the problems by looking for $10 billion in the bond markets and I would like to see if we could quantify that at all.

The Chair: Perhaps the way to do that would be to look at the international borrowing rates that are set in the international market as opposed to the cost of borrowing set by the central bank, and also the central bank Treasury bills that are being sold right now would give an indication of what kind of—

Mr Stockwell: Yes, that is probably true, except now you are going to go out with this $10 billion more. You are going to be have even be more attractive, I would think.

The Chair: That would depend on how it is brokered.

Mr Stockwell: Why do we not let the staff look it up?

Mr Sutherland: Mr Stockwell, I do not necessarily agree that the budget is going to exacerbate the situation. There is a difference of opinion out there.

Mr Stockwell: I am just asking the staff to look it up, that is all. Whether you agree or not is academic.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, but there are different commentators there.

I am just wondering, in terms of what Mr Kwinter was saying, and maybe I was wrong, I thought the Treasurer was not coming in specifically to talk about the issue of cross-border shopping, I thought he was talking about the budget in whole. Certainly there are issues related to that, but I would still think we would be able to have the research staff do a more extensive summary of the information, the options, that type of thing, in terms of a report, as we did with the pre-budget report. Possibly that could be ready for next week.

I think the review here of some of the information, particularly some of the statistical information, how the problems increased, the extent of that problem, what the impact is in different areas, provincial revenues, municipalities, that sort of thing—then maybe under the summary there could be four or five other issues, for example, an issue under the border crossing in terms of duties, provincial sales tax, collection of taxes, maybe another heading in terms of retailing/marketing issues, another one under wholesaling/distribution, sourcing issues, possibly one under the whole question of taxation, municipal-provincial-federal, and related to that services in terms of comparison between us and there, then maybe some aspect of the issue of education in terms of education of the public in what they are getting. Then maybe if that could come back that may help us focus our recommendations afterwards on what we want to do. I do not think there is a problem in waiting to do the recommendations until we have an opportunity for the Treasurer to be here, but I think that type of summary or written report would help focus us a great deal.

Mr Kwinter: I have no problem with that at all. The concern I have about the Treasurer—it was my impression that he was here for a twofold reason. As the standing committee on finance and economic affairs of the Legislature, we want to talk to him about his budget. On the other hand, I think there is a practical political problem. The practical political problem is—and we certainly spent enough time talking about it—let us say that a recommendation comes out of this committee that we institute some sort of zone gasoline tax rate. If, in our meeting with the Treasurer, he says, “I’ve already ruled that out; we are not going to do that,” you may want to think about whether or not a committee dominated by the government party is going to be making a recommendation that is absolutely contrary to what the Treasurer has already said he is going to do.

I am just saying that there is a simple, practical problem that has to be addressed. That is why I thought it would be useful if we had the Treasurer in here so we could take a look at whether he is going to push to have the provincial sales tax imposed at the border. If he says, “No, I’m not going to do that,” then you have a problem if you are going to make that kind of recommendation. I just feel it is something we should talk about so that at least we do not get into a position where we are working at cross purposes.

Mr Sutherland: I do not think that is a problem in terms of waiting until the Treasurer is there to do the recommendations.

Mr Kwinter: No problem.

Mr Sutherland: I think this type of summary would be good. It would help focus us a bit on the budget issue; it would definitely help focus us on this issue.

Mr B. Ward: Following up on what Kimble suggested about the broad issues to get some more information, I think that is a very practical idea and should be supported by this committee.

I would just like to focus on the tax issue. Kimble mentioned the Canadian tax system, the municipal, provincial and federal tax levels and who pays what and what systems we have. I am still not comfortable with the amount of information we have on the American system. I was just wondering if it is possible for research to examine the American side, the municipal, state and federal systems as they relate to the cross-border shopping issue; what type of tax systems they have. I know they have a municipal bond, but I do not know how that differs from our municipal debenture.

If that is possible, and I do not know how much workload that will involve, I would appreciate more information before any recommendations are flowed through this committee, as well as—and it has been touched on by a couple of organizations—the American subsidy to the agricultural sector; if we could get a handle, if that is possible, on how much we will be talking financially and how they subsidize the agricultural sector, I think that would be appreciated.

The Chair: Do you want also a comparison of how that compares to the Canadian marketing board finances?

Mr B. Ward: Exactly. Primarily this gets more information on what is happening in the border states, the border municipalities, New York state, Michigan, possibly Connecticut and Massachusetts, although they are not in relation to border. It would still be worth while to see how economically viable they are as entities. I have referred to the transit shutdown in Buffalo and the layoff of police officers in Detroit, which suggest perhaps there is some financial difficulty with those border communities.

The Chair: But you also want the committee to see a breakdown of the grants, tax holidays and incentives that the local cities like Buffalo give to—

Mr B. Ward: That would all be part of the tax system. If they are allowed to defer property taxes, how do they raise revenue, and if they do not, what do they do? That would all be part of the information that I think should be looked at and collected by this committee.

Mr Hansen: There was one other item. I think Mr Kwinter brought it up earlier in some of the questions that came out. He wanted to know about coffee filters that sold in Scarborough, I believe it was $1.29 in a grocery store, and yet four packages for $1 in Buffalo. I think we should take a look at the marketing on a product that is made here in Ontario to find out why there is such a difference, because it is sold in the States at four for $1 like that.

The Chair: Why would you pay $150 for Michelin tires?

Mr Hansen: You are talking close to five times the amount on a product that is manufactured and distributed here in Canada and across the border. I agree with my friend Mr Ward on some of the incentives that could also be given to business in border communities. The other thing is that the closest state right now, taking a look at the Niagara area, is New York state, possibly Michigan, under upcoming state budgets that could possibly see an increase in some of the taxes on business, gasoline and so on, to know exactly the dates of their upcoming budgets which could have an influence. Maybe we are just one step ahead of them, maybe they will take the same type of approach that we have here in Ontario to take a look at the environment. I take it it is looked on as an environmental tax on soline. We are not going to wind up just burning fuel and wasting it, but conserving it. Maybe we should take a look at the approach of some of the bordering states and when they have their budgets coming up also.

Ms M. Ward: A question for the clerk, because my memory is poor. I recall reading recently an article about New York state and the collection of sales tax on things imported into the country and from other states. Was that something in material submitted to us or was it something else? Do you know?

The Chair: It is this. John Winter sent it to us.

Ms M. Ward: Okay, thanks. I think I read something like somewhere too, but I did not know if we had that information or not.

The Chair: I can clarify. I asked the Ministry of Revenue about doing this and getting the bills of lading and so on from the federal government. So far the federal government has refused.

Ms M. Ward: Is this referenced at all in our summary report? Perhaps the idea should not be lost.

Mr Stockwell: Mr Chairman, I just feel like I am in an exercise in futility here. There are four or five things that we can do that I think would make a real impact on the issue. There is some concern with the federal government not pulling its weight. We could petition them to pull their weight or make some changes, but they come down to very fundamental issues. We either marry the GST and the PST, so we can collect at the border—that is an obvious commendation from this committee. The government says no, it is not going to do that.

Mr Hansen: Put your point forward.

Mr Stockwell: So we are going to close that one off.

Mr Hansen: No, wait a minute.

Mr Stockwell: Can I finish? You may have changed our minds, and if you have changed your minds, that is fine, but you have said no. So I can only assume when you say no, you mean no. We can have zones, gas zones, shopping zones. In the budget the Treasurer said no. So when he says no, I guess he means no. So I say, "Cross that one off."

We can have a reduction in the provincial sales tax. The government is very clear on that. They said they are not looking at reductions in the sales tax. I asked the question in the House, I mentioned his speech and the Treasurer responded and said, "No." I can only assume when he says no, he means no.

We then go to the reduction in taxes on gasoline, cigarettes and alcohol. He did more than say no on that one, he refused them. I can only assume he is not going to reduce those. So when he says, "No, I'm going to raise them," he is not going to lower them. So I can cross that one off.

We are left now with collection of the PST at the border by the provincial government as a separate entity, which is not viable because the federal government has said no. So we can cross that one off.

thought of over the last three years, this is your definition of government: sitting around navel-gazing, because there is little if anything after the four, five or six major recommendations that can be done. I do not want to investigate all of these items, because the Treasurer has said: "Don't waste your time. I don't agree." So rather than investigating these five or six that he said no to, let's put some new ideas on the table. If there are not any new ideas, we make a report to the Treasurer saying, "If you've excluded the five or six areas where you can actually effect change, then you've basically excluded any options for cross-border towns to compete."

I do not want to waste more time talking about marrying the GST and PST, or about zones, I do not want to talk about reduction of the provincial sales tax, I do not want to talk about the hooks to get them back there, over and back, because all these things are not on the table. If someone has some other ideas, I would love to hear them, but if we are going to continue talking about these things they said no to, why are we wasting our time?

Mr Hansen: Regarding the point of the legislation or the bills that are presented in the House by the third party, are they correcting the cross-border shopping issue at this time? It looks like it is stalling the House, not doing anything for the benefit in Ontario.

Mr Stockwell: That may be a point. So what? What has that got to do with the price of eggs?

The Chair: I would like to respond, because I see the problem before us in two ways. We can make recommendations that may help in the immediate time frame and there may be recommendations that we can make over a long term. There are some serious questions on the table about retailing, about pricing, about why goods made in Canada, shipped to Toronto and shipped to Buffalo, wind up being half the price in Buffalo that they are in Toronto. I think some of these questions can be looked at with respect to the request by a couple of the groups that were asked for some long-term solutions.

As for what is on the table and what is off the table, obviously whatever the Treasurer, the government and the cabinet decide to do is on the table. My position here is to play the role of the impartial Chair and I would say we should discuss all of these issues and that these discussions should be made available to the Treasurer. If the Treasurer decides he is going to maintain or to make these actions, at least he will have before him the discussion of all of the members of this committee. However, if this committee, in its power, deems that we do not want to do that, then I am at the will of this committee.

Mr Kwinter: Can I make a radical suggestion? Who knows, you may go for it. Why do we not ignore the Treasurer and make our recommendations based on what we have heard and not on what we think the government is going to do?

Mr Stockwell: That is radical.

Ms Harrington: I think that is what this committee is supposed to do. We are all three parties and having listened to the so-called experts we have to use our own judgement and put forward whatever recommendations we think are legitimate for the government to consider. If you think the Treasurer is not going to listen or whatever, then we as part of this committee may be able to talk to him. It is the mandate of this committee to be objective.

Mr B. Ward: In a non-partisan manner.

Mr Kwinter: It would be rather pleasant to see it.

Mr Sutherland: The only thing I was going to say, I was not as confident as Mr Stockwell that the Treasurer had ruled out all those options. Maybe a couple of them he put forward he has ruled out. The Treasurer may have indicated his personal opinion that he is not keen on some of the other ones as well. But the sense I have in terms of being there in question period is that he does not have a lot of answers. He is looking for some good, solid advice from this committee to be considered and taken into account. That is what we should be doing and we should be doing that with an open mind and looking at what we feel are the most viable options.

Ms Harrington: He does not have all the information we do.

Mr Hansen: My friend on the other side mentioned the reduction in fuel tax at border communities. We had Mr Brandt here talking on that issue, and I believe the Treasurer most likely read those Hansards. He was of a different opinion, that this does not work as well as it sounds it might work, and it has not worked as well in Quebec. So all these recommendations that have come in—I think it is unfair to say the Treasurer refused this or refused that in the budget. Possibly, asking him on a one-to-one basis on the concerns of the members of this committee, maybe we do not get an exact yes, no or anything else, maybe “I’ll take a look at it.” But I think it is unfair to pin him down on those five points, as it is now, as my friend from the third party said.

Mr Stockwell: I did not say he said it. I did not refute him. He refuted him. I did not say no. He said no. I am not making this up. He said it in Hansard. If you have some special information, share it.

Mr Hansen: We have all heard the same reports come through here and those were some of the recommendations. So I think he should have a chance to explain some of the recommendations that come through this committee today.

The Chair: This question raises two questions, one about the degree of independence of committees, and Mr Pond has submitted an analysis of some of the other finance committees in operation in other jurisdictions such as Ottawa, Great Britain, New Zealand and Australia; it is their opinion that the committees do have a degree of latitude to follow and to make recommendations that may or may not agree with what the government has done. We have examples in the past. The pre-budget consultation recommendations of the 1990-91 committee contained an awful lot of recommendations that were subsequently not followed through on by the previous government. So there are precedents set for committees to make recommendations in light of the best information that is available to them.

I guess the second question, then, is the degree to which we interpret the recommendation in the budget from the Treasurer, of opening up the process of the finance and economic affairs committee and the degree to which that is taken. Sitting as the impartial Chair, that is a decision the government party is going to have to make.

Mr Sutherland: I think we have a consensus on how we proceed here, do we not, in terms of the research staff doing the summaries maybe on some of the topics, maybe on some of the information other members have added, and then we will wait until we can have the Treasurer before us before we sit down to do recommendations.

The Chair: Then we will take the instruction from the committee for the researchers to flesh out some of the areas of information that have been requested and that if the Treasurer cannot come this afternoon, if this committee is not sitting, we will request that he come for 10 o'clock next Thursday morning?

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, can I get a clarification? Are you saying that if the Treasurer does not appear, the committee will not sit?

The Chair: No. If the committee is sitting, the Treasurer will appear. But we have already had indications from the third party that—

Mr Stockwell: So we are not sitting?

The Chair: That is up to you. As far as this committee is concerned, we are sitting this afternoon. But if the activities of the House and the votes and the bells and everything continue, then it makes it very difficult to sit.

Mrs Sullivan: It is impossible under the rules.

Ms M. Ward: It means if routine proceedings end, the committee sits, and if they do not end then we do not sit.

The Chair: Before we adjourn, I had a little discussion with the Treasurer about the comments in the budget and he has indicated to me that he is very serious about changing the pre-budgetary process in terms of opening the system up, as he said in the budget, and making the process much more open than it has been in the past.

I do not ask for any recommendations at this point, but as Chair I would ask that the members of this committee seriously consider how the whole budgetary process has been done, how it can be opened up and how we can ask the Treasurer what direction we should be going in terms of the budgetary process in the future. I think this dovetails with the discussions we had just after we finished the pre-budgetary consultation, and I think it is worth while revisiting this in the near future. If you can think of some recommendations and issues this Chair can recommend to the Treasurer for approval, disapproval or whatever, I am looking for that as well.

Mr Kwinter: The solution is so simple and so obvious—it is just a matter of whether the will is there—that is, that nobody makes a representation to the Treasurer; they make all their representations to this committee and we then forward them to the Treasurer. Right now, what happens is that this is a pro forma exercise; the people who come here come here only because the opportunity is there, but they know the guy they have to talk to is the Treasurer. They come here, they do their thing, but they ure: "These guys aren't going to have any influence. It's the Treasurer who is going to have it."

If this committee was really the committee that was doing the pre-budget consultations and then it would send its findings to the Treasurer and meet with the Treasurer and say, "Here's what we've done," that would solve the problem.

Mr Sutherland: Coming back to the cross-border shopping issue in terms of the process, I have a suspicion that we will not be able to get the Treasurer next week in the morning but in the afternoon, because I believe another time he appeared he indicated he has a regular cabinet committee meeting on Thursday morning. If we are not meeting him till the afternoon, will we be prepared next Thursday morning to deal with the report from the research people? I do not want to put you through the budget process again, of the report and the deadlines, but would it be possible for us to get the report ahead of time, possibly Wednesday, if we have to look at it on Thursday morning?

The Chair: We have asked the researcher to do two things: one, to research all this other information; two, to put together this overview. That is an awful lot of work.

Mr Sutherland: Maybe you could just give us a sense of what the time line here is, given what we are asking to be done.

Ms Anderson: We can aim for that. Maybe there is a question of your priority, whether you would rather have a draft of the report—we will collect the information and we have the other information on the tax structures of the United States and everything else like that, fine; or whether you would be happy to have that information the following week if we cannot get it in time for next week; or whether you would rather have the information first. We will aim to do both for next week, but if it is not feasible, how would you prioritize?

The Chair: The information first?

Mr Sutherland: I guess we will need the information to do the recommendations even if they are going to be the following week, so maybe you should try for the information. If we could, without putting an undue burden, we would appreciate it.

Mrs Sullivan: I just wanted to suggest that when the Treasurer comes before the committee he be prepared to expand on precisely what his view is, with precision, of the role of this committee in budget-setting. I think it is very clear that the budget is the number one important document. It is a highly political and partisan document because it outlines the program of the government in terms of power for spending and puts within that program the philosophical constraints and reaches of the budget. This is not a non-partisan document by a long shot, and I think he should be far more clear than he has been in the fudgy words that have appeared in the budget about how he sees the role of this committee.

Additionally, I think it is important for him to come before the committee with a statement of his philosophy relating to budget secrecy and whether he is going to throw out the concept of budget secrecy, and where he sees the possibilities for gain as a result of budget decisions in any tax moves that are made or recommendations this committee may put forward or that come from anywhere. Indeed, there is an opportunity for gain and for conflict, and that should be something he has considered and is willing to speak quite forthrightly about before this committee.

Mr B. Ward: Just to follow up on the meeting with the Treasurer, are we going to discuss that as well as the cross-border shopping impact? We only have so much time.

The Chair: My impression was that the Treasurer was not coming to discuss cross-border shopping, but was coming to do a debriefing on the budget and the budgetary process.

Mrs Sullivan: Maybe he will tell us how it was accepted across the province.

The Chair: With reference to Mrs Sullivan, if the Treasurer comes this afternoon—I cannot speak for him—I will certainly give him your questions, but I am not sure he would be prepared to answer them this afternoon quite that way. But you could possibly put them to him this afternoon.

Are there any other questions or observations? Okay, the committee is adjourned, hopefully until this afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The committee adjourned at 1137.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 9 May 1991

The committee met at 1014 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: We have a quorum. Now we can begin.

MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE AND FOOD

The Chair: The first presentation is from the Ministry of Agriculture and Food: Bob Seguin, executive director, policy and programs, and Laurinda Lang, policy adviser, policy analysis branch. Welcome. Thank you for coming.

Mr Seguin: We have provided to you a copy of the presentation. What I thought we would do is quickly go through it and then allow for questions and answers, which I think would be more in the committee's desire to do.

We have also provided for you a copy of the legislation under which supply management in Ontario operates—the Milk Act and the Farm Products Marketing Act in Ontario—and a copy of a study that was released by the federal government on Tuesday on the impact of cross-border shopping in northern Ontario, particularly on dairy products. We received it late Tuesday afternoon and we thought the committee might wish to have a copy of it sooner rather than later.

On behalf of the ministry, I am pleased to be here to give some of our concerns on cross-border shopping, some of the work that we are doing now and also discuss supply management in Ontario.

If you look at the first page, there are a number of studies. I believe the committee is probably well aware of some of the results of the studies about the impact of cross-border shopping. The study that you have in front of you from Agriculture Canada on cross-border milk purchases was done in 1989-90. It has unfortunately been delayed in getting reviewed. It was just released this last week. In 1989 over 8% of fresh milk and 1% of the cheese was imported by cross-border shopping. This was an issue identified by the milk farmers in Ontario, and it was not until the study was done that we realized the extent of the impact of cross-border shopping.

In March 1990 they looked at the prices between northern Ontario and the jurisdiction just south of it, and the differences in milk prices are there, the estimates of impact on a gallon-of-milk or pound-of-cheese basis and the numbers of shoppers importing milk through cross-border purchases.

I should also indicate, as the last item says, that Agriculture Canada is now undertaking a number of studies on border points throughout southern Ontario to examine the cross-border impact.

Agriculture Canada has also undertaken a study in April 1991 on Canadian and United States cities, looking at the impact and price differential on grocery products. As you can see, the preliminary results indicate that prices are higher in Canada by about 10%. The disparity seems to be greatest for Ontario, and of course the items that probably you are interested in, supply management products, are high. There are also condiments which are high and non-food items, which in the parlance of the retail trade would be health and beauty aids. These are higher in Canada than in the United States. The expectation is that later this month Agriculture Canada will release the report.

On our own efforts in the ministry staff, Laurinda and colleagues have visited the Niagara area, spoken to local retailers and the people involved on this issue down in the Niagara area. They have taken a look at grocery product prices in both St Catharines and Niagara Falls, New York. They have worked with our sister ministry, Industry, Trade and Technology, on cross-border shopping—this has been ongoing for about two years—and the monitoring of the federal government at work, both the previous studies and ongoing efforts, and working with the industry to look at cross-border shopping and what we can or cannot do.

On the issue of supply management, you should be aware that farm cash receipts total about $5.6 billion as of 1989. The items there under supply management total almost $2 billion. Supply management in Ontario is a significant industry for the farm sector. It is a system that has been in place in Ontario for the milk industry since 1965-66. It is an orderly marketing system. It benefits producers, processors and consumers in terms of stable supply of product at a reasonable price. There are national systems in place. Our legislation is tied to the federal legislation in dairy, poultry and eggs, and the fundamental elements are production controls, a sense of fair returns to the producers and border control so that we can maintain the system in Ontario and in Canada.

Just quickly on production controls, both provincial and federal legislation allows for these plans to be put in place, both on a provincial basis and on a national basis. On the national basis, it allows for the border controls.

Production is based on domestic market requirements, our best estimates of that. Provincial shares are allocated on a historical basis. That has been the subject of some concern with a number of provinces in the last several years, given the shifts in domestic market, but we are working on that. Each provincial board is responsible for regulating and administering the producers in that province. Production is limited and producers are penalized if they exceed production quotas, so the system plays fair by all parties.

There are cost reduction formulas. These are updated on a fairly regular basis, particularly with the milk industry. There are different pricing systems. The poultry industry is not homogeneous. There are different pricing systems, and different from dairy as well. The dairy industry does get some extra benefits. They do get the federal government to purchase any extra skimmed milk powder or extra butter and the federal government does provide a $6.03-a-hectolitre subsidy, which has been in place since the late 1960s and has not changed, essentially, since then. Therefore, the real benefit of that subsidy has declined over time, and the original context for that subsidy was to reduce the price of dairy products in Canada for consumers.

Border controls are the ones that probably raise the most public concern. Imports of such products that affect the dairy industry and poultry industry are subject to border controls under the Canadian Dairy Commission Act. Certain dairy products are defined and they are limited and under the import control measures of the federal government. A certain number of poultry products are also limited. These import controls are legal under GATT article XI.

Under the GATT negotiations that are now under way, Canada is seeking to strengthen and clarify article XI such that we are not always subject to panel disputes by other nations over what is really a dairy product or what is a poultry product, what can be controlled and what cannot. The minister's view is that he supports the Canadian point here, that it should be strengthened and clarified. That is a view he expressed when he attended, on behalf of Ontario and the Ontario farm industry, the GATT negotiations in Brussels late last year. We will continue our efforts to see what we can do with the federal government to make sure that point is maintained. It is a point that is also stressed by the dairy and poultry producers throughout Canada.

Dairy policies in the European Community and the United States are not similar to ours. We do have a different system. The European Community over the last several years has adopted a modified supply management system for its dairy industry, partially reduced the impact of the dairy surpluses on its own budget. The US operates a more open-ended support program. They are willing to purchase extra product and they have import controls. Both the European Community and the United States allow fewer imports into their jurisdictions than we do into ours.

The next page, and I will not go into detail, provides just a very quick synopsis between the US dairy system and how it operates and the Canadian dairy system. Basically, the US Treasury will subsidize the industry by taking extra product off the market and then reselling it back at some later date when the market's prices have risen. The Canadian industry allows such stabilization to occur through consumer prices with the exception of dairy, which has a direct subsidy component.

If you turn to the next page, you will get—the chart reads from bottom to top on the newer years—what the Commodity Credit Corp of the United States pays net on outlays to support the dairy industry. As you can see, as late as 1986-87 the United States government was spending a considerable amount of money to support the dairy sector in the US. In the last two years it has been reduced, partially because the milk surpluses that existed in the mid-1980s declined somewhat. However, the current US Congress is now debating whether they should have a special dairy support program because the prices for dairy farms in the United States have dropped so low. It is the centre of discussion in both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

I believe one of the concerns the committee has probably raised is looking at alternatives to supply management, what options there are and what other things are being done to make the system maybe a little more flexible. The federal government in 1989, under the former minister, Mr Mazankowski, and with the consent of all of the agriculture ministers across Canada, undertook a federal agriculture policy review, and two of the key areas they looked at were dairy policy and poultry policy. Two task forces were created with both producer and processor members on both and government representatives from the federal level.

The poultry task force report is released and is under discussion by the industry. The dairy task force report is soon to be released, and we anticipate it will be released probably in late May or early June. It is anticipated that when the ministers of agriculture meet in Alberta later in July, both reports will be under discussion to see what steps can be taken.

You should be aware that in the dairy industry the ministry worked with both the processors and producers to pull together a response on dairy. We have made presentations, both written and oral. You all have that page of what the groups were. The key points at that time, and it was in light of what the GATT negotiations were doing as of late fall last year, were: maintaining the essential elements of supply management; accepting that policy and administrative changes could be made with consensus within the supply management system that exists; and that the federal government reaffirm its support, which it did throughout the fall and at the Brussels meetings.

The poultry task force received about 171 oral and written submissions. We made two submissions as a ministry, as you can see, for increased product availability and greater flexibility and again to support article XI. We also co-operated with the Ontario Egg Producers' Marketing Board on a special two-price proposal to increase the flexibility within the system.

The next page would have the recommendations of the poultry task force, basically twofold; one is operational changes and the other is more structural. The chairman from Quebec indicated that she had consensus of all members of the task force for these recommendations and a number of the changes would improve both the flexibility of the supply management system and its ability to accommodate the differential changes both to processors and producers. It is now under discussion by various boards, the agencies and the governments. The ministry itself is assessing its position on the poultry task force report.

As some of the members of the committee may be aware, tobacco is under a special supply management system. There is no national system for supply management for tobacco, but the Tobacco Board of Ontario does operate a special supply policy. The tariffs on tobacco are being eliminated. We are under a declining demand situation for a number of reasons. Increasing taxation on tobacco is a concern to the tobacco industry and it is one that all governments are involved in. There is some concern about the growth in smuggling of tobacco and the impact that has both tobacco consumption for the Canadian industry and on budgets. Cross-border shopping is also being encouraged because of the differential in prices. On the significant adjustments in the tobacco industry since the mid-1980s, we have been involved with the tobacco industry and with the federal government in looking at tobacco adjustment programs, and we are involved now in re-examining which programs and which policies we will pursue in the future to assist the industry as it makes its adjustments.

Final comments: It is a concern to the industry and to the ministry about cross-border shopping and its impact. We should note that from our point of view the supply management system in Ontario and in Canada has worked well. There are certain difficulties, certain things that always could be improved, but there is no need for dramatic change. There are national efforts with producers and processors, and in some cases the consumer groups involved, to make those changes and to bring them forward. Ministers of agriculture, both federally and provincially across Canada, will be looking at these issues in July at their meeting in Alberta.

So with that, Mr Chairman, I will take questions if you wish.

Mr Kwinter: I want to ask some questions and make some comments. I feel kind of relieved to be not in the government and to be able to address this, because every time I addressed it when I was in the government I risked the wrath of the agricultural industry falling on my head. The mere mention that I was even going to address supply management brought threats of circling Queen's Park with tractors. It is sort of a holy icon—

Interjections.

Mr Kwinter: It is true. But one of the problems we have is that there are conflicting interests. There are the farmers who have a legitimate concern about their ability to earn a livelihood and then there are the consumers. It is exactly the basic issue that we have with cross-border shopping.

I would like to question you when you say supply management is "an orderly marketing system that benefits producers, processors and consumers." Obviously it is not benefiting consumers because milk, which is under supply management, happens to be one of the biggest items. I think in your study you say that 85% of the cross-border shoppers imported milk when they went to Sault Ste Marie, Michigan, so obviously it is not benefiting the consumer. It may be benefiting them in the sense that they get security of supply, but they do not get security of price, and that is the problem.

When you talk about it and you say, "You have a cow which may even be the brother of the same cow that is on one side of the border, and the other cow was on—"

Mr Phillips: Better make that "sister."

Mr Kwinter: Sister, okay. Well, in order to get the sisters, you have to have a brother in there too.

What I am saying is that you will have these cows on both sides of the border producing the same kind of milk, and yet there is this huge discrepancy. You cannot say,

"Well, it is because of the importing, it is because of mass production" or anything else. Milking machines are virtually the same. Labour is virtually the same when you are self-employed as a farmer. The big difference has got to be the difference in whether it is supply management or the system that is used in the United States. That has to be the major factor on a product that is so time and price sensitive. It is not that it is mass produced and that someone can go and build it cheaper somewhere else; it is that kind of product.

Again, there are conflicting things. A consumer wears many hats. He wears the hat of not only being a consumer but he has also got to be employable and employed in all of these things, and you have to protect that. When it comes right down to price, I would submit that one of the major factors is supply management and what it does to artificially keep the price where it is, whereas in a so-called free market system, it would reach a competitive level. I am not saying it is good or it is bad, because there is no question that supply management has a lot of good in it, but it certainly is the factor, so we have to deal with that.

Mr Seguin: The industry is well aware that there is need for some changes. That is why they are involved in these national task forces, at both the producer and the processor levels. Within Ontario the Farm Products Marketing Commission, which supervises all the boards, is involved with bringing processors and consumer representatives together, bringing together the conflicting needs and demands on the system, while trying to still maintain a fair return policy for farmers.

But I guess to say that the systems are equal in comparison is forgetting about the fact that the US farm policy is not identical to ours, and the way it subsidizes and assists the dairy industry is not identical to ours. The US system allows excess dairy production to be bought off the market temporarily, thereby raising prices to some sort of level without the impact felt by the producers and the impact felt on prices.

It is also that the US dairy industry has substantial import protection, far more than we have, and it is not willing to give that up, even though the Canadian government and the Canadian milk industry and poultry industry are willing to give up some of that import protection to allow for a little bit better balance and greater security.

It is a different system, and to say that all the problems are based on supply management is not quite correct. The United States government is subsidizing its dairy sector, so it does not have to go through some of the adjustments and some of the demands on the consumer marketplace that our system would go through.

The fact that there are some price differences is acknowledged by the industry. It is just, how are we going to work around them, at what points is the pressure being felt and what can be done on those points of pressure? It is not an easy issue. Simply changing the milk price in Sault Ste Marie, for example, for this study—what about the impact on milk producers in the Sault Ste Marie area and the surrounding area? What would be the benefit to the consumers? There is no assurance that the milk price decline would be passed on to the consumers. So it is not quite a simple issue and we are working on it, but to look at it and beef. I think the free trade agreement said the food producers were going to be the first hit, and I suspect that is happening. Based on what I hear from here, the way we subsidize our farm community is different from the US. It works again against us here and favours cross-border shopping. So I just cannot find much good news in all this sort of stuff.

I just have one question, I guess one minor question. The price comparison you did—what did that indicate?

Ms Lang: The one that our staff did?

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Ms Lang: Much the same type of thing. We did a very quick study, but again, certain commodities tended to be cheaper in the United States and some here. Again, the supply-managed ones tended to be more expensive in the States. We also found that another big draw was that beer was a lot cheaper in the States and that it was available in the grocery stores and was about half the price of here, not taking into consideration exchange.

But other than that there was also, within brands, such a wide range within the grocery stores that sometimes it was hard to—you know, with the quick study we did, we went down and back in a day kind of thing—it was not as if all products here were more expensive than all brands of the same product in the States.

Mr Phillips: I was mildly surprised at the 10% difference that the federal study showed. My impression was that it was higher. Did you find 10%?

Ms Lang: I am not sure we have percentages. The thing you might note about that was that it said 10% on average for Canada and it indicated that the disparity was greatest for Ontario, but they could not give me the figures. They just have not got that far in the report yet.

Mr Phillips: I guess when we get it in May it will help us. But this is May.

Ms Lang: Yes.

Mr Seguin: Later May.

Mr Phillips: Later May. Mr Chairman, the supply-managed commodities showing here at $5.6 billion—

Mr Seguin: That is all commodities. The supply management are the ones that are noted.

Mr Phillips: Is Ontario a net exporter or importer of food?

Mr Seguin: It is a net importer. That is partially because we are also a major point of entry for any products coming into Canada.

Mr Phillips: That would surprise a lot of people.

Mr Seguin: We are also a major exporter, but on balance we are a net importer.

Mr Phillips: I realize that. That is my impression. Has it grown as a percentage?

Mr Seguin: It has been fairly stable over the last couple of years. There has been about a $1-billion difference between our exports and imports.

Mr Phillips: Over like a 10-year period, were we at one time a net exporter?

Mr Seguin: No. We have been a net importer for about a decade, but let's say the imports have grown over that decade.

Mr Phillips: I gather dairy is relatively well protected against importation. As we look down the road at these various commodities, what commodities are not well protected against the importation?

Mr Seguin: Under GATT, article XI provides protection only for those products that are on supply management and controlled domestically. Essentially, only those products that are on supply management, dairy and poultry products, would be under direct import controls. The exception is the wheat products because of the Canadian Wheat Board. Through the free trade agreement, that is now being opened up over time. Almost any other product would have had tariff protection and under the free trade agreement that tariff protection is being reduced. There are certain legal differences between the two jurisdictions. It does not quickly ease border access, but most other products would have, let's say, more open borders and there is no strict border control.

Mr Phillips, you did mention the beef sector. The beef sector is unregulated, yet it is probably under even greater pressure than almost any other because of American imports. Some of the American imports are due to the feed grain policy in the United States and the differential processing capacity of the United States versus that of Canada. Certain adjustments are occurring outside of the supply management sector.

Mr Phillips: I know your mind is on supply management, but I am just talking generically about food. I appreciate that.

Mr Hansen: Mr Sutherland asked part of the question there. I was in Pennsylvania—not shopping but visiting—this Easter and was told that some of the herds are increasing in size because of the sales of milk at border towns. The one instance was that the small farm there and a few other farms around were bought up and now there are 600 head running on that farm. A corporation owns it. There is a farmer in boots out there milking; but he is no longer an owner of the farm, just a worker. Is this an indication in the border areas, around 100 miles from the border, that the farms are increasing in size?

Mr Seguin: I cannot respond to that directly. It is a known trend in the United States to increase the size, but it is even more predominant in the deep South and California. It may occur more recently, but at least none of the information we have would suggest that this is an increasing trend. Certainly the pressure is on in the US dairy system to always expand in order to improve the returns of the farmers.

The returns of the farmers between two jurisdictions are quite different. Farmers in Canada can make a better return on the same size of herd than the ones in the United States and still survive. That puts increasing pressure on US industries either to diversify or to integrate and become that much larger, which goes back to my point to your colleague, that the US Congress is now trying to see if it can readdress that situation through other changes.

They do not have this kind of corporate concentration and its increasing trend to just have larger and larger herds, which also has an environmental impact. Definitely in the areas around Washington and Maryland, when we have met with US officials it has been raised to us that the waste management from dairy herds in particular has caused environmental problems. Yet how do you resolve that? Going to larger herds is not always the best solution. In California it has also been a major concern.

Mr Hansen: What it sounded like was that they were targeting Canada or Ontario as the new expanded area to be selling milk.

Mr Seguin: I cannot say if this discussion is a corporate or even a national policy, but it does seem they are under the most pressure of all the provinces.

Mr Jamison: I have been listening to Monte's concerns and yours over the tobacco end of things. I think most of your remarks were pretty well right on, but it did not really tell the whole picture. There is a significant difference between prices of a product, the end product, in the United States and Canada. It has caused quite a smuggling problem at this point, to my understanding.

Just as an example, one vanload of cigarettes at this point is worth $1.5 million, and that is probably underestimated. That indicates the level. Any government that I have ever seen has always recognized very clearly the health implications of smoking and has taken steps in trying to combat the use of tobacco products in the end result. I think the problem with the ministry at this point is twofold: how do you do that in a controlled manner where the industry is gradually downscaled, and what effects do we create by doing that on the people who invest their whole livelihood in that particular end.

It is quite a significant problem because, when you have two jurisdictions that are closely related, and a wide difference in pricing on a particular product, that happens. But having said that, it is clear that all governments have taken that course. Certainly, the growers are the people at the other end who are most heavily affected and so on.

I do not think it deals with marketing or marketing boards. That is different than milk. I should be an expert on milk, because my family uses about 4,200 gallons a year, in quick calculation.

We have mentioned the system of management we have. I wanted to indicate that this is something that was expounded upon, the threat to our orderly marketing system or whatever, during and after the free trade negotiations that went on; how marketing boards could be—and it looks like they have been—threatened significantly.

Along with that, we have a situation that deals with something Monte Kwinter touched on, the GATT situation, where you have two extremely powerful economic bodies, the European Community and the United States, doing battle in the area of agriculture subsidies and so forth. The Americans have different ways of having a subsidy arrive at the farm gate, and the EC, of course, is very protective of its agricultural community. The problem that has created for us compounds upon the things I have just talked about, again reflecting on our ability as a lesser financial power, as a country, to deal directly with the type of battle that is going on between these two powers.

In the secondary version, it is impacting. Our ability to access the American market, as Mr Seguin has just indicated, is limited to a greater extent than we limit the United States from accessing ours. That all brings about the question of the level playing field and how much of a level playing field has really been created over the last period of time with all those factors taken into consideration. My concern, I guess, culminates in the question: Do you see those particular problems in trade minimizing as we go along?

Mr Seguin: Not really. Under the free trade agreement we have approximately seven years to negotiate a deal on subsidies. Essentially, the federal government delayed pursuing it, as did the US federal government, pending the GATT negotiations which were to be resolved in December of last year. They were not. We are looking, if Congress agrees to a continuation in negotiations, probably at late this year or even next year.

In that agreement of subsidies even on a broader scale, it will still take a number of years to implement. No one is asking that these be implemented, let's say, within one year. So we are under considerable pressure within the country to maintain some other systems in place while these international negotiations continue, and if they are successful, until the agreements have some full impact.

We are also working among the provinces to try to minimize, let's say, the distortion between the provinces. It is not always successful, but we are also trying to do the best we can in non-supply-management products and in supply management products, such that there is easier trade and fairer trade between the provinces and then eventually between the nations. But it is a long-standing problem and it will take a long time to resolve, regrettably.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to ask Mr Seguin about quota. Would it not help Ontario producers and indeed our grocery retailers if there were an adjustment in the quota formula and Ontario received additional quota?

Mr Seguin: In the poultry sector the Ontario government, the chicken processors and the chicken board did pursue together for a while the option of expanding quota in Ontario. Even within an expanding market someone would have to lose, and those were quite difficult negotiations. We have succeeded to a minor extent in improving the quota allocations and total allocation to Ontario, not to the satisfaction of the industry, but there are certain historical difficulties in the original allocation which will not be easily resolved. These are things that will be brought forward to ministers probably in July to see if we can start the steps of eventually resolving that so that we can get the extra quota.

On the milk situation, while there have been discussions on this, this is not as considerable a concern at this time about the reallocation between provinces. It is not quite as considerable as it is in the poultry sector.

Mrs Sullivan: The Ontario Milk Marketing Board thinks it is a concern.

Mr Seguin: It is a concern, but not quite as considerable as the poultry. They are working within the system as best

I should say that something like this requires a tremendous number of attempts to interview. We contacted more than 80 people in Canada and the US across the three product categories. We had in excess of what we considered 30 good interviews where we had full co-operation; we had various levels of co-operation but a fair degree of co-operation from the various players that we talked to.

So today I can present some highlights of our findings in the report. I understand that you have copies of the report. I will not show you all the cases, but I will walk through several of them. As I said, some background research was done to try to find some comparative information on the distribution channels in Canada and the US, particularly as it relates to the competitiveness of those channels.

We found there was very little work already done in this area. So we attempted to do our own basic comparison and we looked at 1987 Statscan data and 1987 Bureau of The Census data from the US. We have compared sales per establishment in the broad categories within those two publications. From this we see that on average US wholesalers and retailers appear to be much larger than Canadian wholesalers and retailers in terms of sales per establishment. And that suggests there are opportunities for efficiency and effectiveness within the retailing and wholesaling system in the US.

As I mentioned earlier, we looked at three product categories: consumer electronics, bedding and linen and women's sportswear. For each of these, I will show you the structure of the channel that we identified in Canada and the US, I will show you the markups or how the prices come to be built up and we will draw some general conclusions.

We are not really talking about any one specific product in our examples. What we have tried to do is construct, based on our input, typical cases within the product categories.

So the first one we will look at is consumer electronics. The consumer is at the bottom and the manufacturers are at the top, the manufacturers being primarily in Asia. In both Canada and the US, product is sold by the Asian manufacturer through a manufacturer's distribution subsidiary. This is for major brands.

On the left there are the retail options, being mass retailers, national specialists, independents, department stores and discount stores. We also acknowledge that there is some grey market activity here in both Canada and the US, as a source of supply primarily to independents and discount stores.

I point out that mass retailers and department stores, mostly in Canada, have a larger share of the market.

Ms Harrington: What is a grey market?

Mr Buchanan: Basically a grey market is where somebody, on an entrepreneurial basis, will source product someplace else and move it into a market, bypassing the regular distribution channels. There may be excess inventory some place in Asia, anywhere in the world, that they can pick up for whatever reason at such a good price that it makes it profitable for them to bring that in independently and land it in the country.

Ms Harrington: Is it perfectly legal?

Mr Buchanan: There are some disputes about the legalities, issues related to trademarks and licensing and so on.

Mr Sutherland: What is the grey market percentage?

Mr Buchanan: I am not sure. We understand that there is more of this activity in the US than there is in Canada, because the US is such a large market. If you are an entrepreneurial type and you are able to source product very cheaply elsewhere in the world, the US would be a more attractive market to take product into.

Going back to this, you see that for some products most minor audio and video components are sourced by these retailers through the independent distributor that you see in the lighter blue box. These would be videotapes, audio tapes, etc, but some larger products are sold through the independent distributors to independent stores or discount stores.

In the US, national specialists and discount stores are much larger players in the marketplace than in Canada. In Canada, the department stores tend to be where the volume of audio and video components are sold.

If we look at the case now of a typical video product sold through independent retailers and through this independent distributor, we can see how this cost is built up. The bar on the left is Canada and the bar on the right is the US. These are all in US dollars, I should say.

In Canada, the product would sell for approximately $434, through this and an independent retailer, versus $381 in the US. The differences are that, to start right at the manufacturing level, the manufacturer earns $16 more on average for a product like this on its sales into Canada than it does on its sales into the US. Add to that transportation and duty costs—the landing costs associated with getting it into the country, which are $20 higher in Canada than in the US—an additional $8 for the Canadian subsidiary distribution company, an extra $6 for the independent distributor and an extra $3 for the retailer, and you end up with a price which is about $53 higher. This shows how the absolute costs are higher.

The next chart shows how this is built up as a percentage of the total retail price. The pink is the manufacturer, the dark blue transportation and duties, lighter blue subsidiary costs, the orange distributor and the green is the retailer. You can see, although the retailer in Canada is actually charging an extra $3 for that product, on a percentage of the total retail price, his margin would actually be slightly lower in this example, 19.5% to 20% versus 18%, the major difference here being the landing costs, transportation and duty costs.

This slight buildup, starting at the manufacturer level—the manufactured price is built up to where prices would be about 13% higher in Canada.

Interjection.

Mr Buchanan: That is right, because it is compounded. It starts slightly higher, and then there is a compounding effect.

Let us look at high-volume retailers, department stores, mass merchandisers. The price difference is lower here, and the absolute prices are lower as well. You see in Canada price being $348 versus $302 in the United States. The manufacturer, again, is earning $16 more on its sales into Canada. Again, the transportation and duty costs, landing costs, are about $20 higher. The subsidiary is earning another $12 in Canada. The distributor has been eliminated, the retailer in this example, the mass merchandisers, department stores, we have indicated would actually be earning about $2 less on the sales of that product than could be a comparable retailer in the United States.

If we look at that in terms of the total buildup, you can see again that although the manufacturer earns a greater percentage of the total retail price in the US, in absolute dollar terms he is earning more on his sales in Canada. The transportation and duty costs, the landing costs are higher, and you can see here that the Canadian retailer is earning about a 23% margin on that product, versus about 27% in the United States.

Mr Stockwell: But that 23% margin is based solely on the numbers that you have put together. It does not take into consideration the municipal-provincial taxes that he pays that the US retailer would not pay.

Mr Buchanan: That is what he is taking out of it, and adding in his costs—

Mr Stockwell: Then he has to service his costs by adding the labour, taxes, etc.

Mr Buchanan: His costs are absorbed into that, yes.

Mr Stockwell: So he is taking 23% profit after he pays his taxes, etc.

Mr Buchanan: That is not his profit; that is his margin.

Mr Stockwell: Margin, I am sorry. Then after he pays that, he could be making less than the American.

Mr Buchanan: That is correct. Could be, yes.

So sourcing direct to the factory subsidiary distribution company has lowered the overall price, but there is still a price disparity between Canada and the United States.

We have some preliminary findings. We found that the channel structures are quite similar between Canada and the United States. However, there are differences in terms of the relative strength of some of the players in the channel. In the US, there seems to be greater competition based on the rise of the discount stores and the independent or specialist audio and video stores.

Duties and transport costs are generally higher in Canada. It costs more to get the product into the country in the first place; margins are generally comparable, however. The manufacturer may have a slightly higher margin on its sales into Canada. The retailers appear to be earning comparable margins, or perhaps in some cases slightly lower margins in Canada.

Now we will move on to bedding and linen, and once again I will look at the structure, the margins, and draw some preliminary conclusions or findings.

Manufacturer gain is at the top. In terms of comparability, we felt it was best to compare back to the same manufacturer, so we assumed US manufactured bedding and linen products and went through the channels on both sides of the border to be able to draw this comparison.

The manufacturer again is at the top. In terms of comparability, we felt it was best to compare back to the same manufacturer, so we assumed US-manufactured bedding and linen products and went through the channels on both sides of the border to be able to draw this comparison.

The boxes on the left, the US mass merchandisers and department stores, buy directly, for minor brands, from the manufacturer. Independent retailers will buy through a distributor. In Canada, the light blue boxes, it is the same situation for minor brands. Canadian mass merchandisers and department stores source directly. The independents go through a Canadian distributor.

The Chair: Do the manufacturers not have manufacturer outlet stores? Where would they appear in this in terms of them being able to put their seconds and—not their rejects, but their lower-quality products directly into the markets? The factory outlet malls in Lewiston and in New York are really a major part of the problem. Are they in that somewhere?

Mr Buchanan: We were trying to look at the industry as a whole, and they are not a large percentage of the sales right now, but I think they are growing, and they would be sourcing directly from the manufacturer. In New York, the store that I am familiar with in a factory outlet mall is not actually a factory outlet. It is an independent discount store. It sources from a number of manufacturers. We are giving an overview here. There are variations on it, and that is a good point.

Mr B. Ward: I have a question on the Canadian mass merchandisers and department stores. Is that Canadian-controlled department stores, or is that just the fact that they are in Canada and they could be American-controlled?

Mr Buchanan: It is not specific. We talked to a number of companies in that category.

Mr B. Ward: Were the majority Canadian-controlled or were the majority American?

Mr Buchanan: I suspect that the majority were Canadian-controlled. There are more Canadian-controlled department stores.

Ms Harrington: Are all manufacturers in the US? Are there not Canadian manufacturers?

Mr Buchanan: My understanding of the industry is that there are some Canadian manufacturers, but they tend to supply, not the full bedding sets, but accessories and so on. The major brands appear to be primarily US.

Ms Harrington: I am quite disappointed. I would think that if I wanted to shop for those things, I could get all kinds of towels and/or sheets that are made in Canada. Is that not the case?

Mr Buchanan: Yes, you could get some. For purposes of our comparison it would work best if we went back to the same manufacturer, because we are trying to determine how the differences arise between the retail price and a manufacturer's. So in only one example did we go back and compare our Canadian manufacturer to a US manufacturer.

Ms Harrington: Okay, but it is true that you can buy Canadian, made here?

Mr Buchanan: Yes, I understand you can. The two examples that we have are for major brands, however. Those were more minor brands. For major brands, the significant difference here is—off in the top right-hand corner you see a Canadian distribution subsidiary or an affiliate, which tends to add an extra level. All sales for major brands will be sold through this extra level in Canada.

Mr B. Ward: A subsidiary? Where do they come from? Why do we need that extra layer in Canada?

Mr Buchanan: Many US manufacturers in a number of industries have distribution subsidiaries in Canada for sales and marketing purposes to support advertising, promotional efforts. They would also handle whatever repackaging or relabelling might be required. There is a marketing function here, just as the Asian manufacturers of consumer electronics have distribution subsidiary companies to manage the sales and marketing and distribution of products.

Mr B. Ward: They make the product in America. They ship it to Canada. They put different labels on it, and then the Canadian distributor picks it up from there. Is that the procedure?

Mr Buchanan: I am not sure where the actual repackaging would occur, whether that would be done in the US or in Canada, but this is a sales and marketing approach. There would be a physical service in terms of the delivery of goods, as well, so that there is an inventory of goods within Canada to be shipped to the retailers.

The Chair: I think it would be a good idea at this time to let Mr Buchanan finish his presentation because we have time constraints and I believe there will be votes in the House, so I think we should have all the presentation in. If there is time remaining, we can ask these questions.

Mr B. Ward: And if there is not any time?

The Chair: Just SOL.

Mr Buchanan: So the first case we will look at is the independent retailers in Canada and the US who buy through these distributors, the US distributor and the Canadian distributor. You can see here how the costs are built up. Comparable product would sell—in US dollars—for about $133 in Canada, versus about $52 in the United States. The manufacturer would charge approximately $1 more for the sales of product which go to Canada than for sales within the US. We add to that our transportation and duty costs of $6, a subsidiary cost of $17, which would not exist in the United States, the independent distributor which is an extra $9 in Canada versus in the US, and then the retailer is, in this example, charging an extra $48 for the product than would be the case with a comparable retailer in the US.

So you can see how the percentage of the final retail price is allocated between the different players in the channel in these charts. The manufacturers in the US are earning a much larger share of that smaller pie. In Canada, the retailers typically earn about a 50% margin on a bedding and linen product, versus about 35% in the US.

There is an additional step here, that subsidiary distribution company, and also an additional cost in terms of the landing cost, transportation and duties. If we source it direct and bypass that independent distributor—this would be a mass merchandiser or a department store. See, there is still a major price difference here: $96 in Canada versus $36 in the US. Once again, the manufacturer earns an extra dollar on the sales into Canada than in the US. Transportation and duty costs and the subsidiary costs are about $23, and those are costs that do not even exist in the US, and then the retailer is adding another $36 to that in Canada, an additional $36 to that in Canada. It is interesting to note here that that manufacturer in real dollar terms is actually earning the same amount of money on sales in Canada and the US, but you can see that it represents a much smaller component of the total cost in Canada than in the US.

There are a number of additional steps, as I have alluded to—transportation and duty, subsidiary costs—and the retailer in Canada typically would earn about a 50% margin, versus about 33% or 34% in the US.

So we see that in Canada our preliminary findings are that there is an additional level in the Canadian channel from major brands of bedding and linen products. This extra level and higher retailer margins add costs to the product, as well as the landing costs—transportation and duties—that do not occur in the US for US-manufactured product.

The higher retail margins in Canada are offset somewhat by this aggressive occasional promotional discounting, the white goods sales phenomenon. So although on a regular price basis there are these higher margins, there is some aggressive discounting that is traditional within the industry.

The final channel that we looked at was women's sportswear. This is a little complex. There is the top level, manufacturers. There are domestic manufacturers in Canada and the US that do all of the manufacturing. There are contracting manufacturers in Canada and the US. The contracting manufacturer is the company that basically owns the brand name or the design and has part of the manufacturing done offshore and then some final manufacturing done within either Canada or the US.

Mr Stockwell: They sew on the label.

Mr Buchanan: There are also just the importers as a source of product. There is an extra level. There are additional sales costs within this industry. There is a direct sales force, employed by all three levels, or independent agents. They use a variety, depending on the type of account that they are trying to service and their own particular size and circumstances.

In terms of the retail channel, the next level down, there is "Others." We will start with "Others." There are factory outlets, mail orders, mail order operations. There are discounters, department stores and apparel specialty stores. All of these exist in Canada and the US, to some extent or other. However, the factory outlets and mail order operations are much more significant in women's sportswear in the United States than in Canada, and that is a vertical integration from the manufacturer through into retailing. In Canada, the predominant players for women's sportswear are the department stores and apparel specialty stores.

We found that within that structure, because of the pre-ninance of the factory outlets and the mail orders, there is a price competition at the retail level in the United States than in Canada. Once again, as in consumer electronics, the structure is identical between Canada and the US but the relative strength of some of the players is different.

The first case is domestically manufactured product sold through department stores by these direct sales forces. In this case, we have looked at products manufactured either in Canada or in the US and then sold. This is fairly straightforward. The manufacturer in Canada is charging about an extra $3 than a comparable manufacturer in the US for a comparable product. The Canadian retailer is charging an extra $9. So the net result is that a similar product would be selling for what would be US$62 in Canada versus US$50 in the United States.

I will not show you the pie chart because there are only two pieces to the pie in each case. What this suggests is that in Canada the retailer has about a 58% margin, versus 47% for the US retailer.

The next case is US manufactured product sold through apparel specialty stores. This comes back to the comparison to the same manufacturer. In this case the manufacturer would generally charge about the same price for sales of product which would go into Canada or the US. We have additional transportation and duty costs which they obviously would not incur. That adds $6. The sales agents would earn the same between Canada and the US on that product and the retailer would add an additional $10 in Canada, which yields a price comparison of $72 versus $57.

In terms of the retail margin, the green part of the pie, you can see that in this example the retail margin is marginally higher in Canada, 50% versus 47% in the US. We have an extra cost here of transportation and duties, that landing cost.

Some of the preliminary findings that we have for women's sportswear: Once again, the channel structures are similar in terms of the options for getting product from the manufacturer to the consumer. We see that there is greater US price competition within the channel, due to the number of participants, brand availability and forward integration. By "forward integration," I mean this move into factory outlet stores by US manufacturers, causing greater price competition throughout the channel. Duty and transportation costs will be higher in Canada and Canadian margins are slightly higher at the retail level.

We have some preliminary findings for the three channels as a whole, based on the research that we were able to do. US firms have scale advantages. Remember wholesalers and retailers, on average, in the United States have almost twice the sales per establishment as in Canada. This allows, we believe, for some opportunities for efficiency and effectiveness in terms of operations, and the relative size of the US market and some of the players within that market allows for some economies in terms of sourcing, so the distributor of consumer electronics products can actually get a better price from the factory than the Canadian distributor can.

I may as well go through all of those.

Operating and overhead costs appear to be higher in Canada. As I said before, we did not look at income statements and balance sheets for specific companies, but through the interview process it was identified that, largely, people felt that labour costs and occupancy costs as well as taxes were higher in Canada than in the United States. Canadian regulatory costs appear to be higher, and by that we mean those regulations which cause costs related to repackaging or special packaging requirements, labelling, duties, standards, measures, all of those things, which means that the product which is sold in Canada has to be slightly different from the product that is sold in the United States.

Some Canadian retailers appear to demand greater margins, but we also have evidence that Canadian retailers on average, within certain types of products and so on, who have comparable retail formats are not charging higher margins. Then, those higher margins are partly to offset some of these additional costs. I think the point was made earlier that that does not mean they are necessarily that much more profitable. I think there is evidence that they are not that much more profitable or any more profitable.

Finally, inter and intrachannel competition is more intense in the United States. By that, we mean that between different types of retailers there is more competition, and then within each category of retailers there appears to be more competition as well.

Something that is not here but is worth noting is that we have found some structural differences, where there are extra levels in the distribution channels in Canada than there are in the United States.

Those are our findings based on this preliminary report. As I said before, we had limited time, a limited budget, and the intent here was to flush out some of the major issues. As I said also, we wanted to identify some of the further research needs. This was our first effort at identifying the research needs and I am sure some of you have additional ideas and we have some additional ideas now. So this is the first list.

We see that there is a need to understand how Canadian firms might become more competitive on a service basis rather than a price basis. What we see with cross-border shopping is a certain segment of the consumer market which is more price-sensitive or more value-oriented, if I can make those comparisons.

One of the ways to counter that would be for everybody to lower prices, which is indeed unfeasible, certainly in the short term. There may be opportunities, and there are opportunities, for Canadian retailers and also for Canadian distributors to compete based on service, finding ways to improve their service to their customers, but more information needs to be developed to find ways for them to do that.

We also think that there will be structural changes to the wholesale industry. It would be important to understand how some of the structural changes that may take place would affect the economy as a whole. In other words, how would the change to larger distributors and retailers to become more similar and competitive with the US affect the way we do business in Canada?

There will be to a certain extent some north-south realignment, I think, within distribution channels in Canada as our economies become a little more closely integrated. Some of the decisions that will drive this will not be made in Canada. They will be made by foreign manufacturers who look at ways to get prices down in Canada to become more competitive and re-evaluate whether, for example, they do have that factory-owned distribution subsidiary. As I say, many of these decisions will be made outside of Canada. There will be a need to understand on what basis those decisions are made and what might be done to influence them or that may be in the best interests of the Canadian consumer and the Canadian economy.

We also see a need to have a much better understanding of the grey market phenomenon in terms of its magnitude and its impact.

Service leakage is something not directly related to our study, but we know from work that we have done that there is a major service leakage, expenditure leakage, associated with cross-border shopping in terms of tourism and hospitality. Those things are part of a package when people go and buy goods. They may be saving enough money on buying goods to incur some additional costs in terms of services. That is a significant component of this as well.

We think there is a need to take the work that we have done to the next level of detail in terms of the cost structures at each level. That is what will start to drive, I think, some of the policy decisions that may occur provincially and federally as well when governments look for ways to help the private sector become more competitive.

It would also be important to expand the number of categories that are under examination. There has been very little work done in this area. We really do not know where the channels are similar or where they are not and why they are different.

We also think it would be important to understand the role of commercial property subsidies here. There are indications that some of the factory outlet malls and so on that are springing up are receiving certain subsidies, tax holidays and so on, specifically to take advantage of the fact that Canadians are now interested in looking at lower-priced goods in the US. That has a role in terms of the relative viability of a Canadian retailer versus the US retailer.

Of course, I think it is important to understand better the role of the regulatory costs: total taxes and packaging, labelling, standards, measures, third-country duties, etc.

Once again, Ernst and Young is very pleased to have been able to make this contribution to your deliberation on the issue. The results of our work suggest that this is a matter of total system competitiveness and we believe that all of the stakeholders, the government at all levels and the private sector, have to work together on making this entire system more competitive. We encourage people—you, yourselves and everybody I talk to on this matter—to stop pointing fingers at each other and work together toward solutions.

Thank you very much. I will take questions about this or cross-border shopping as a whole.

Mr Sutherland: Maybe this is jumping too far too quickly since you said it is a preliminary study, but if you look at the information in the graphs you presented and some of the comments you made, it would not paint a very good picture for my independent retailers in my home town. In terms of sourcing, in terms of what you are saying, larger distribution networks are trying to accommodate for the small economies of scale. Are we going to be able to deal with this problem and still offer some hope for small retailers across the province?

Mr Buchanan: I think so. I think there are some things that retailers, large and small—I know that some of them are looking at such things as direct sourcing where it is possible to lower their costs. But in reality, small and independent retailers are by and large going to have higher costs of goods than the people who buy in much larger volume. That suggests to me that these retailers need to find another way to compete, because it is more difficult to be competitive on a price basis if you start with a higher cost base. That is why we were indicating that this whole area of service-based competition, or non-price competition, is a very important one, particularly for the independent retailer.

The Chair: I am afraid that I am going to have to adjourn the meeting because we have to go to the House for a vote. But I would like to thank you for your presentation. I believe it has been very helpful to us.

This meeting is adjourned, hopefully until this afternoon at 3:30 when we will review the report of Anne Anderson and hopefully we will have the Treasurer here at 4:30. Thank you.

The committee recessed at 1157.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1645.

BUDGET PROCESS

The Chair: I see we have a quorum. Let's move on. I think we may not want to waste a minute.

HONOURABLE FLOYD LAUGHREN

The Chair: We are fortunate this afternoon to have the Treasurer of Ontario before the committee to speak to about the budget and this committee's role in the future budgetary process. Welcome, Mr Laughren.

Hon Mr Laughren: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I appreciate the invitation and the organizational skills of Todd Becker in getting us all together here.

I realize that the budget has engendered considerable interest even beyond these halls. I understand that the deficit aspect of it is the one thing that has stimulated a lot of the interest. I would hope that members would look beyond the deficit number and look into the composition of the deficit and exactly what got us to that level in terms of spending, how we got to such a high number. Because let's not try and minimize the number. It is a very large number, $9.7 billion. I do understand that.

I do not want to make a speech here today—I think members would probably rather have an exchange—but I did ask the committee, through the budget and through a letter to the Chairman, to think about ways of opening up the budget process. Before members from the third party came in and suggest that full public hearings on this budget are the only way to do that, what I really meant by that letter to the Chair and the comment in the budget document itself was that the entire budget is shrouded in secrecy and, being new at it, I was taken aback by some of the process.

It seems to me that there are other jurisdictions that are more open in the process of budget-making and involvement. We would certainly be interested in hearing the views of an all-party committee, because if we just do it in Treasury we may miss some ideas that others would have in terms of opening up the process. We will be trying to see what other jurisdictions are doing on this too. Later in May I am going to Washington for a couple of days, and one of the things I am going to be looking at is how they are opening up the process there.

Nothing has been determined. This is not some kind of issue that has been decided and we just want you to go through the motions. As a matter of fact, I see this committee as being part of that process of opening up. At least, I hope it will be. I would be very interested in hearing your views on how we can open it up, what role you can have in it and what role anybody else can have in it. That is not just an idle wish. I really hope we can do something about that, because I think we could end up with better budgets and certainly a better process.

I hasten to add that we have already established the Fair Tax Commission, which is going to be giving us advice on that aspect of considerations, but that does not pre-empt the work of this committee to make recommendations on how to open up the entire process.

I would be pleased to try and answer any questions or have a dialogue with members of the committee.

Mr Carr: One of the questions I have deals with the promises that were made during the election campaign. You may be familiar with the Agenda for People, where the costing is laid out. I understand you were even part of the process that did that. When you talked about the bottom line there, we see that you talked about a two-year cost of $2.3 billion. This was what the election was virtually run on and in fact, I guess, won on. Then when we end up with the wonderful first budget, the numbers are such that the $2.3 billion over two years, in terms of the deficit alone, works out to be about $17 billion or $18 billion.

My question is very simple: Why the discrepancy? Why did things change so much from August of last year, during an election campaign, to April of this year? The program, I might add, was fairly well costed out—education, first year, $500 million, and so on—then all of a sudden it went completely out of whack and we have this big deficit. My question very simply is: What do you say to the people of Ontario who may have voted for you for this and ended up with a $10-billion deficit?

Hon Mr Laughren: First of all, I think that being from Oakville you are a very wise person and that you would not make an assumption that the election was run or won solely on the Agenda for People. It is much more complex than that. I think you would agree it was a pretty complex mix that caused people to vote the way they did. However, this was the major platform on which the New Democrats ran in the election, so I am not backing away from that at all.

I think that you would understand, as well, from statements we have already made, that the implementation of that Agenda for People would simply not be possible given the way the economy collapsed in 1990 and still is in serious difficulty for most of 1991. I am sure you would be in a very responsible way up there giving us proper what-for if we were to implement what is in the Agenda for People, given the limited means we have this year. I think you would not want a higher deficit than $9.7 billion.

Mr Carr: No, thanks, it is high enough. But I guess what I am getting at is that the numbers in terms of revenue change a little bit. I guess when you look at it, you had projected out the $44 billion and this year we are going to be at $43 billion, so we lost a billion there, but what I am talking more specifically about is the cost of programs, and you had some very definite increases in costs here.

You have almost a billion in the education funding aspect of it, so you did try to lay them out. I guess what I am concerned about is the fact that when people look at this, that is why we get a little cynical about politicians, because during an election campaign we say something or we admit something and we do not cost it out.

In fact, very specifically in this document, I think the Premier in the attached press release talked about the fact that he wanted to not be like the Liberals. In fact he went through there and he said, "We estimate the two-year cost to be about $1.8 billion." So that is why I think the public becomes very cynical, because during an election campaign you say it is going to cost $1.8 billion and then we look at a rise in expenditures that was dramatic.

Notwithstanding that—sure, some of the social services costs went up—it does not account for the tremendous discrepancy from $1.8 billion to virtually $18 billion. That is what we will end up with in just deficit alone over a two-year period when you put them together. So people thought they were voting for some very worthwhile programs that were only going to cost $1.8 billion and then virtually within a year we get that. I think that is why I am concerned, because, as you know, our big feeling is that if the—

Hon Mr Laughren: Wait a minute. You are implying that the Agenda for People is in this deficit of $9.7—

Mr B. Ward: A point of order, Mr Chairman: Before we continue, we are on very limited time. I am hoping that we could follow what we have done in the past and have one question per person.

Mr Carr: Why do we not do it by time limit by caucus? Do you want to divide it up by three?

The Chair: That is a good idea.

Mr Carr: How much time do we have?

Mr B. Ward: We think the bells are going to ring, probably.

Mr Tilson: You can have my time.

Mr Carr: Okay.

Mr B. Ward: Just so that we allow everyone an opportunity to participate, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: You can wrap up your comment and then have the question.

Mr Carr: Do I get only one question? Because if I know how much, I might jump to a better question.

The Chair: Jump to your other question.

Mr Carr: Okay, cut off all the—Hon Mr Laughren: I am sorry, but I really did want to know whether you are implying that—

[Interruption]

The Chair: Could you close the door, please?

Mr Carr: I never get a chance to speak with you and I finally get a chance—

Hon Mr Laughren: No, I am serious. I thought you were implying that the Agenda for People that was costed out at $1 billion point something, suddenly had ballooned to $18 billion over two years because of the two-year deficit, the accumulation of the two years of deficit.

Mr Carr: No, what I was getting at is that basically what people voted for—the NDP said it was going to come in with all these programs, and essentially, when you look at this, it says it is not going to cost us all that much, $1.8 billion. And then whammo, when we get to the actual facts, that is where the cynicism comes from, the fact that one thing happens before or during an election period, and then something happens afterwards.

But since my time limit is going to be fairly short here, maybe I could jump to something else, the actual debt-servicing cost. I had the fine staff at research project out the cost of what the actual deficit would be, and our original deficit before we came in last year at $38.8 billion. We were looking at a cost of $362 million a month, $83 million a week, close to $12 million a day or almost $500,000 an hour; that is what it cost in servicing the debt last year.

With it going up dramatically, I wanted to see, in light of the fact that we are now probably going to lose our triple A credit rating and there have been some projections that we are literally looking at paying, just in debt—not paying for education or health care costs—$1 million an hour to service the debt in this province, I was just wondering what your projections are over the next period of time on the actual servicing of the debt.

Hon Mr Laughren: I actually have those numbers here. I have them only as percentages of GDP and of revenue, but you wanted absolute dollars, did you?

Mr Carr: Yes. We had broken it down on a cost-per-month basis, and that was based on servicing the $4.3 billion debt in 1990-91. So basically, if we double the debt—we are not quite going to do that—you would be looking at almost $1 million an hour just to service the debt, and that is not to pay for any of the programs. That would be $1 million an hour, 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days of the year. I just wanted to see what your calculations are. We might not hit quite the million, but I wanted to see where you were at.

Hon Mr Laughren: Also, I have not done nor asked anybody to do the breakdown in that kind of micro way. I can remember a few years ago, when I was sitting where you are, figuring out the costs of our health care system per hour, per day and so forth. When you do it that way, it does look like a very high number. This is the cost of the interest on the debt per year—

Mr Carr: You can break it down. Even if you have got a yearly basis, obviously we can do it.

Hon Mr Laughren: For 1991-92, it is $5 billion; 1992-93 is $5.7 billion; 1993-94 is $6.4 billion and 1994-95 is $7 billion. Of course, the reason that goes up is because there is a deficit each year so that the debt is higher, even though the absolute number on the deficit is going down each year. Do you follow me?

Mr Carr: Yes.

Hon Mr Laughren: The cumulative debt goes up, therefore the interest on it climbs each year as well. I have not broken it down the way you have.

Mr Carr: I take it this was based on us having a triple A credit rating and so on. So we could probably say right off the bat that once that slides, these numbers go up; whatever percentage, but they will go up.

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Carr, be very careful, because I was making that assumption too, and then I looked at what happened the last time Ontario lost its triple A credit rating, which was in 1985, following 42 years of another government.

Mr Tilson: That was during the accord.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, but the decision was made before there was much damage we could do. Anyway, at happened, and I do not know whether you can see or not—this is the Ontario 10-year yields. If you look 1985, when the credit rating was downgraded, the actual yields continued to go down. That was because interest rates were going down.

Mr Carr: Interest rates were going down and they would go down again.

Hon Mr Laughren: Do not get me wrong. I am not trying to say it was because the credit rating went down that the interest rate went down. My only point is that now interest rates are also on the way down. So it is difficult. I would be careful about making an assumption that if we lose the credit rating—I still hope we will not, but we would very well do that—and it does go down, that does not necessarily mean that the rate, the cost of our borrowing, will necessarily go up, because it did not historically. When we got the triple A credit rating back in 1988 once again, it did not seem to make a big difference.

There is no question that when you lose your credit rating you pay more than you otherwise would, but I would caution as well that I suspect—and there are others who know this aspect of the business a lot better than I—to a certain extent that has already been discounted by the bond sellers, to a certain extent it has already been anticipated that we may lose our credit rating or that the deficit is high and that it is being reflected already, perhaps.

Mr Carr: When you look at what the Agenda for People says, which would be $1.8 billion, what in fact the—

The Chair: Mr Carr, I have to cut you off there and give the Liberals their opportunity now for 13 minutes.

Mr Phillips: Oh, is it a time thing rather than a question? Okay.

The Chair: That was the suggestion.

Mr Phillips: Just on that subject, you remember the Treasury officials provided us with the numbers. They said if we go from triple A to double A it costs us $5 million per billion worth of borrowing. That is the number to go from triple A to double A.

Hon Mr Laughren: I do not think that is correct.

Mr Phillips: That is what the Treasury document said. You will find it in Hansard.

Hon Mr Laughren: I do not think that is correct, but go ahead.

Mr Phillips: Believe me, that is what the document said.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is not my recollection of the number, but go ahead, I did not mean to interrupt you.

Mr Phillips: It is $2.5 million if it drops from triple A to double A plus. If it drops to double A—

Hon Mr Laughren: I am sorry, I misunderstood you.

Mr Phillips: That is exactly what I said. That comes from the Treasury numbers. So I am just saying, if you borrow—we now guarantee Hydro's money, so I think that is in the same thing—if in fact we have got to go to the market for $10 billion and if in fact we go from triple A to double A, I do think it is going to cost us $5 million per billion, $50 million, I think. That is the Treasury number. That was not my comment.

Hon Mr Laughren: But you are also making an assumption of dropping two notches rather than one.

Mr Phillips: Yes. They are saying it drops from triple A to double A.

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay. I do not know why you are making that assumption, though.

Mr Phillips: We will see.

Just so I am clear on the numbers—and by the way, without sounding too concerned about it, I can just tell you our feedback on it and it comes in the context I think of concern about Quebec, concern about the federal situation, concern about the federal deficit. The budget cannot be viewed in isolation.

I will just tell you, I am really quite worried about it—not just the $9.7 billion. It is kind of the next five or six years. I know we will have a little sparring match and you will say things are fine, but I am personally very worried about this on top of everything else.

You know the numbers. I think there are 250,000 more people unemployed now than there were six months ago.

Hon Mr Laughren: Well, a year ago.

Mr Phillips: Right? I know these numbers.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes.

Mr Phillips: That is about 1,600 more people every day, seven days a week. The unemployment numbers come out tomorrow. I hope they are good. I would not bank on it, but I hope they are good finally.

My big concern is just who is going to create the jobs. Hopefully, if we have got time, we can get into some of the numbers in here, but just to make sure I have the right—because this is what the job creators—not the business community, the job creators—are looking at.

I believe that your consolidated deficits on page 55 are going to $7.8 billion in 1994, and I go back to page 50, where you use the 90% nominal growth in gross domestic product. I believe that just to get to the $7.8-billion deficit there are $5 billion of new taxes built into that.

So, as we look down the road, first, the very best deficit is $7.8 billion, and that assumes another $5 billion of new taxes that are not there right now. We look a little bit further down the road and it is a question I asked you in the House today—I think all your future projections are quite heroic, to use your word, in terms of the economy: In your very best look during good economic times, you are looking at 3% to 4% real growth down the road if I am not mistaken. In spite of all that, we will still be looking at a deficit of at least $5 billion if you use the same terminology you use right now.

And this is what the bond raters will look at in the next few weeks; it will not be just the $9.7 billion, it will be that the deficit goes on and on and on. Even to hit those deficit numbers, you assume, I think, $5 billion of new taxes and then when we finally get the thing balanced and operating we still have at least a $5-billion annual deficit on capital.

Honestly, the people who are looking at where they are going to invest to create jobs are asking, "Is this the place I am going to invest?" For all of us who are hoping that the unemployment numbers will turn around, you have your job creation plan in here, but I believe, Treasurer, most of it is really holding jobs except for the $700 million for two years for the creation of 18,000 jobs.

I do not mean to be overly pessimistic, but my question is: As the job creation community is looking at those numbers, can you give us any help in terms of what I can say to people who are looking to create some jobs? Why should they be here?

Hon Mr Laughren: I appreciate your comments, and I do not find much fault with what you are saying. I would make a couple of cautions. I think your interpretation of those out-year numbers in the entire fiscal plan is not unfair. I just put a caution in that scenario where you have so many new revenues, expenditures going up so much and the deficit resulting from it. That is one way of putting it together as a package. You could alter the revenues, you could alter the expenditures, and so we will see.

Those are quite conservative forecasting numbers. One of the problems that some people have had was that they are perhaps too conservative and the deficit stays too high in those years. My own sense, and I can remember agonizing over these numbers, was that I would rather put numbers in there that people might find unacceptably high but that we felt we could achieve. Now, you can snort at that, or some people could snort at that, but I want to tell you, even those numbers—

Mr Carr: These numbers?

Hon Mr Laughren: No, I am talking about these numbers.

It is aggressive in one sense in terms of potentially new revenues, but at the same time we think we can achieve those numbers and it does give us a reduction in the deficit every year after this year. So I think that is terribly important.

In terms of this year's deficit—you talked about only the anti-recession package being new and so forth; there was the employee wage protection, I think it is almost $200 million, $175 million, and some other things as well—basically, there is no question about it, this is a recession-driven deficit. It is mainly maintaining existing programs and some reallocations; I think we reallocated about $700 million and took programs out and put new ones in and so forth, to put our stamp on some things. But basically it is a maintenance budget that maintains existing programs. If you look at that $6.7-billion increase in the deficit, if you can just put your mind around what we would have had to do to get it to stay at $3 billion, it would be absolutely incredible, the cuts we would have had to make, and I think there would have been outrage across this province. Some people do not like the deficit, I understand that, but if you were to compare the outrage at the deficit with the outrage that I too would personally feel over cutting $6.7-billion worth of programs—

Mr Phillips: No one suggested that, though, did they?

Hon Mr Laughren: No, I am not saying you are suggesting that. I am saying that when we look at the deficit I hope people will look at the composition of it. That is the point I am trying to make, that it was not a wild spending spree that led to this deficit. I hope members understand that.

Mr Phillips: My question was on the investment in job creation. Remember, I was saying that for the people who are looking where they are going to create jobs, this is one jurisdiction they can do it and they can do it elsewhere in Canada. They are going to look not just at the $9 billion, because if that were a temporary blip, people would say, "We can live with that," but they will look at the five-year plan. What do we say to those people?

Hon Mr Laughren: What is in the deficit numbers that would make Ontario a bad place in which to invest? It seems to me that we have some tremendous assets here. I am not saying this as an act of boosterism or anything like that, but look how well placed we are geographically, look at our labour force, our management skills, our mix of social programs and quality of life. Those are all things that are important. Look at our health care system. It is the envy of virtually everybody south of the border. That is where you are talking about investment being directed other than here. It is still a great place to invest.

It is true that in order to pay for this deficit it is going to mean those new revenue sources will be required, if that is what you are getting at. Absolutely. I think to pretend otherwise, or not to have maintained the existing programs the way they are now, would have been a serious mistake as we head into the recovery.

It is not a vigorous recovery, as you will see by those numbers, not like 10 years ago which was a much more vigorous recovery. That is why the numbers go down slowly. Unemployment stays naggingly high, which means it is hard to get the deficit down much more dramatically than that without cutting out capital programs, for example. I do not think we want to do that. That is a signal that we are investing in Ontario as a government, and people will judge us by the kind of place it is to live and work, and I do not think we should depreciate that.

Mr Phillips: I am not. I think everybody knows—

The Chair: I am sorry, Mr Phillips, I am going to have to stop you there.

Mr Phillips: How much time have I got?

The Chair: You just ran over by 40 seconds. Mr Ward.

Mr B. Ward: I will pass to Mr Jamison.

Mr Jamison: I want to welcome you here, Treasurer. In your statements you talked clearly about trying to tackle the recession and shorten it, of course, by acting the way you have and I certainly applaud you for it. I find it rather odd that the Treasurer would be brought here to the committee to talk about the budget when 130 members of the Legislature cannot debate that in the House as we hear the bells ring. I think it is very important that we understand that very party is here today asking questions, trying to understand the budget at this committee, yet will not allow debate on the floor of the House. I find that to be confusing, to say the least, considering the democracy we try to keep in place in this House.

Having said that, I know our time is limited and we would be going back to the House shortly. I would like to pose one question, if you could explain, because it is my understanding that a number of factors on their own, with us standing still as a government, would have left us with a rather high deficit in itself. Being proactive in trying to shorten the recession, expenditures were made over and over that. I wonder if you could expand on that.

Hon Mr Laughren: I will stand to be corrected on this, but I think if we had taken no initiatives at all, just the aged pat, total maintenance of existing programs, the deficit would still have been in the neighbourhood of between $7 billion and $8 billion. Am I exaggerating? Was it about right? Somewhere in that neighbourhood anyway. If there is a more precise number, I could get it for you. That is why I was trying to emphasize the fact that it is not a spending-spree deficit.

I must say, though, that I regretted Mr Carr being cut off because of time. I really did want to hear his views. Perhaps when the budget debate continues in the House, Mr Carr, I would really be interested in hearing your views.

Mr Carr: Or if I meet you on the street, we can talk.

Hon Mr Laughren: You leave my social life out of this.

Mr B. Ward: Mr Chairman, I recognize that we have less than nine minutes to get upstairs. I would like to—

The Chair: I was speculating on terminating the questions in about three minutes.

Mr B. Ward: Because of the pace we have to utilize because of the Conservative actions to get upstairs, I move that this meeting be adjourned.

The Chair: Unfortunately, there is no debate on that. All in favour? All opposed? There are four opposed. Carried. We are adjourned until 10 o'clock Thursday next.

The committee adjourned at 1717.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 16 May 1991

The committee met at 1008 in committee room 1.

ELECTION OF VICE-CHAIR

The Chair: Good morning. We have a quorum. We begin. The first order of business is the resignation of Mr. Hansen as Vice-Chair, which precipitates an election for Vice-Chair. Are there any nominations?

Mr Hansen: I nominate Kimble Sutherland for Vice-Chair.

The Chair: Are there any other nominations? Seeing no other nominations, then congratulations, Mr Sutherland. Now, you do not get 10 minutes for a speech.

Mr Sutherland: I only said thank you.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: That is good. This morning we are here to consider the recommendations and the draft report on cross-border shopping, with specific interest in having recommendations brought forward in the text of the report. I thought that first we might want to discuss the language of the report, if there is anything the committee members feel has been left out, or put in that is not relevant. We could perhaps deal with the text of the report and then move to the specific recommendations. Is that how we want to proceed?

Mr Sutherland: Just initially looking over the report I did not see a great deal, but maybe we could still leave it as a draft—the language—and maybe spend a little more time there and maybe have some discussion about some actual recommendations.

Before we do that, can I ask one other question? In terms of normal committee procedure, in terms of writing the report, are we going to do that in camera or are we going to do that in an open format on the record?

The Chair: That is up to the committee to decide. We had the entire pre-budget consultation open to the public. I think this is something that maybe the Chair should have some guidance on from the committee. How would you like to proceed, in camera or open to the public?

Mr Hansen: Monte, did you lose your voice completely?

Mr Kwinter: I would see no reason why it should not be open.

The Chair: Are there any objections to its being open? Seeing none, then this will be open to the public. Mr Sutherland, do you want to proceed?

Mr Sutherland: I guess we should look at some recommendations. I was wondering whether maybe the two other parties had any recommendations they wanted to make specifically at this time so we can give them some consideration.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, if I could just comment, it would seem to me that most of the causes of the problem are really systemic, and unless we are going to totally restructure the province or the country, which is not practical, what we can do most of all is just comment on why it is happening.

We are not going to change the fact that there are 270 million people living south of us and we are 27 million people. We are not going to change the fact that, for a variety of reasons and because of that fact, we have this huge land mass that has to be financed and provided for by a relatively small number of people. We cannot change that.

So it would seem to me that what we should be doing is spelling out those systemic problems and pointing out why there is a discrepancy. Where we should be making recommendations is where we really can relieve the problem or help the problem, even though we will not solve the problem.

It would seem to me that one of them, the one we could do something about, is to have the provincial sales tax collected at the border. It would also seem that one of the other things we could do is to make sure that there is greater enforcement at the border as a deterrent, not to people shopping—I do not think you are going to do that—but to people smuggling, this sort of underground economy that takes place because of that. Also, we can address the problems of taxes, where we do have some control. This recent 1.7 cents per litre tax, which again is not going to solve the problem but just exacerbates the problem, just gives one more incentive for people to go over and buy gasoline.

So it seems to me that we should be addressing our recommendations to those things we can actually do something about. Again, I say it is not going to solve the problem, but it is certainly going to help maybe diminish the problem. Things like Sunday shopping—I do not think Sunday shopping is the cause of cross-border shopping, but there is no question in my mind that the availability of shopping on Sunday is just one more factor that gives people the impetus to go across the border.

So it would be my feeling that those are the things we should be addressing in our recommendations.

Mr Jamison: I believe we should be approaching the subject on a report based on the contributing factors, whether they be in our control or whether they not be in our control. Quite simply, it is a very large and complicated problem. I think most of us would agree there is not a simple solution to it. But we should be identifying where the problems are and identifying them clearly and at least making the decisions on what can be done. That certainly rests with this government and other governments, because the role is played municipally, provincially and federally and there are contributing factors in all cases. To thoroughly recognize and sort out the problem so that it is understandable, I think, is what this committee should be doing; making it understandable to someone who would read this committee's report. We should be looking at all the areas that have been brought forward.

Mr Sutherland: If I can pick up on that, we do have some recommendations, and I have copies of our recommendations here. Maybe we could have them distributed and then go over them. We will give some explanations to some of the recommendations we have given and then some comment. Then maybe we can have some more discussion and hopefully get more ideas out of that.

The Chair: For discussion, pursuant to what Mr Jamison and Mr Kwinter have just said and having read through the first draft of the report, is there any systemic analysis the committee would like to add to the report, or any sections they would like to be expanded?

Mr J. Wilson: I would just like to make a point. Perhaps it is because I am a substitution for the committee, but I would be most comfortable if we heard the NDP's recommendations and then adjourned and picked it up again this afternoon after I have had an opportunity to discuss it with my colleagues who are not here at the moment. I have agreement from Mr Kwinter on that.

So if Mr Sutherland would like to add anything briefly in terms of explanation to the recommendations that have been put forward, that would be most helpful if we could adjourn and have some time to fully read the report.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. I think Mr Kwinter's opening comments and some of his recommendations have been incorporated in the recommendations here. Certainly I want to say that we certainly feel there are no magic solutions here. There is no one thing that is going to stop the problem, but there is a combination of things we can do to help ameliorate the situation and regain some of the vibrancy in our border communities that has been lost because of the ever-growing tide.

We heard from many presenters, particularly the mayors of the municipalities, who asked for a trilevel task force on the issue of cross-border shopping. That is our first recommendation: that the province participate in that in terms of working together with the other levels of government and with those interested parties in communities to try to get a better handle on the situation and what all the causes are.

Beyond that, we had several different ministries here to make comment on how their ministry is monitoring the situation, what the impact is and some of the organizations that are under their jurisdiction. We believe we do not have all the data we need on this issue, and I think that was the consensus from many different groups that presented. We believe the individual ministries should be continuing to gather more data and work with some of the local organizations. MITT has been working with Shop Ontario and other organizations like that, to have them come forward.

They are just a couple of the initial, general recommendations.

One or two are under federal policies. We are certainly of the belief that the federal government has a great deal of responsibility in this issue. Their high interest rate policy, the perception created by the free trade agreement and the implementation of the GST have all accelerated the cross-border shopping problem.

It is very evident by the statistics of where the increases started: first in 1987, after the agreement was first negotiated and the perception that prices were going to be cheaper, and then after the agreement was actually implemented and gone into place. We have seen a significant increase there. We have seen a significant increase again since 1 January with the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax, and even the statistics that were passed around this morning, the March statistics, indicate that while there is a little decline in the increase from February, it is still a substantial increase over March of last year.

At the same time, if we listen to the comments from the federal government and particularly the federal Minister of Revenue, he has been kind of tossing his hands up in the air and saying, "It is not our problem and there is not a great deal we can do."

The two key recommendations—and we have certainly heard these before, but they do play a large role—is that the interest rate differential with the United States be reduced to more traditional levels. We have seen some decline in the federal interest rates, but we have not seen the corresponding decline in the dollar. I think that is attributable to the fact that the United States recently had a cut in its interest rates, so the differential is still high.

That is making it difficult for the second recommendation to come through, for the dollar to be allowed to decline to a more realistic level. As to what that level actually should be, we have heard many different recommendations when the different groups were here for the pre-budget consultations. I believe the Royal Bank used a figure of 81-82 cents, and a few other organizations used that as a more realistic level for the Canadian dollar right now. There is no doubt that a decline in the dollar will have an impact in terms of what the differences are in the prices once the exchange is taken into account.

In the other area, and this is again picking up on what Mr Kwinter was saying earlier about border controls, many presenters have said that they wanted stricter border controls and that the collection of the provincial sales tax would certainly have an impact. So our number one recommendation is that the federal government collect the provincial sales tax at all border crossings and that the necessary negotiations between the provincial Ministry of Revenue and the federal Department of National Revenue occur to allow that to happen.

The federal government has said it is not willing to do that on certain occasions. Our provincial minister is in Ottawa again today, meeting with the federal minister to request that they collect the PST. We certainly hope they are going to be more willing to listen. We heard a couple of comments from the federal minister last week that indicated there might be a little softening on the position, but still no definite statements.

Our second recommendation ties in to that: that if, for whatever reasons, they feel they are not willing to collect the provincial sales tax at the border, then the Ontario revenue officials be permitted to review custom forms, imilar to the article that we received from John Wintering about what goes on in New York, Pennsylvania and California.

I found it rather ironic, Mr Chair. At this time I just want to note that the congressman from Buffalo was concerned that the federal government might collect the PST at the border; he thought that would be a violation of the free trade agreement. I would be interested in understanding how the state of New York is able, then, to review the federal customs forms and collect PST that way and that it not be a violation of the free trade agreement in the same way. So I think there are some options there for collection of the provincial sales tax.

Recommendation 3: We had some information presented to us about the PACE pilot project out in BC, which is more or less the fast-track lane for Canadian shoppers returning. I think we got a general consensus from the organizations before us that they did not think that was acceptable, but that the other problem is, because of the long, long lineups at the borders due to so many Canadian shoppers going across, that it is really discouraging American tourists from coming in.

We feel that if fast-track lanes are going to be established, it should be solely for American tourists coming in. When you look at it, the Americans are just implementing the auto pass system at one of the borders, I believe it is the Niagara Falls one. I see no reason why we, in the federal government, could not implement a similar thing in turn, an auto pass for Americans coming through, to speed them through, because the double impact of this cross-border shopping was brought forward to us by the presenters in terms of the fact that it is not only Canadians going over there, but Americans are not coming here. That is having a double impact on retailers in the communities at the border area, particularly on the area of tourism, which I know many people are concerned about. I know Mr Wilson is extremely concerned as the Tory critic for that area.

Recommendation 4: More customs staff should now be hired for greater enforcement. We heard presentations on the fact that part of the problem is because customs officials let people go through. They do not have enough staff to check on a more consistent basis, to be a little more stringent in terms of enforcement. We heard a couple of recommendations for more customs staff, and we would certainly concur with that recommendation.

We also had some discussion about the government working with the border states to collect provincial sales tax on those items that are state-exempt products coming into Ontario. We heard the Minister of Revenue indicate that we did have a deal with one of the states—I believe that was Ohio—but that they are still working and negotiating with some of the other states. We would certainly encourage that process to continue.

Moving into an area in terms of what we can do: retailing and marketing. I think there is some disagreement. We heard some presenters who said our retailers can match any other retailers anywhere in North America. We also heard some other comments that our retailers needed to be a little more aggressive in what they are doing, responding in kind to some of the tactics that those stores, malls and merchandisers across the border are doing to attract Canadian shoppers. We want to recommend that Ontario retailers be more aggressive in their marketing, through use of such techniques as the discount card, which we saw we had for Canadians. I think they should maybe try something like that for Americans to come back over.

More selective advertising in terms of advertising those things that are competitive: We have had evidence here that there are many areas in foodstuffs and all kinds of other products and merchandise that we are competitive in, and that we need to have more selective advertising promoting those things.

Then the last one, putting American prices in ads: We do not really have any hard data on what the impact is, but we heard information—I do not want to get this wrong, but I believe it was Goodyear or Goodrich, one of those two, down in St Catharines. When they put their ads in the paper for selling their product, they put in their price and they put in the American price, so people clearly know how competitive they are. We think those things should continue.

Recommendation 2 is to try to deal with the issue of what we heard from many of the surveys. The ones conducted by John Winter and the other ones in the communities indicated that two of the main products that are attracting people across the border are gasoline and milk. What we are hoping for here is that the parties would come together, the milk marketing board, the grocery distributors, grocery stores, local retailers, gas companies and their dealers, and engage in a joint marketing strategy, possibly involving coupons in exchange for milk and gasoline. For example—this is following up on a marketing technique that other companies use right now—if you went into a gas station and you bought $20 worth of gas, you would get a coupon off for milk in the local store. When you go into the local grocery store and buy so much, a purchase of milk plus a certain dollar value, you would get a coupon off on your gasoline purchase in the area. I also think there is a great deal of room for other retailers to get involved with that, if people were willing to set a level—you buy this much product in my store, you get the coupons on the milk and gasoline.

There is potential for the other areas where marketing boards are involved to participate with this. There is some indication that the Ministry of Agriculture and Food would be willing to facilitate this type of discussion to get that type of program off the ground, so there is one idea.

Recommendation 3: Again, there were differences of opinion on how good service is, staff training, those types of things. The John Winters survey indicated that is also a factor, and while not the most important, it is a factor: People feel they are getting friendlier service and the staff are better trained and have better product knowledge in the United States. We heard from the shoe retailers, who have a very comprehensive program on this, but certainly the evidence before us indicates that not everyone is doing a significant job in staff training and product knowledge, and in the service.

Moving on to sourcing and distribution: We had the presentation from Ernst and Young, and they certainly identified what the patterns are in three areas, but even when they were here, they agreed that this could not be seen as a comprehensive analysis of how all wholesaling and distribution works. It seems to be the consensus that we need some more analysis on that issue. We know there are certain inherent factors, like some of the ones Mr Kwinter mentioned, economies of scale and that. But there still seems to be more information needed, and maybe there are some new areas that could be explored in terms of reducing some of the extra clauses that seem to be apparent there.

At the same time, we want to recommend that this committee not support increased foreign sourcing for products that are manufactured in Canada. We do not feel that, in the long run, is going to help us. We had some recommendations that we should go that way. I believe even Mr Winter was suggesting that to retailers. But the simple reality—and I think this ties in nicely in bringing the issue of cross-border shopping home to everyone, everywhere in the province—is that if that occurs, then we are going to see plant closures in other areas. The retailers may be a bit better off, but the plant closures in other areas are not going to help any other community, so we want to emphasize that, while alternative forms of sourcing should be examined, we are very concerned if it is going to be foreign sources.

The issue of taxation certainly came up. We heard lots of recommendations and we heard some very simplistic analysis that simply lowering taxes is going to solve the problem. We heard other issues related to taxation, and I think we would agree that there are some valid concerns. I think the party and the government agree with that, and that is one of the reasons we have the Fair Tax Commission to examine some of those issues, particularly in terms of examining the question of property taxes.

Our first recommendation is that the Fair Tax Commission be encouraged to speed up its examination of the property tax base to fund municipal services. Obviously, if we look at some of the comparisons, we note that municipal taxes are significantly higher in Canadian communities versus American. We had one study that indicated, I believe, Fort Frances/International Falls. We certainly believe we have a responsibility to look at that issue and to see whether there are ways that can be dealt with.

That kind of ties into recommendation 2, that the provincial government continue discussions with the municipalities over issues of responsibility and funding of services. Then coming out of that are some of the recommendations that were put in the Hopcroft report, the report from the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, dealing with certain issues about who should fund what programs. Some of the discussions out of that and the resulting decisions certainly may have an impact in terms of municipal taxes and in terms of having an impact on the base retail price, because it certainly seems that in the marketing that the American retailers are working off of the retail base price, and strictly the price, not necessarily the quality or standard of product. So the outcome of some of those discussions may have some impact on the municipalities.

Our third recommendation, and this recommendation has come forward before and is a very difficult one, is that a trilevel task force be established to examine the issue of duplication of services, division of responsibilities with the purpose of making all levels of government more efficient. There certainly is a perception out there that there is a lot of duplication of services, both between the feds and the provinces, and also between the provinces and the municipalities.

If some clear task force could be established to examine this issue, to find out where the areas of duplication of services are and then have some decisions made on who is going to look after those areas, then maybe the overall cost of government could be somewhat reduced. The viability of that last recommendation depends, because you have to have a willingness on the part of the parties and that may tie with the first one just in terms of the task force in cross-border shopping.

The final issue, and I think one of the most important issues, is the question of education. Clearly, while people are going over for cheaper prices, it seems evident they do not realize what the impact of cross-border shopping is on their local communities, on the province as a whole. To cite a personal example here, I was speaking to a group of high school students in my riding last Friday. We got into the issue of cross-border shopping and I asked them how many had participated and played a minor athletic sport, whether baseball, hockey, soccer, whatever, and 75% of them put up their hands. Then I asked them how many of them had a local retailer pay for their uniforms and just about all of that 75% put up their hands again. That type of message needs to be brought home to people.

In my community, as well, we have several fund-raising campaigns. We just got over a successful fund-raising campaign for the local hospital that many retailers gave a lot for. They have a community complex development going on that the local businesses and people are supporting a great deal. The issue has to get home that in some ways the cost are definitely higher here, but we have a much better quality of life. We have to get that message out to people that you cannot necessarily have it both ways. If you want to have the benefits and enjoy them, then there is a certain price that has to be paid for that.

So our recommendation is that the government of Ontario engage in a comprehensive education campaign to demonstrate the impact of cross-border shopping and the benefits of shopping in Ontario. This campaign should be conducted in conjunction with business and labour education campaigns of their own members similar to what the Ontario Teachers' Federation has done.

Just to add to that, our feeling is that you could tell the individual labour groups, the individual business groups and the other groups, "Okay, go ahead and do your campaign," such as the OTF did. I certainly want to congratulate them for taking such an initiative, but the fact is they have to be tied in, they have to be co-ordinated and if they are not going on at the same time, then they are going to have less of an impact overall.

For example, if someone is a member of the Ontario Teachers' Federation and their husband works in a Canadian Auto Workers plant and they both get it at the same rate at their place of work and then they also get it in terms of the advertising they see in their local papers and on TV, the message is going to start to come home about the impact it is and what the benefits are of being in Ontario.

I know there were some comments made to the effect that you might have a negative backlash in terms of making people more aware of the problem, but I think we feel that if the campaign is done effectively and tries to retain a sensitive focus, there will certainly be benefits from the education.

Those are basically the recommendations we are putting forward. As I said at the beginning, I do not think anyone should see any of these ideas as being the magic solution to the problem. I think we all agree that it is a very complex problem in that we are not going to be able to solve this thing overnight or with one easy approach, but I think a combination of these things will be effective. We have tried to deal with the issue in terms of some short-term ideas, some longer-term ideas, looking in terms of who is responsible. I think it is important to say that everyone is responsible. Certainly the federal government has a great deal of responsibility, the province has a responsibility, municipalities and, ultimately, everyone in the province of Ontario. I will leave it at that for now.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to make a couple of comments. One of the problems is that it is all well and good to state some of these things, but they are not terribly practical. We talked about the federal policies. The favourite thing—and we all do it, myself included—is to try to blame the federal government because of their high interest rates and the high value of the Canadian dollar, as if the government has decided that no matter what happens, that what is going to happen. They have decided, on the one hand; and the other leads from that: they are keeping the interest rates high and the reason—I do not agree with them—is they feel that the number one problem facing our economy is inflation.

The interest rates are kept high to dampen inflation, and then they wipe out any advantages of that by bringing in the GST and doing some of these other things. But what is happening is that, unless you have an interest rate that is sufficiently high to attract capital—we have a problem in this country because we have a shortage of capital—you have another problem. So they have made a decision, and as I say, I do not agree with it. I think we could tolerate a little bit more inflation and get the economy going, but the point I am trying to make is that they have made a decision that the interest rate should be at a level that will attract capital and keep inflation under control.

The dollar is not in the hands of the government; that is in the hands of the market. The only way the government can, in any way, affect the value of the dollar is to buy dollars on the market to keep it up or sell them to lower it, and that has problems. But what we have is a five-point differential between the Canadian dollar and the American dollar. Even if the interest rates are coming down, they are coming down in the States as well, and that differential is still there. Why would people who have overnight money anywhere in the world put it in the United States, where they are getting 7% or 8%, when they can bring it here and get 11% or 12%? So they bring it here because they earn that additional interest, and by bringing it here, they have to buy Canadian dollars, which keeps the value of the Canadian dollar up.

There is no question that if the value went down, there would be some benefits. There would be benefits to our exporters, but there would be negative impacts on our importers. For everything that you sell cheaper, it means, if you buy it outside the country, it is going to cost you more money. Because we are so heavily dependent and our trade balance is just about balanced—we have slight surplus, but we buy an incredible amount of goods, which means we are going to pay more for it, which again is going to drive up the cost of inflation.

So, it is a very nice thing to do. I admit, I do it because it is a nice target to do it, to condemn the government for their high interest rates and the high dollar. Notwithstanding what you may think, not everybody is stupid. If it were a simple solution, believe me, a government that is as low as they are in the polls would do it, but there are problems. As I say, politically it makes good sense to attack it, but economically, there are many, many problems. My concern is that it makes good political sense to bash them, but it is not a practical solution because if you do what you say you want to do, you create as many problems as you solve. You just transfer them from one side of the ledger sheet over to the other, and that is a problem I have.

When you talk about sourcing and distribution, that the committee does not support increased foreign sourcing for products that, I assume it says, could be manufactured, that gets to the heart of what has become the great buzzword and that is competitiveness. If you are going to have an artificially controlled economy, you are doomed to failure. If you cannot get competitive, you are not going to last. I have told this story so many times that it is getting—

The Chair: You are getting hoarse.

Mr Kwinter: No, it is getting kind of boring. But the whole de Havilland issue is centred right on that statement. Boeing is the largest aircraft company in the world, it is the most profitable, and if it could make money building airplanes in Toronto, believe me, it would be making money. Why would they sell it? The problem is that they build five airplanes a month and lose $1 million on every airplane they build. If they went to build six, they found they would be losing even more money. If they were building this airplane in the United States, they could build three a month and make money, and as a result, they are not going to build them here. They are getting rid of the company.

The new consortium, Alenia of Italy and Aérospatiale of France, is saying: "We're going to buy it, but we're sure not going to buy it on the same basis that it's operating now, because why should we lose money when Boeing has been losing money? We will buy it on the condition that we can make it competitive." In order to make it competitive, it means they have to put in some dramatic changes—cut the workforce almost in half and outsource a lot of the materials.

That is just another example of the problem we have. You cannot artificially protect an industry in a global economy. You cannot do it with marketing boards and you cannot do it with companies, because if you do, you save some jobs, but in the long run it is doomed to failure. It cannot possibly survive, because of your intraglobal economy. You have GATT, you have the free trade agreement and again, politically you can bash it all you want, but you are not going to change it because that is what is happening. We have turned into a global economy.

You cannot suddenly put out a recommendation that we do not support foreign sourcing. If you are in business, you buy the cheapest place you can get it. If you are a consumer, you buy the cheapest product at the quality you want. You can do all the ads you want, but the people in any society feel they are paying their taxes, they are paying their share. The answer is if this Fair Tax Commission can ever do anything about it, but right now we are paying more taxes per capita in Ontario than our counterparts in the United States, so how do you expect to sell to an Ontario consumer the idea that he is paying more tax, but on top of that we have another hidden tax and he must pay more for the product because, if he does not, we are going to be in trouble? They are saying: "I'm paying more tax than my neighbour. At least give me the chance to try to relieve some of that financial hardship by letting me buy something as cheaply as I can. If you can supply it to me cheaply in Ontario, of course I'll buy it here. But if you can't, how dare you tell me I can't go and buy where I can buy it the cheapest."

As I say, it sounds great in an advertisement, but you do a true test and ask somebody, "If you can save 50% on your gas, are you going to pay that extra premium just to say that you bought it in Ontario?" You may get the odd person who feels strongly enough about it, but most of them will not do it, and the reason is they say, "I am paying more than my share." They are really upset by the taxes, which is the problem we have.

That is the problem. I do not want to feel that there is no solution, but I think that we issue a report that has a lot of platitudes in it and says we should do this and that, it is not going to be very practical and we would do this committee a disservice. I think we have to take a realistic look at it. There is no question that we have a campaign—it may help—but to suggest that it is a solution is, I think, a little naïve.

Mr Sutherland: If I may respond, as I said both at the beginning and the end of my comments, no one recommendation here is going to be the magical solution, and education is certainly only part of it.

In terms of your comments about our recommendations on federal policies and about interest rates and the dollar and the buying of the dollar, we certainly heard your comments that you made during the presentations. If not here, we certainly heard them in the pre-budget consultations in terms of some of the explanations on interest rates. I think the feeling of many presenters, both in the pre-budget consultations and some of them here, is that, sure, the federal government wants to keep inflation under control. The question is to what extent do you do that and what degree of flexibility do you have there?

For example—these are only hypothetical numbers—does a 13% interest rate mean that you have a 90% impact, whatever the 90% is, versus a 15% interest rate is 100% impact? I am sorry. I cannot put this in proper economic terms, but I think you get a sense in terms of where the flexibility is and at what point do you go too far. I think there is a general feeling that the federal government's policy has gone a bit too far, in terms of its impact on the economy and slowing it down, and that there is some flexibility there in terms of easing off a little bit on interest rates, still having a control factor on inflation but without totally stagnating the economy.

I think it is important to reinforce that type of recommendation, that there is some flexibility. It does not have to be totally letting the bottom fall out of the Canadian dollar. As I said in my remarks, if I remember correctly, even an organization as well respected as the Royal Bank suggested that the dollar should be four to five cents lower than it is now. At least, they did that in the pre-budget consultations.

While the points you have made on that issue, on how circumstances work, are quite accurate, there is still some consensus out there that there is room for the federal government to move and that this will have an impact. I think that needs to be reiterated. That is why we have made that recommendation.

In terms of your comments on the foreign sourcing, there is no doubt that the issue of competitiveness, restructuring, that is all going on. Those issues have to be dealt with in terms of us producing products in the province of Ontario in terms of being competitive in the outside world. They have got to be addressed, and that is far broader than what we are here to deal with in terms of cross-border shopping. It is a very, very crucial issue.

At the same time, though, you mentioned questions of quality products. We have certainly seen some evidence that we do make quality products in this province and that part of the attraction of going across the border again is that a lot of second-rate products are being discounted there in the border communities and that type of thing. That is an education campaign in and of itself to ensure that people are actually getting the exact same quality of product across the border at what they think is a far cheaper price. I think Mr Hansen on several occasions noted specific examples on that issue.

As I say, in terms of dealing with the issue of competitiveness, that has to be dealt with, but I do not think people should see that somehow we are going to keep this province vibrant and have some sustainable prosperity by solely going outside the province and the country to solve their cross-border shopping difficulties.

Mrs Sullivan: I am quite interested in the report that the government members of the committee have put before us. I think it does not go far enough to address many of the issues that have been put before us. I see its major limitation in that it does not take into account the players in this issue. I want to go back to discuss this a little further.

I think Mr Kwinter is more than correct when he indicates that in fact the cross-border shopping issue is a symptom of competitiveness problems in Ontario. It is symptomatic of problems that are occurring in virtually every sector. It is highly visible, and one of the reasons it is visible is that it reaches into so many homes and so many neighbourhoods. Whether we like it or not, the issues relating to the cross-border shopping are price—perceived or real differences in price—product choice and service opportunities. There are triggers that we know about, that we have heard about and that everybody has mentioned, including cigarettes, liquor and beer, gasoline and dairy products.

The players in this are not limited to one area. At the government level, it is federal, provincial and municipal who have to contribute in some way to reaching solutions, or at least putting forward ideas for solutions. Then, of course, in business, it is manufacturers, distributors and retailers who are involved. If we want to talk about business issues, there are all sorts of aspects of that that we can talk about. We can talk about labour productivity, tax levels, input costs, market size and so on, but I do not believe that is what this committee should be addressing. This committee should be looking at recommendations specific to the provincial sector and where the province can fit into a definition of coming to terms with the reality of an issue that is facing many communities across the province.

In fact, what this report does is really only address one place where the province itself, through its own actions, can contribute in any way to a solution, and that proposal is that we go to a meeting with the feds. You go through all of your recommendations and you will discover that is the only proposal for provincial action.

I am saying it is not adequate, and there are all sorts of areas where this committee could indeed make recommendations that would affect some of the issues that are the rationale for the cross-border shopping problem. The price issue—why not make a recommendation saying that all of the new provincial taxes brought in on the last budget be rescinded? Why not talk about creative tax rebate programs for border communities? Why not talk about graduated gas tax? Why not talk about Sunday shopping? Why not talk about the issues that matter, in terms of provincial participation and involvement in coming to terms with decision-making? You have not addressed these issues in this report and I cannot see where you are doing anything other than asking other people to deal with these issues.

On the agricultural questions; on the milk prices and dairy product prices, which we know are a clear component of the problem, very strong recommendations have been put before the committee. They have also been said elsewhere, that Ontario, through the Minister of Agriculture and Food, and through the Premier, who is also Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, must be standing very firm at the table and demanding more quotas for Ontario producers. There is nothing here about that. We really have to be talking in a more direct and rational way about what the place of Ontario is in all of this, and not just say, "Well, yes, we should participate in a trilevel meeting."

Mr J. Wilson: I, too, want to comment on the NDP's recommendations, in particular your second section which deals with federal policies, and to pick up what Mr Kwinter said and Mr Sutherland's response at that time. Mr Sutherland, the problem still remains that you are speaking as if the federal government can peg interest rates in some magic way at will. I think what you fail to address in this report is also what Mrs Sullivan said, that you fail to mention the provincial government's role in interest rates.

The biggest borrowers and the biggest criminals in Canada, when it comes to us having to sustain high interest rates, are the provincial governments and the federal government. Your party's plan to borrow another $35 billion-plus over the next three to four years will continue to put enormous pressure in capital markets. In order to fill the void that you will leave in the capital markets, which is that you are sucking out another $35 billion to go into this operation of the government, that money has to be attracted back to Canada. Interest rates, therefore, are high to attract the money back into our country to fill the void, back into the international capital markets.

The problem the federal government really fails to admit is that any degree of control it might have is taken away every time a provincial government sucks more money out of the markets, because interest rates have to go up to attract the capital back so that other people can have money to borrow. Much of that new capital then is foreign. The Japanese and the Germans—in particular, a lot of it was West Germany's money. When unification came along they took a lot of their money back to put it into eastern Germany, hence world interest rates went up. Canada was severely affected by that. But the foreign lenders want 11%, 12%, 13% or they will put their money elsewhere and there will not be money in Canada for business or for government to borrow.

As simply as I can possibly put it, your government fails either to see that or to understand even the simplest of economic arguments. To be really intellectually honest in your recommendations, echoing what Mrs Sullivan said, you really should talk about that. You should talk about the disservice you are doing to all of Canada through your massive borrowing and you should come to grips in your party with the reality of economics. We just fail to see that in this report or any comments that are made in the House.

Second—and I am sure your minister will get an earful meeting with the federal revenue minister today in the sense of the federal government's position—I notice there is a line in the report that talks about harmonization of the GST and the provincial sales tax, but your recommendations fail to address the fact that they want harmonization and that the best way to collect both taxes efficiently, without having two sets of auditors, two sets of collectors and two sets of forms is to have the Ontario government roll into the GST. It is here. You are not going to change it, as Mr Kwinter says, by playing politics with it. The most efficient thing you can do for small business people and individuals in Ontario, and to help fight the cross-border shopping problem, is to harmonize systems and you should be talking about that in your border patrol section.

As I say, you need a whole section on provincial policies. This thing is great political pap, but it does not even begin to touch the problem. I think Mrs Sullivan hit it exactly right. The comment first came to mind when I read your recommendations, that you are setting up another task force and you are agreeing to meet with other levels of government. That is great, but the problem is extremely serious right now. You are the government. You have obligations you have failed to address to date. We will be presenting a minority report with this because we just have too many problems with it. I could not begin to address them all right now. Perhaps my colleague Mr Sterling would say a few words.

Mr Sutherland: If I could respond to several of the comments made, particularly Mrs Sullivan's comment that there is only one recommendation in here that involves the province and that is solely to get us to a meeting. I want to remind the members of both opposition parties that the Premier has said he is willing to participate in a task force. The federal government will not even commit to that, or it took a long time to commit to wanting to be a member of a task force to really deal with these problems.

The comments coming from the federal Minister of National Revenue have basically been, "It's not our problem." There is no question that it is everyone's problem. It is the problem of the provincial, the federal and the municipal governments, as Mrs Sullivan has said, and that needs to be looked at and it needs everyone at the table to work on that.

We have also put recommendations in here in terms of negotiations with the municipalities. If we want to get into the issue of why there are a lot of added costs and the question of taxation and tie this into the question of deficit, let's look at two areas, the issue that occurred under the previous administration, a great deal of downloading on to municipalities, and a greater burden on the municipal tax base. That was done and it was not done without a lot of discussion or negotiation with those municipalities.

At the same time, you have the federal government here practically trying to rewrite Confederation through its arbitrary and unilateral action in terms of capping transfer payments, in terms of capping some of its transfers in the other areas, particularly the Canada assistance plan. The federal government has done that from a rather arbitrary and unilateral—it did not sit down and negotiate a new arrangement with the provinces to do that.

Basically, what the federal government has done in two senses is the following: it is attempting to rewrite how our framework operates and it is also putting the burden on to the provinces. Quite simply, they are passing the burden on to the provinces. There is still a need to provide levels of service out there. So Mr Wilson can say how the provincial budget is going to add to high interest rates because we are going to have to borrow more, but the end result is the fact that that was through arbitrary action of the federal government.

We are not saying we are going to be arbitrary; we want to be there at the table participating, working towards co-operative solutions. We have not seemed to see the federal government wanting to do that. In terms of some of the comments the member for Halton Centre made about negotiating more quota, we are certainly willing to give that serious consideration as a recommendation. We have not seen any formal written recommendations come to the table from the other two parties. We do not believe that we have all the answers and that we covered everything there. I think those issues need to be addressed.

In terms of Mr Wilson's comments about harmonizing the GST, again, here is a rather arbitrary area, where the federal government has moved into an area that has traditionally been an area of provincial jurisdiction in terms of many areas of sales tax it has moved in there and brought in the GST. He talks about impact on small businesses, not only in terms of the GST—just the fact that it is there—but in terms of how the GST was established in such a complex fashion that in one case six doughnuts are taxable and the others are not. It could have been implemented far, far more simply in terms of just, you know, in a variety store 85% of what you sell is GST and you remit your GST on that basis; far, far easier for small businesses, rather than all this money they have had to spend redoing cash registers, retraining staff, trying to figure it out, repricing, all the associated costs that are there.

In terms of how we are going to finance services, and some of the comments that have been made here in terms of saying we are running up this large deficit, the federal government has decided to do that unilaterally and arbitrarily. What the Premier has been saying, and what we are saying here again and in one of the recommendations, is that that issue needs to be set down, it needs to be discussed between all levels of government, and it needs to be negotiated.

So I do not think we are absconding our responsibility. In these recommendations, we point out what other people have said and reflected what they said. The federal government has a great deal of responsibility. We as a province have the responsibility in the provincial government, and we want to be there participating, but we are not going to do this in an arbitrary fashion. There are already occasions in the House where you accused us of not consulting with people, and you cannot have it both ways. You say at one time we are not consulting; when we suggest we do consult then you are criticizing us on that basis as well.

Ms M. Ward: I just want to make a couple of comments in response to Mr Wilson's comments. The clerk gave us last week a paper on possible effects of the Ontario deficit on interest rates and the value of the dollar, and you mentioned you were a substitute. I am sure the clerk could provide you with that. I just might review some of the comments in there since that seemed to be the main point of your comments.

The consensus seems to be that the impact of the deflation on interest rates and the value of the dollar will be minimal. George Vasic of DRI Canada suggests that the Ontario deficit is a relatively small addition to the national deficit. The impact on interest rates should be negligible; this is a quote from Mr McCracken, or the clerk's—what has given us as his response, as he points out that the Bank of Canada reduced the interest rates shortly after the Budget.

Peter Spiro, head of economic forecasting at Ontario Hydro, agreed that the size of the deficit should have little effect on interest rates.

Mr J. Wilson: I just have a comment on that. You have not actually borrowed the money yet. That is why there is no effect on the market yet.

Ms M. Ward: Oh, no. This is predictions.

Mr J. Wilson: You have announced it. Check your credit rating warnings and I think you will see the jitters of the market.

Ms M. Ward: I think you should wait until your turn to respond. Anyway, I was suggesting that this is available to you from the clerk. Impact on interest rates should be negligible; I told you that. The perception of foreign bondholders could be important. While they do not normally pay attention to Canada, they are likely to do so. At any time, the clerk could find no one who was saying that the deficit was going to have an effect on interest rates.

The other thing I wanted to comment on was Mr Kwinter's comments earlier about the federal policies. I think I would agree with pretty well everything you said, Mr Kwinter. We do not think we can do much about that, however, but I think we have to continue to point out the problem. I got the impression that you would agree inflation is not the big bogymen. I think a lot of organizations that appeared before us when we were doing the pre-budget consultations had the same impression, and it is what I have read in a lot of articles; also that the federal government has gone too far in supposedly fighting inflation, and that has pushed us into the recession that we are in now. I do not disagree with you, but I think you would agree, and you might comment on this, that they have simply gone too far. You did make the comment, I think, that you did not agree with the policy. I think that is why it is important for us to point this out, the effect that the high interest rates are having. We are not denying those relationships that you are pointing out there.

The other thing I want to say is that I do not think this is Ontario's problem alone. It is a problem all across Canada. That does not mean that Ontario should not try to do what it can about it, but the cross-border shopping problem is a problem in New Brunswick, it is a problem in British Columbia, it is a problem all across Canada. The federal government has a responsibility to do something about it so.

The other thing about the foreign sourcing that was discussed—again, I think the cross-border shopping is just part of a much larger problem of foreign ownership of Canada, of not being able to buy Canadian products. It is a specific part of it. When I go out to shop, that is something that bothers me a great deal, and I know other people who feel the same way. Not enough people feel the same way, that we should be buying Canadian products. So the cross-border shopping thing is part of a much larger problem of lack of Canadian-owned industry.

Mrs Sullivan: Could you expand on that? I do not understand your reasoning here.

Ms M. Ward: On the Canadian ownership?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

Ms M. Ward: Basically I am, I guess, an economic nationalist. This is really a federal issue, I suppose. We used to have the FIRA, Foreign Investment Review Agency. We now have Investment Canada. FIRA was always rather toothless during its whole life. Just before it was killed, one of the last things it reviewed was the takeover by a California company of an Ontario or Canadian nursing home chain and that was allowed to proceed. But FIRA did do some investigation, some review, and it did disallow a few things. Since Investment Canada came into being, apparently it has never denied a takeover.

Takeovers do not contribute any economic benefit. If someone has money to invest, we could gain from them setting up a new business, a new service, but takeovers do not accomplish anything. You probably recall back in the early 1980s when the name of the game was "who is buying who." That drove up interest rates in the early 1980s and we had a recession then.

It is the ability to go out and purchase Canadian-made products, Canadian services and buy those from a Canadian firm—and you asked me to link those two with the foreign sourcing. There you could be talking not simply about Canadian-made products but, rather than importing something into Canada, getting it from a distributor in the United States. I think that is what you are talking about there.

But the link between cross-border shopping and Canadian nationalism, to me, all belongs in the same state of mind, you might say. Someone who is not going across the border shopping or has a preference for buying in Canada in terms of buying from a Canadian retailer is also going to want, wherever possible, to be able to buy Canadian products and use Canadian services.

Did you want to respond, Mrs Sullivan?

The Chair: She has her name down in order. Mr Sterling is next.

Mr Sterling: I am sorry that I have not been able to be here more frequently on this issue, but I have heard some of the evidence and read some of the material.

First of all, I want to congratulate the NDP caucus in their recommendations. It is the first document I have seen that has not blamed the free trade agreement for all the ills of the province of Ontario and I think it is an acknowledgement by the NDP caucus that the free trade agreement has nothing to do with the present malaise that we have in our economy. I want to thank them for that.

The part I find disheartening about all of the recommendations is that they do not recognize the problem that is just so glaring throughout these hearings and, quite frankly, the hearings that we are having next door, the Progressive Conservative caucus task force on the budget. We do not compete in this province with anybody else in the world, let alone New York state and Michigan. Competition, competitiveness, is the problem we are facing with the cross-border shopping issue and with every other problem we have with our economy.

If you listen to the pleas of the people who are involved in the business community, they are genuinely frightened about the flight of capital, the flight of business from this province. These are people who have never before been involved in the political movement. These are not Tories; these are not Liberals; these are not NDP people. Some of them voted for all three parties in the last election. They are people who are absolutely frightened of what is occurring in this province, and they are saying to that committee that the problem is the spending of governments; not only the NDP government but the former Liberal government and our federal Tory government. They are saying that all governments are spending too much money, they are asking for too much in taxes and we in this province can no longer compete any more with other people.

Having said that and listening to that, I think this committee was one of the most frightening committees I have sat on in terms of the information that was brought it by other people, because it made me realize how far out of whack our system has got in comparison with our neighbouring communities. The other part that is coming forward so succinctly in terms of our business community and the people who are talking about our recession problem, the people who are talking about our monetary policies, our fiscal policies, etc etc, is that we have no choice. We have very few, limited options to deal with this problem at all, and the biggest negative that the people are talking to us about is the fact that we are foisting this off on our kids in the future. That is their general concern.

In looking then at all of what this report does, and forming a task force: well, big deal. Every politician, every cabinet minister, you know, when you have not got anything else to do, form a task force to look at the problem. That is fine and dandy and I think it is a positive step to form task forces and to talk about problems and that kind of thing, but perhaps the most important thing that the NDP members of this committee might do is step out on the limb just a little bit and say to their government, "Look, you should really consider doing something. Take one little step to make us more competitive in this province. Why don't you combine the GST and the PST? Why don't you do that?"

By saying that to the Treasurer or saying that to the Premier, they do not have to follow the recommendations of this committee. They can say no. But that would help some of our businesses, not only in terms of what would happen at the border in terms of collection of these taxes, but it would help our businesses in this province run their businesses in a more efficient way and deal with a little less red tape.

Now, I know that when you are in government you get marching orders from your ministers as to what you can include and what you cannot include or whatever. But we have also found that in other parliamentary jurisdictions, in our federal Parliament for instance, the economic affairs committee does come up with reports that are not necessarily always favourable and totally in line with what the government of the day's policies might or might not be. And quite frankly, that committee has gained a lot of credibility in the community as to what it says, because it does not always agree with what the present day finance minister might or might not say.

Therefore, I say that while Bob Rae said in the last election that there was going to be a revolution over the GST, we have not seen that revolution or that rebellion take place on the part of this Premier. I do not think anybody believed there was going to be a revolution anyway, and I do not think Bob Rae could have had a revolution even if he had wanted a revolution. Therefore I just say that of all the things that come out of this committee, maybe the Treasurer of this province would be inclined to hang his hat on this committee's report and say: "Well, you know, a committee of the Legislature, which included our members, said we should combine the GST and the PST or we should seriously look at it, and therefore I'm going to blame our decision to do that—in spite of what we said during the election—on the committee that was made up of Conservatives and Liberals and NDP members." Therefore, he can spread the blame around a little bit on us as opposition parties. Quite frankly, I do not care whether he spreads that blame on us in terms of saying that they are in favour of the GST and all that kind of stuff that evolves out of it politically. But if we go ahead with this report, quite frankly, we will not give the Treasurer or the Premier the opportunity to hang their hats on anything to make any real changes. It means a whole bunch of different moves that we have to take over the next four, five, 10 years or whatever time it is going to take for people to realize that we have to become more competitive.

It is so evident with anybody who has a payroll. It is evident by the trucks that are around Queen's Park today. It is so evident to everybody that government has to start making some moves to get out of business in any way it can in terms of regulation to make our people more competitive. It is so obvious that we have to make it easier for business to deal with government, and that is what the combination of PST and GST might be. I think that is one positive move that this committee could make in terms of dealing with it.

There are some of the other suggestions I would agree with. In terms of collecting the PST at the border, I personally feel they should do that right away, forget about the federal task force and say, "We are going to go in and do that right now."

The Chair: Can you clarify "we"?

Mr Sterling: We, the government of Ontario.

The Chair: That cannot be done. It cannot be a unilateral decision, because the land around the bridges where the taxes are collected is controlled, operated and run by the federal government. That is the sole jurisdictional responsibility of the federal government.

Mr Sterling: And they have refused to allow the provincial government to do that, have they?

The Chair: Exactly.

Mr Sterling: When did they refuse them?

The Chair: They have been refusing all along. Hopefully the meetings that are taking place today between Melnyk and Wark-Martyn, the Minister of Revenue—

Mr J. Wilson: They are not refusing, as I understand it is simply that they are trying to negotiate with the provincial government to harmonize the system. It is part of the negotiation. I do not recall having read anything in the media where the minister, Otto Jelinek, has absolutely refused that, so that is an unfair statement at this point.

Mr Sterling: I think the Minister of Revenue should stand up and say, "We are going to collect it," or "We would like to collect it. We will pay for collecting it. We will do it. We will have our people there," etc. That is my view. I think that is a positive step that this government could take. When Ms Wark-Martyn was in front of this committee, she did not even know what the implications of doing that might be. I found that extremely disturbing, that she had no idea even of what was going over.

Notwithstanding that, I believe those two would be the most practical things that could come out of this committee. All the rest of the recommendations are nice, but they are not really significant in terms of dealing with the problem. Competitiveness is what you have to get at, and if we can make a recommendation that would encourage our government—and I am talking about the Bob Rae government when I say "our government"—to do something in terms of combining the GST and the PST, this committee could have achieved more than any other committee in this Legislature has ever done in terms of really effecting a change which would help cross-border shopping or help people stay in Ontario, because then businesses would be able to reduce their prices because they would have a cost reduction in running their businesses.

I would say, though, that I do not expect the NDP members of the committee would follow that kind of advice, and if that was not part of the report, we would of course be putting in some other recommendations.

Mr Jamison: Many of the opposition speakers here in committee have talked about competitiveness, and I know through my own experience in talking with many of the manufacturers of this province—and many of these manufacturers were fully in support of the free trade agreement and promoted it that way—those same manufacturers today are disheartened, to say the least, over one particular issue. I do not think their mindset has changed, but they are disappointed beyond belief that the level of the Canadian dollar will not allow them to be competitive at this point. They have made it very clear to me in a number of sectors that this has basically hog-tied them in making advances that they thought might be there under the agreement. When you take that into consideration and you talk about competitiveness—because these are people who supported your party federally, Mr Sterling, and thought that potential deal might well affect them in a very robust way—they are of different opinions. I have met with the steel industry. I have talked with them and that is their major, number one concern. Manufacturers beyond that, that is their number one concern.

Of course, that affects the price of their product here also to some extent. If you were to ask me, personally, about our potential of recovery, our potential of economic soundness, I think many of the presenters we listened to, both recently and in the finance and pre-budget hearings, were indicating very clearly that if there is a singular issue that is affecting business in a very dramatic way at this point, and manufacturing specifically, it is that.

I would like someone to explain really why it is so important to hold up the dollar. With the exception of a very small portion of people I have talked to, everyone is saying, "We don't understand why, given the economics, given the situation that we are in, given the predicament that all of us are experiencing, the dollar is remaining at that type of level and possibly creeping up a little higher."

It is extremely important to understand that there are players in trying to handle this particular problem of cross-border shopping. There are levels of government that all play some type of role in the overall picture. If you are asking us to make up for the deficiency of the federal government, I do not think that is fair at all. The deficiency in this area is, number one, the federal government should do its job, and that is do its job at the border. Quite simply, they are not doing it. Even their own job—not our PST, their job. That is a major part of this problem, that there seems to be no willingness to have that happen, which talks about probably another agenda that maybe this side of the committee really sees more clearly than other sides.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to respond to the economic nationalist and her statement. There is a certain naïveté expressed. There is a feeling, and I have to say this, that if we followed that logic we would really be a Third World country. Who do you think owns Toyota? Who do you think owns the CAMI operation in Ingersoll? Who do you think owns the Ford plant in Oakville? Who do you think owns the plant in Oshawa? Who do you think owns the Spruce Falls pulp and paper mill up in Kapuskasing that is in great trouble? It is owned by Kimberly-Clark and the New York Times, and because they have decided they want out, we have a major problem that the government is trying to address.

To say that we cannot have these foreign takeovers is to say we want to go back to an agrarian society; we do not want to be able to compete in the international field. It makes absolutely no sense. Without that foreign ownership and foreign investment we cannot prosper. Canada does not have the economic base or the capital pool. As a matter of fact, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology has offices all over the world trying to encourage exactly that kind of thing—companies to come into Canada, invest money, create economic activity.

So the answer is not ownership. Many of the companies we have in this country, whether Dupont, CIL, many of the huge companies that provide us with our economic vitality, are not owned. So ownership is not the problem. It is exactly the same situation that we have right now with de Havilland. It is ludicrous that we are fighting over the fact that a French and an Italian company are trying to buy an American company in Toronto. De Havilland is not owned by a Canadian company, it is owned by Boeing which is a US company.

What we have to do—and this is the crux of the issue—is to establish an environment that encourages foreign investment, that kind of activity. That is where the jobs are. When Caterpillar pulls out of Brampton and says, “We are going back to the United States,” everybody yells and screams and says, “My God, what are you doing, you can’t do that.” You can’t have it both ways; you can’t say, “You can’t leave.” On the other hand you are saying, “You can’t come in.”

What you have to do—and this is the crux of the competitiveness issue—capital is fluid whether it is the board of directors of Boeing in Seattle, Washington, saying: “We have put hundreds of millions of dollars into that plant in Downsview. We cannot make any money, we are leaving because there is restrictive legislation, restrictive tax measures that do not make any sense for us to be there. We are going to leave.”

This issue was missed on this gas guzzler tax. To stand up in the House and say only 1% of the cars being built in Ontario are affected does not address the problem that 80% of the product built in Ontario is shipped somewhere else. If they feel it is not a friendly environment, they say, “We are going to move out.” That is what we have to do. We have to make sure that we provide an environment that allows economic activity to take place.

That is exactly the same thing that happens with cross-border shopping. If people could buy products in Ontario that were economical, that would allow them to enjoy a quality of life that they want, of course they would buy it here. Why would they possibly go to a place like Buffalo? There is no great attraction in Buffalo other than the cost. This is exactly what happens to manufacturers. If they cannot make money in Ontario they say: “Why do we have to be here? We can go somewhere else where we can make money, where people will want us.” This is what happens when you go to Buffalo. You have companies that are saying: “They give us tax holidays, they give us land for nothing, they give us all of these incentives. Why should we not go there?”

That is what we have to address. We have to address why we are not competitive. You cannot just say that we are not competitive, because we are nationalistic and we expect that this will happen. You have to be able to say, “Are we going to be a player or are we not going to be a player?” If we are not going to be a player, then move over and let someone else who is. That is what the problem is and what we, as a committee, have to do is take a look and see why it is that we are not competitive, what are we doing that is impacting on our competitiveness.

Some of these things we are not going to be able to solve, because we have a quality of life that we want to have. That costs; it costs you some of your competitiveness. The trick is that we have to restructure what we are doing in this country, to say, “Yes, we want to have these things but by doing that we are going to give up something else.”

That gets me to the one last thing I want to talk about, and that is: You keep arguing about—and you will hear more about this—Mexico with its cheap labour, as if Mexico were a competitor. Mexico is not a competitor for Canada. I mean, there is no restriction right now for anybody who wants to move their operation to Mexico. A few companies have done it, but very, very few.

Our chief competitors are Japan and Germany, both of whom are high-wage countries. Wages in Germany and Japan, on a pro rata basis, are higher than they are in Canada. How come they are so competitive? The reason they are competitive is their productivity. They are paying the money, but they are getting a lot more work out of the money they are paying, and that is where we are falling down. The reason for that is not that our workers are loafing, but it is that they do not have the technical skills and they have not got the technical facility to make them competitive. That is what we have to address, and until we address it, everything else is commentary.

As I said before, you are just rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic. You are not doing anything that is going to affect our ability to compete, and unless we can compete we are not going to survive at a standard of living that we have got now. I have said this before; Canada has been called a Third World country with delusions of grandeur. You just cannot rest on your laurels. You have got to get out there. We are into a new ball game and you have got to be able to play it, which means you have got to really become competitive.

It is exactly the same thing in cross-border shopping. Talk all you want, but until you can produce products that can be sold on a competitive basis, people will go and buy where they can buy it at the best price. No amount of legislation, no amount of advertising, no amount of artificial barriers are going to stop people from doing that. They will turn into smugglers, they will turn to anything that they want, but they will use their economic interests to do what they are going to do. That is the end of my sermon.

The Chair: I am not sure how that is going to relate directly to cross-border shopping for this report. Mrs Sullivan.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to respond to a couple of statements and positions taken by Ms Ward and Mr Jamison.

I will not repeat the view expressed by Mr Kwinter relating to the ownership of the industrial and manufacturing base, which has been stated. I think it is very important for members of the committee to understand that in today’s business world and in today’s manufacturing world, there is no border in terms of production of product, in terms of sourcing of product. Indeed, if there is a border, what occurs is that in fact we become less and less competitive and, as we are already seeing on the cross-border shopping issue, people will make other decisions about where to put their money.

Mr Kwinter has talked about capital investment being fluid. There are no borders in capital investment, and countries around the world are all seeking the same few lars for capital investment that we are seeking in this vince.

I think that as we are looking at economic growth, at I hear Ms Ward saying is in fact less of an economic nationalism argument than an argument that cross-border shopping is a patriotic issue. I think what we are seeing, not all from the practice and second from the opinion polls, is that people are saying that the patriotic issue no longer matters. There may have been a time when it did matter, but it certainly no longer matters.

I also was interested when she said that you cannot buy Canadian products and it is annoying that there are not products that are made in Canada by Canadian companies. Part of her search for whatever products she is looking for. In fact, what we are probably seeing and have been seeing, and it is important to see, is increasing specialization in the products which are produced here. That is where, in fact, on an international basis we will be more competitive. The specialization, whether it is in products of manufactured products or of high-tech services, is absolutely vital to our economic future.

We will not, for instance, see a continuing textile industry, probably, that will ever be competitive with some of the lower-priced products that are produced in America, where the raw materials are cheaper and the market size and opportunity are far higher. I think what you are going to have to expect more and more to see is less of a nationalistic border on certain products unless you are willing to pay for it, and then you get into the specialty goods that are produced at the higher end of the line.

I was also interested in your suggestion that takeovers in fact do not contribute to the economy. I suggest to you that in fact there is a benefit to some of the takeovers which have occurred, and that is the consolidation of operations that do make us more competitive. I suggest that when you are saying that takeovers do not add to the economy, what you may be talking about are the kinds of leveraged buyouts and so on that have occurred not only in Canada but more especially in the United States recently. If takeovers by themselves are not a deterrent to economic prosperity. I think we have to be cautious about how we use these arguments.

I also wanted to talk about the Canadian dollar question that Mr Jamison raised, because in the cross-border shopping issue we have to remember, in making the argumentation about the value of the Canadian dollar, that the arguments that are put forward by industry about the value of the dollar relate to opportunities for export and the price of goods in an export market. We are not talking about the effect of the Canadian dollar on goods that are brought in. So I think you may want to rethink some of those questions.

Mr Sterling mentioned collecting the RST at the border. I still think the New Democratic caucus here should consider how to approach the collection of the retail sales tax at the border, but collecting the tax is only one part of the issue. The other part of the issue is the application of that tax on the same product lines that the GST and the customs duties are collected on, and that is something we have not heard as part of your discussions or your recommendations here. I think that must be dealt with, otherwise there will in fact be no opportunity for federal-provincial co-operation in those areas.

Mr Sutherland: If I may come to the defence of Ms Ward here in terms of some of the comments, I myself, being a naïve young individual, do not understand all of Canadian economic history. But if I may—and Mr Wise-man, I know you have studied a lot of history—it would seem to me that the point that was being made is the following.

If you look at our Canadian economic history since the Second World War, we established a branch plant economy after the war and I think that was a very wise choice. We did not have the capital and we did not have all the expertise and the knowledge. The problem is, though, that it seems like we kept the branch plant economy right into the 1980s and to some degree into the 1990s. Somewhere along the line, through the government taking a proactive approach, more Canadian-owned industries and businesses should have been developing and there should have been more larger Canadian-based companies. Mrs Sullivan said that borders are not important. They are not, but where their base comes from helps to build those companies and provide the solid footing for a lot of them. I do not think we have enough of them. We have a few at the very top. The large ones that we can think of, Olympia and York and a few others, can simply compete with anybody in the world because of their size and their operations.

But even though our population base is low, I think if you look around, somehow that did not occur. I think that is the concern that Mrs Ward is expressing, that we could be competitive if that type of process had been occurring in the 1950s and 1960s. That comes back to the question of some of the comments Mr Kwinter said, and in relation to what Mr Sterling and Mr Wilson have been saying.

“Competitiveness” is the key word, the buzzword, but the definition of competitiveness is one that really interests me, because it seems to mean different things to different people. I get a sense, certainly when Mr Stockwell is here, that competitiveness is simply lowering taxes and you are automatically going to competitive. I think that is a very naïve approach.

If you look at the examples that Mr Kwinter gave of who we have to compete with—Japan, West Germany, Sweden—their governments have all been proactive in terms of helping to develop their internal structures, helping to develop their internal resources, with maybe not government ownership of those resources but some nationalistic owning of those resources as the companies develop and evolve and go into international corporations.

I do not think that has happened here as much. It is a rather sad commentary that we are just getting now to a skills development policy for this province. I am not sure if we have a national skills development policy yet, but here we are in 1990 and these other countries have had these skills development policies and training policies for many years. We have been missing the boat on that.

So when we look at the issue of competitiveness, I think it is very important that we define what we mean by competitiveness. Prices are obviously some of the concerns.

You know, it is interesting. Mr Sterling is not here now, but he talked about harmonizing the GST as the great saviour of small business. Mr Sterling's idea is: "Yes, we will increase it by 7% first, with the implementation of the GST, then we harmonize it with the PST. They save 2% and businesses are coming out ahead." That logic does not make a lot of sense to me either.

He talked about deficits. He talked about provincial deficit, federal deficit, the government, and then he said we are not doing anything about it.

One of the recommendations in here is to look at the issue of the governments, the task force—now, I realize it is a very large, complex undertaking—but to look at the issue of duplication of services among all levels of government. I think there is a clear understanding that there is a lot of overlap, that there is not a lot of sense of who is responsible. I think we would all agree from our constituency work that there is absolutely nothing more frustrating than trying to solve a problem for a constituent that involves two different levels of government, because neither level seems to want to take the ownership of the problem. We need a greater definition of what services are going to be provided by what level of government and who is going to pay for them. I think in the long run that will make government more efficient and reduce some of the costs.

Recommendations are in here to deal with some of the issues that have been coming forward. Mr Sterling has run off to these private hearings that the Tories are holding. We want to get on and deal with the issue of competitiveness. We cannot even debate the budget in the House and move forward. I mean, let's debate the budget. If the opposition feels the budget is that bad, then let's debate the issue in the House and let's get on to dealing with these others issues in terms of the questions of true competitiveness. I quite agree they need to be addressed, but competitiveness is not a simplistic attitude of simply reducing taxes. That is not going to make Canadian manufacturers competitive and make Canada competitive in this world. You need a proactive approach from the levels of government in terms of giving people the necessary skills and making sure businesses can have skilled people who can produce the products to compete.

The Chair: I have been sitting on this piece of information for some time, and it comes out of the Stoney Creek Furniture presentation. It has to do with the GST. The manufacturing sales tax was 13.5%. When they received their rebate from the federal government, they received 8% and nobody has talked at all about the fact that the retail inventory in Ontario has paid a 5% tax to the federal government that did not get rebated when the manufacturing sales tax came in. On top of that was the 7%. So, in effect, no one has talked about the fact that the goods that are still on the shelves—or a lot of the goods that are still on the shelves in the retail stores—are still taxed at 12%.

What does that mean? What kind of an impact does that have in terms of redistributing funds? I believe the number that the Stoney Creek Furniture presentation gave was $250,000 less in rebates than what they effectively paid in taxes. If you compound that over an entire retail sector, how much money and what impact does that have on prices in terms of their ability to compete?

Mr J. Wilson: I will just touch on that; I will try to be brief. I think you will find that overall, the formula of eight-point—I forget the exact thing—was a negotiated formula with business and government. It is extremely fair. You will find, more often than not, firms came ahead in that formula rather than behind. It is not even a simple average. It is a very complicated formula. The MST was applied at a range from 7% to 13.5%, and you will find if you phone your federal members, I will bet they have almost zero complaints. For the most part the federal government lost hundreds of millions of dollars on exchange and were willing to take that hit and make it up with the collection of the GST. It is part of the cost factor of implementing the GST.

If they have a complaint with that, there is an appeal process, and they should have—maybe they did; I think Leon's, you will see too, did take a bit of a hit on it also. I think the president of Leon's at one time was saying he was willing to do that for the national interest.

There are more good examples of the rebate program—the inventory program—than bad ones, and that is to say the net result is negative for the federal government in that area.

I want to talk about nationalism in Japan, which Mr Sutherland raised. In the manufacturing sector, we have a lot to learn from them. I do not think we have a lot to learn from them when it comes to nationalizing our industries, though. That does one thing for individual Japanese: You will find in that economy, in that country, that for the most part, because of government intervention in manufacturing, the end result is the workers are all the same. You get one class. You have difficulty with individual initiative, individual freedoms, and if you go there you have several families living in small houses, and their quality of life is nothing like ours. I think whenever you talk about that sort of intervention in the economy, you want to also talk about what type of lifestyle you are willing to have. They have an élite in Japan, clearly, but for the most part it is taking every individual, every free human being, and making them all the same when it comes to standard of living.

Secondly, I just want to go back to Mr Ward's comments on interest rates. I hope your party is not running around hanging its hat on the report from the legislative researcher, because what you are doing, what the legislative research document suggests, as you have quoted, when it deals with the effect of large government borrowing on interest rates, you are really talking about degrees of sinfulness. Of course, the deficit this year of some $10 billion by the NDP government, and the cumulative deficit of $35 billion over the next short years, is statistically almost negligible when you add it to the monster debt and deficits of the federal government. But, it is the cumulative sins of all the provinces and the federal government that add up, and you guys are the greatest sinners of the provinces. So you do a role there when it comes to deficit ancing, and it is a role that you cannot ignore. You not say, "We are such a small part of the problem that it does not matter," because you are indeed a significant part of the problem when you add it all up. It is just absolutely wrong way to be handling your finances.

Finally, I want to make one quick comment. Mr. Sutherland and a number of members of the socialist government have consistently made the comment that the federal government is to blame for all their woes.

Mr J. Wilson: If you look at it, your less-than-anticipated transfer payments this year in education, welfare and health care total $1.6 billion. That is not a cut; it is less than anticipated. They were being transferred at roughly 3%. They are now down, in some terms capped and being reduced to around 3% and 5%. It is less-than-anticipated transfers. The $1.6 billion is about 3% of your $52-billion budget, and yet the 3% that the federal government has selected gets 100% of the blame in almost all of your speeches in the House and in committee. The public is not willing to put up with that much any more. They are more and more aware every day of the rhetoric coming out of this government. You better think up some new lines in my suggestion.

Ms Harrington: It has been very interesting the last 24 hours. I appreciate the comments from the opposition. I think they have had some quite thoughtful things to say. I would like to add a few comments.

First of all, if you look at the whole issue of cross-border shopping in its reality—which is the border, the trade, the interest rates, the dollar—this very obviously is a federal problem. I think we have to acknowledge that as a committee. Having said that, looking at for what and why the people are going across, I would like to say—and I think we could agree on this possibly—starting two years ago the message was given out there very clearly about free trade. That means to the average person that, "Yes, of course, the government is saying we can go across the border and look at various purchases and not have the duties imposed that have been there in the past." That message has been getting clearer and clearer to people.

Second, what has happened in the last less than a year the recession, which is touching people's incomes.

Third, and very important, the strong message out there in January was the GST. It said to people: "Yes, it's okay to go across. Yes, the federal government is driving us across. Yes, there is a quiet revolution. I will go across. The politicians do not care about myself or my family."

It would be very easy for us as a provincial government to say, as probably previous provincial governments such as the Liberals or Conservatives would have said at this particular juncture in time, "It's not our problem," but I would like to tell you that we, as a part of Canada, as the government of Ontario for the next four years, are saying that yes, we recognize it is a problem. It is an escalating problem and we will do our share. We represent communities in this province which are being affected and therefore we will not say, "Deal it off to somebody else."

I would just like to make one further comment. It is a global economy—we realize that—so let's look at what borders mean in a global economy. In our country, since free trade probably, there has been an escalation in the wage gap. There are people who do have good incomes which are probably getting better. There are people who have very poor incomes. Jobs are being lost and not replaced in the industrial sector by wages that you can support a family on. They probably are being replaced by service-type industry, which has been encouraged in this country since free trade. I believe that some proportion of the people who probably voted for the PCs in the last federal election do not even care whether we have a border or not, whether it is just an economic border or whether it is in fact a political border. "What's the difference to me?" There are people out there who are saying that. "It doesn't matter to me where I shop. It doesn't matter to me in the long term about Canada."

I think we have to address that as a provincial government. What is the future of Canada? To some extent, that may be involved in this cross-border shopping issue.

The Chair: Mr Hansen, and then we should wrap up quickly because we are running past.

Mr Hansen: I think one thing we have to take a look at is the enforcement. That is one of the important things at the border. I can remember when the Canadian dollar was at $1.10. We did not have a cross-border shopping problem at that particular time because what was happening at the bridges was the enforcement of the regulations on importing into Canada and the tariffs or duties or whatever else were paid. Not only that, at that time, if people knew they were smuggling something into the country, the women used to wear the dresses in so they were not in the car. You never smuggled anything into the country in the car because they confiscated the car, but it is not like that today on the bridges. There are just so many cars waiting to come back, they just say, "Next. Next."

We have talked about all the other issues, we have talked about the lower Canadian dollar, we talked about collecting the GST, but I think one of the most important things that we as the government have to get across is to say to the federal government, "Increase the enforcement at the borders." My understanding was that free trade was for industry, not for the average person on the street. I think people have bought it the wrong way.

At one time you were allowed to bring $2 across the bridge. I was going to school for a period of time and went daily across and never brought anything across because I knew of the enforcement at the bridges. I think we should get back to the enforcement. What should be paid? If you want to shop there, then you pay your duties, you do this.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to reply to Mr Sutherland when he said, "What is competitiveness?" Competitiveness is the ability to provide a good or service at a price and quality equal to or less than someone else's in the market. Everything contributes to that situation, whether it is taxation, government policy. Where we have a problem—and I have told you this before and maybe some of you had not heard it—but we are a very trade-dependent jurisdiction. For every dollar that an Ontarian has in his pocket, 33 cents is there because of trade. In the United States, for every dollar that they have in their pockets, only 10 cents is there because of trade.

The reason for that is very simple. They have an internal market of 270 million people. They can generate all kinds of economic activity just among themselves. They do not have to worry about whether they do it outside. We have an internal market of 27 million people. We cannot sustain just among ourselves the same standard of living here as they do there. We have to go out and trade. That is exactly the rationale behind the European Community. In 1992 they are going to have an internal market of 360 million people. So you have Europe at 360 million, you have the United States at 270 million plus the 80 million they are going to get from Mexico; it is going to be 350 million. Just within their internal market they are going to get the economies of scale that will make us irrelevant.

So we have to do something about that. We have to get into that market, which was the whole rationale behind the free trade agreement, but we have to be competitive. If we are not, then it does not matter what we say and what we stand up and talk about; they are going to pass us by. It is as simple as that. We cannot be all things to all people; we do not have the economy to do it. I should tell you that we do have some major players in this country. Northern Telecom is a world leader in telecommunications; it can compete with anybody. It has nothing to do with anything other than they have the technology and the ability to do it. Our resource-based industries are the same thing, whether it be International Nickel Co or some of our other resource-based, in that they have something that gives them a comparative advantage. Where we do not have the comparative advantage we have to do it smarter and we have to be able to do it, which means we have to invest in our people and in our technology. Unless we do that, we are not going to compete.

The Chair: Thank you. Hopefully this committee will reconvene at 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee adjourned at 1209.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 30 May 1991

The committee met at 1017 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: Good morning. I see a quorum. Unfortunately, not all parties are represented, but there are seven members and I think we should begin this morning's proceedings on the cross-border shopping interim report.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, if you recall last time, the government side had presented proposals, we had some discussion about them, and we heard comments from the opposition members that they did not think those proposals were adequate. We are anxiously waiting to see what they are willing to bring forward in terms of proposals and recommendations, so I would think that would probably be a logical place to start today.

Mr Kwinter: If I could give just a bit of a preamble as to what I think we, as a committee, should be doing, without being partisan or provocative. There seems to be a tendency every time a tough question is asked to try to lay the blame somewhere else. We notice this all the time, that cabinet ministers have been given instructions, whenever you get up and ask a question, to put it somewhere else. "Do not buy into it." As a result, they always get up and the first thing is "high interest rates, the exchange rate"—blame it on the feds. That is great political policy, and I have to admit we did the same thing every time we got the opportunity.

But I do not think this committee can come forward with any credibility and say, "We're blaming it on everybody else." We are going to have to do something about it. There are things that are within the jurisdiction, within the review, and within the responsibility of the province that can be done, and I think we have to do it. There has been no real addressing of those opportunities. There has been a lot of fuzzy, warm things that we should talk about this and that, and do that, but there has been no real saying: "Here is the issue. Here is what we can do to help it."

I think, when we listened to all of the witnesses, that the number one thing that came through is that it has nothing to do with a feeling for Ontario, it has nothing to do with patriotism, it has nothing to do with anything. It has to do with cost: "If you can bring the cost down, we'll support it in Ontario. If you can't, we're going to go where it is, to our economic wellbeing and where we can get the best value for our money. If you want to talk patriotism, we are paying our taxes, and we are paying what we think is an inordinate amount of tax. That is fine, and we're prepared to pay it, but we're also prepared, and we have an obligation to our families, to go out and get the best value we can for our money."

I think that is really the crux of what we have to address. Having said that, there is no question that there has to be some co-ordination between the federal, the provincial and the municipal governments in order to address what is becoming a very serious problem.

We have some recommendations. The first one, the one we think is the most important one, is that there has to be this recognition that the province has to be a player. As I say, it cannot be a finger-pointer, it cannot be just sitting there saying, "You should be doing this and you should be doing that." They have to become a player, and it means there have to be solutions from all three levels of government, but the Ontario government has to be actively in there and participating.

We think the first thing is that the government should appoint a superminister. That does not necessarily mean the guy or girl or whatever is going to be super—hopefully, he or she would be—but someone who can co-ordinate the government's activity; someone who has the strength, who has the ability to go in and negotiate and really pull this stuff together, and not just sit there and voice platitudes and get up and read from a prepared text that has been given to him by someone, whether from the Treasurer's office or someone else; someone who can take charge and say: "Here are the problems. Here are some of the solutions that have to be implemented if we are really going to address this problem."

Having said that, I think there are some practical solutions that can be made.

Mr Christopherson: A point of information, Mr Chair, if I could: Will there be written copies of your recommendations?

Mr Kwinter: I am glad you asked. I can give it to you right now.

Mr Christopherson: Ask and ye shall receive.

Mr Kwinter: Our second recommendation deals with the issue that, it seems to us, has been targeted as the number one trigger to get people over to the United States, particularly in the border communities, and that is the price of gasoline.

When you are structuring a budget, if you are the Treasurer you have many options, and most treasurers and most Treasury officials usually will take what they consider to be the easiest options. The easiest options are the ones where they feel they can get to things like gasoline, liquor, cigarettes. It is easy to do. You add it on. It is paid for by the people who use it. The people who do not use it do not pay for it, and as a result it gives Treasury officials a lot of comfort.

On the other hand, it allows them to not make the tough decisions, and this budget was no different. It allows them not to take a look at cutting programs, cutting costs, cutting salaries, or doing any of the other things that are available to them, because by adding this tax you can generate the kind of revenue you need without creating any other problems.

Given the fact that gasoline tax or gasoline prices have been identified as one of the major contributors and triggers to cross-border shopping, we think something this province could do is to rescind immediately the 30% increase in gasoline tax; that means the 1.7 cents that has been implemented should be removed, and the 1 January 1992 increase of another 1.7 cents should be abandoned. I think the same thing should be done both with the alcohol tax and the tobacco tax.

It is interesting, we were up in Collingwood a couple of days ago. It used to be a shipbuilding centre and had some industries, but it is primarily a tourist industry. Witness after witness came forward and said, "The tourism industry is absolutely critical to our economic wellbeing, and nothing is being done for us." All of these taxes, cigarettes—not so much cigarettes; they did not really mention that—the gasoline and the alcohol were singled out as being terrible deterrents not only for tourists from outside the province but for tourists inside the province. Their revenues are down because people do not want to pay the price for the alcohol, and with the price of gas they are not travelling. We think that is something that should be removed.

Then, of course, there is another excellent way of stimulating both the economy of Ontario and lessening the impact of the cross-border shopping, and that is to reduce the sales tax by 1%. You should know, and I think it is important that you know—when did we raise it from 7% to 8%? I think 1986—a 1% increase in sales tax at the time represented $1 billion of revenue. At the time it was done, the feeling was "We have to raise this extra revenue." There were all kinds of ways of doing it: raising income tax, corporate tax, all of these things. The Treasurer, in his wisdom at the time, said, "Let's go for the sales tax."

Again, if you do not buy anything, you do not have to pay it, and that was the way. The total rationale was to get another $1 billion. That is fine when the economy can absorb it, but now we are in trouble, we are in a recession and even though it is bottoming, we are not going to see the results of that for a while, and we are in this competitive situation. It is my feeling this is the time to give that $1 billion back.

Naturally, the first question that is going to come up is how can we do that; we have to get it somewhere else. That is exactly right. We have to look somewhere else for that revenue. Recommendation 2 deals with that. Gerry, do you want to carry on with some of the others?

Mr Phillips: Sure, Monte. We are dealing with a crisis in the cross-border shopping and we have to find some solutions very quickly. The long-term solutions we all look at are restructuring the economy and all those sorts of things, but in the meantime we have communities that are really struggling. So all of these things are designed to provide the communities with essentially immediate help.

The third recommendation I think is an important one, and that is the retention of the option for communities that feel it is in their best interests that they can remain open on Sunday. The more I have actually had a chance to work with the Sunday shopping bill, the more sense I think it makes. We will find there are many communities that believe this is going to be quite important to their survival on the cross-border shopping issue.

The fourth one is somehow or other getting co-operation with the federal government on the collection of the provincial sales tax. There has been one meeting where both sides take shots at each other and in the meantime the cross-border communities are suffering. The government has to take another run at the federal government to find a way to collect the provincial sales tax.

Recommendations 5 and 6 are around helping our agricultural community through these tough times, because we heard the numbers in Sault Ste Marie were quite staggering, in terms of the impact on the agricultural community, of cross-border shopping. We have two recommendations here. One is taking the current quota system, and during negotiations with the other provinces getting our share of the quotas up higher, and also looking at the temporary import licences that allow US products to come into Ontario.

Recommendation 6: Some of our agricultural community feel that they are clearly playing a big role in the environment and helping to ensure that our products are as safe as they possibly can be, but they are competing against products that do not have the same criteria applied to them, thus the idea of what we will call the Ontario seal of quality being applied to the products so that Ontario consumers realize these meet the standards in Ontario.

Recommendations 7, 8 and 9, frankly, are not inconsistent with some of the recommendations that have been proposed by yourselves. For whatever reason, we heard a lot of comments that somehow or other people feel there is a slightly higher service orientation in some of the US centres. I do not know whether that is the case or not. We have heard it often enough that there must be some truth, maybe not consistently, in that. If all of us realize that we all have a stake in developing a service culture, it probably means everything from store personnel to, I do not know, government employees.

I think that, as my colleague said at the outset, in the final analysis, it is difficult to persuade people on emotion when many people are struggling economically. Having said all of that, though, I think there is still some merit in trying to communicate to people the benefits of shopping in Ontario beyond just, "It's a nice place to shop." I think there are a lot of benefits that we all derive from that. So I believe it is consistent with one of your recommendations.

One thing I was struck by in the presentations is, it is always somebody else's fault. That is why our recommendation 9 is to try as best we can to get the facts. I think we heard retailers say: "Well, don't blame us. It's our cost of acquisition." Somebody else says: "Well, don't blame us. We produce our products here in Canada. We are faced with these costs, so don't blame us." The agricultural community will say, "Listen, we're producing quality products under all these standards; don't blame us." I think we need to know what the facts are. What is the real basis for the difference in costs? One suspects in the end it is probably different things and you add them all up and that is what represents it.

As my colleague said, in these committees you like to start off on as non-partisan a base as we possibly can, but I think all who sat here appreciate that we have a short-term problem and a long-term problem on our hands here. I guess our nine recommendations deal with the short-term crisis. The 10th one is, we are going to have to find a way to deal with the long-term issue, because my own view is that, as I said in this committee before, I think we are just merely kicking the start of this. Like any war, it often breaks out along the border, but the symptoms are going to move inland. What we see in differences in costs across the border eventually gets lobbed right to the centre of Ontario and impacts on our manufacturing sector and other sectors. Whether it or not, I think the new government is going to have to deal with that. I guess our clear feeling is that the budget is more than being helpful, going to be harmful to that.

Just to summarize, as my colleague said, I think it is going to be convenient to kind of say, "Well, this is somebody else's problem," but I think that the government is going to have to take some leadership on the issue. Rather than saying it is partially the Minister of Revenue, it is partially the Treasurer, it is partially the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, we are going to have to designate one minister who is going to take on the ownership of this issue or the cross-border cities and towns are going to be at the mercy of the marketplace.

I think there are some short-term things we can do to stimulate the economy. I think one of the members here made some statements on the gas prices, but the gas tax increase is just like, pardon the pun, throwing gasoline on the fire. Certain cross-border communities and the trucking community feel that you have taken a problem that we knew existed and then done almost the worst possible thing for that, which is to put the tax on the price of fuel up 30%.

The other recommendations I have covered. So I would hope we could have a good discussion using your recommendations, our recommendations and their recommendations, whenever they arrive.

Mr Kwinter: Could I just add one little addendum to what I think is quite significant? We met with the Ontario tourist association on Tuesday and there were some rather startling statistics. They certainly startled me. We all know how important tourism is to Ontario: It is the largest single employer and it is the third largest industry in all of Ontario, and they were saying that right now, 92% of all of their business comes from Ontario and only 8% comes from foreign tourism—dramatic, dramatic change, much so that the Tourism ministry has virtually decided to sort of forget about the foreign stuff and concentrate on Ontario.

Now, if you listen to the radio, you hear the commercials saying: "Where did you go last summer? I stayed in Ontario." And then they extol the virtues of staying in Ontario. The reason for that is that this is where their market is, and with this cross-border shopping and with the problems we have, that market in itself is eroding. So it is a double-edged sword. They found that more and more Ontarians are spending their vacations in the United States, and they are doing it for one reason only and that is the economics of it. It is just cheaper to go there, it is cheaper to eat there, it is cheaper to be entertained there, and that is why they are going. That is something we have to address. We can only do it by making some concrete changes. We cannot do it by putting out fancy reports that have platitudes about what we have to do this, that and the other thing, but nothing to change the root cause of the problem.

Mr Christopherson: First of all, just to respond briefly to Mr Kwinter's preamble, I was pleased to hear him say he was going to try to be as non-partisan as possible and then immediately disappointed when the first thing he did was become, in my opinion, very partisan. I can appreciate the concern by the opposition that there is a lot of reference to the federal actions in terms of the made-in-Canada recession and the high interest rates, high dollar etc that we refer to. As much as the opposition would like to trivialize those, we feel they need to be constantly put out front because they are a major cause of the situation we are in.

I think where we get into difficulties is where you draw the line in terms of where the partisanship is. But again, for every time that we sense somebody is trying to downplay those issues, we are going to reinforce the fact that they are a major reason, and if you look at any analysis anywhere, you will see that almost invariably, off the top of the argument, come the problems that the feds have generated. I will leave that there.

The other thing is, and I think back to the presentation of Mr Winters, which is probably one of the presentations that stands out the most—it certainly got the most reference in the media—if I recall correctly, right in there he stated that there was no single panacea for this. I think that is probably reflected in both our position papers because nobody really has tried to say, at least not from these two parties—the Liberals and the New Democrats who are present today—that any one solution would take care of everything because we have such a range of recommendations.

However, if I can try to be as non-partisan as possible, having responded in a very partisan fashion—

Mr Phillips: I can tell by the decibel level of your voice whether you are being non-partisan.

Mr Christopherson: I make a habit now, Gerry, that when I am giving a speech, I check with you to see what the volume is like. I thought it over the other day after you came over and talked to me, and if we can just get the Tories to lower their level, I will gladly lower mine. But I want to make sure you hear me, Gerry, and I know you are really interested in everything I have to say.

Recommendation 1, and again this is just off the top without having consulted with my colleagues: I like the recommendation. I am not keen particularly in the label of superminister because that—

Mr Kwinter: I agree. That is why I said I do not mean it has to be a superperson per se, but someone who has—

Mr Wiseman: Someone to lead.

Mr Kwinter: Not even lead, someone who buys the issue and has a responsibility to address it, someone who can be like the organizer and the spokesperson and the driving force in tackling this problem.

Mr Christopherson: I think it is a good recommendation. I am not aware that we have specifically, actually designated a minister to be responsible, with certain authorities and powers beyond what he normally would have as a co-ordinator and as the key player. Again, the idea of superminister is dangerous, because what it does is it means that other issues—if there is a minister designated to be the co-ordinator and if he does not get the title of superminister, then that issue does not carry the same weight as others, and that is problematic.

So I think there is merit in that and I think it is a good recommendation. Unless I am overruled by my colleagues, I think that is something we ought to look at very carefully. I think it is a good recommendation.

On recommendation 2, the honourable members across from me will recognize that we are obviously not going to be in support of that.

Moving right along, recommendation 3: Again, we have always had a problem with the fact that the provincial government was not prepared to take a stand on the issue. We always felt the municipal option as the general policy for the province was a bit of a copout. I know you disagree, and that is fine. So now that we are in government, we are clearly going to be taking a stand on one side or the other and let the chips fall where they may. But the idea of the municipal option is not something we have been comfortable with as the general policy.

As for the other recommendations, most of them are consistent with ours, as mentioned—the latter recommendations. And the others, I think there is probably room for some negotiation on our part in terms of just wording and in terms of approach. I do not know if we can be as finite as you have been and would like to be, but I think you can recognize from the government side that merely to say, “We’re not going to get enough; it is our job to get more and nothing less is acceptable,” when you are dealing with other provinces that are also facing their own recessions and their own difficulties, they are going to be as close to the vest in terms of keeping their interests in the forefront as we would be. But the initiative has some merit and I think we would be willing at least to take a look at that. Maybe we could find some common ground there to move on.

By and large, I would just like to wrap up by complimenting the Liberal caucus for the obvious sincere effort they have put into this and the amount of work. I think maybe between us, if our friends from the third party show up and are willing to play the same kind of role, we can put together a good report that might go a long way to resolving some of the difficulties.

Mr Sutherland: If I could just make a few comments, in terms of the opening remarks, there was some reference to the fact that we did not want to take ownership of the problem. I find that in our recommendations we tried to highlight the fact that the province does have a role in that in terms of participating in the trilevel task force, in terms of negotiating with municipalities over different issues, again the trilevel task force on duplication of services and who should fund those types of services, and looking at two options of collecting provincial sales tax. So I think we agreed with that, that there is a role the province has to play and that it needs to be in there and be one of the partners in attempting to find the solutions to the problems.

Mr Christopherson commented on recommendations 1, 2 and 3. I just want to comment on a couple of others. Picking up on Mr Christopherson’s words about the common ground, it is nice to see there are at least four recommendations that are pretty well similar, as I think Gerry highlighted when he was going over that.

Recommendation 5, in terms of what you were saying about negotiations on the quota system, I think that is a very valid recommendation. Where those negotiations will lead, given the nature of how provinces have been negotiating on issues, is hard to say, but I think it is certainly something worth pursuing and for the Ministry of Agriculture and Food to be pursuing. I am sure our farmers would be appreciative of that and some of the processors as well.

Recommendation 6, where you talk about the seal of quality, I would be interested in knowing some more details about that in terms of—you say this is a way of recognizing that it is a local product or an Ontario product. We already have our Foodland Ontario signs in many of the stores, which help to recognize that. And I guess in terms of some questions about how people will get all the information or knowing the standards that you outline, I would be interested in having more details on that.

I want to make one comment on recommendation 10, where you talk at the end about avoiding heavy future taxation burdens on Ontario consumers and business, and that last line, “much of which lies at the root cause of this problem.” I am sure if our friends from the third party were here, they might comment on the fact that you may be admitting that over the last five years taxation has been increased dramatically. I just found that line rather interesting, that you would put it in your report.

But overall, as I say, I agree with Mr Christopherson. I think there is some good common ground here to work from and develop from.

Mr B. Ward: I concur with my colleagues. I think we should be able to develop good, concrete recommendations by massaging both our and your recommendations. I have some concerns with some of the recommendations. In essence, they are around recommendation 2, which deals with proposing that the retail sales tax be cut and the gas tax be rolled back, and recommendation 10. I firmly believe, not being partisan, that we do have our fiscal house in order. Our Treasurer has developed a long-range plan based on fiscal responsibility.

I think Gerry mentioned, we had one of the delegations here, and every action has a reaction. Recognizing that we have a social and economic platform that we want to implement as the government, if we adopted recommendation 2, then this committee would in essence be suggesting that we allow the deficit to go higher than it is, because we are taking away potential revenue from the Treasurer. I am not sure if we want to make that recommendation. I do not think that is where the Liberal caucus is coming from in recommendation. But every action does have a reaction, and if you withdraw revenue, either the deficit goes up or we should be recommending where additional revenues can be gathered, whether it is an increase in the income tax or whatever. I am not really sure we want to get involved with that.

I think most of the recommendations are similar in regard to the direction that we want in the cross-border shopping issue. I think that by working together—and we seem to be able to communicate quite well together—we should be able to come up with an excellent report for our government to examine as a plan of action.

The Chair: I was just conferring with Ms Anderson about the cost of recommendation 2. The cost of dropping sales tax by 1% could be—it probably is not around $1 billion now because of the downturn in the economy. The true cost of that would be between $800 million and $1 billion.

Mr B. Ward: To be fair, recommendation 4, if it were adopted and if in fact we could negotiate with the federal government, there would be revenues from the collection of the provincial sales tax at the border. So there would be some revenue gathered from that recommendation.

The Chair: Just to conclude my thought, we do not know what the impact of a 1% reduction in sales tax would be in terms of total tax revenues. If it has the effect of stimulating the economy and purchasing in Ontario, in fact, revenues may or may not go up, depending on how much that has impacted. I think it would be interesting to know from the Ministry of Revenue if it has any studies, any kind of analysis of the elasticity of this kind of tax and whether it contributes to stimulation and how much and what kinds of revenues it could produce. From that point of view, it is tough to tell what the results of that tax would be. In commenting on that, you are looking at I think somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1.5 billion in forgone tax revenue in recommendation 2, which we have to be cognizant of.

Mr Jamison: That is basically the point. If you drop the provincial sales tax by 1%, you would have to generate business from there to really balance without adding taxes in another area. I do not think that would make any significant difference in solving the problem.

As Mr Phillips has said, there are a hundred different things that contribute and that have developed over a number of years. That happens to be very correct. I do not think dropping the PST by one percentage point would create a different frame of mind in the cross-border shopper, in that mentality. I really do not think it is significant enough to do that. Sure, we have some responsibility to look and see what areas we can move in and what we can do, but again Mr Kwinter indicated that 1% in the PST rate could work out somewhere around $1 billion. If what I am saying was true, that we were to convince our colleagues to go that way, that revenue would have to be assured, made up, or new taxes of one form or another would have to be implemented. There are no two ways about it.

My feeling is that would have very little impact on the cross-border shopping mentality, if any. We are in a situation where we are experiencing a $9.7 billion deficit and we are talking about, on a chance, taking another $1 billion and adding that to the deficit, without any assurance of the type of impact that would have in stimulating and generating more economic activity on this side of the border and whether or not there would be a balance there that would at least see us break even on that move. My own impression, quite candidly and honestly, is that I do not believe that would be effective in doing just that.

The Chair: Before we go on we should be thinking a little bit about how we can agree on recommendations that we can then have injected into the report, on what recommendations have common cause and little disagreement so that Anne Anderson and David Rampersad can move ahead. On the ones that are more contentious, we might want to see if there are rough edges that can be smoothed out and if agreement can be reached. I know that in some cases there will be no agreement and that would be a minority report. I am just trying to think of ways we can expedite this and move ahead so that we can have something to give to the Treasurer if the budget and all that will descend upon us in the near future.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, before you do that can I just respond to some of the comments that were made and then we can do that?

The Chair: I was just throwing it out as an idea to think about. We have about two or three more speakers and you were next.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to respond to a couple of things that were said. I think as a basic premise there is a misconception as to how committees work. When I was a minister, I used to tell this to my bureaucrats. They would come in with recommendations and then immediately say, "But politically you won't be able to sell this." I would say to them: "Don't play politician. That is my role and that is my colleagues' role. Your role is to give me the best recommendation you have and do not tell me what the political ramifications are. We are going to make that decision." Quite often, the best recommendation was not the one that was accepted by the government, only because of the politics. I am saying that because that is the same—

Mr Daigeler: Are you sure you are telling the truth?

Mr Kwinter: We have exactly the same problem here.

The Chair: Their problem was they did not listen to him for the last six years.

Mr Kwinter: I do not think it is our role to worry about the Treasurer. That is his role. If we are going to make our recommendations based on what we think the Treasurer will accept or will not accept or where he is going to get the revenue, then this is an exercise in futility because he has already gone through that exercise, and we have his budget, which is the result of that. If you are just going to say, "That's his budget and this is what he has decided," then we might as well go home.

What I am saying is that we make the recommendations. Whether we can sell it to the government is problematical.

That does not matter. What we should do is take a look at it and say, "Here is what we think could help this problem," and let the Treasury people and the Premier and the cabinet worry about whether or not they are prepared to accept it. But if all we are going to do is say, "Well, if we do this it is going to do that and how are they going to this," forget about it.

If you take a look at the response of Mr Christopherson, there are 10 provinces in Canada and different provinces are being affected by the recession and by cross-border shopping in a different way. The province that is being most severely affected is Ontario, for a variety of reasons. We have had a 3% drop in the gross domestic product of Ontario. British Columbia is just about even or slightly ahead. They have actually had some growth; very little, but they have had growth and they have exactly the same interest rates, exactly the same value of the dollar, and they have had some slight growth. Even the Maritimes—of course they have a chronically depressed economy—have not suffered as badly as Ontario.

To just say we have to recognize that these are problems that affect everybody and that the federal government has a role to play—no question: I think we have a responsibility and an obligation to keep pushing the federal government to get its house in order. But there are still things that can be done in Ontario. It is interesting that in all of the comments—I was listening—there seem to be only two areas where there can be movement: Either increase the deficit or increase taxes. Not one member on the government side said that we may also have to take a look at cutting costs or cutting programs. That may seem to be a holy cow that you cannot touch.

That is why I am talking about the sales tax. We implemented the 8% sales tax, and in the last election, because of the deterioration of the economy, we said we would reduce that sales tax by 1%. Now, it was a response, without question, to the deterioration of the economy. That was really what it was. The economy was going into a free fall and we are seeing the results of it.

If the feeling is that, "Well, we can't do that because it would take $1 billion out of that and where is the Treasurer going to find it?" that is his problem. I think what we have to look at, as a committee, is where do we think we can address this problem?

We have had a comment from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology saying that he does not think 1% is going to make a difference. He does not know. He just says, "My gut feeling is I don't think it will make a difference." I think we have to take a look at it. There should be a way of determining, for every decrease in the sales tax, what does that do to stimulate the economy and what does that do to lessen cross-border shopping? He may be right, but I do not think we can make that decision based on, "I don't think it will make a difference," because I cannot say I think it will and I do not think he can say that it will not. I think there has to be some mechanism for gauging what the impact would be and to determine whether or not that would be a significant effect on the problem. I think that is what we have to do.

I am quite happy to go through these recommendations and if we can get agreement on some, then put aside the ones that we cannot, then we can see what we can do with those.

Mr Phillips: I am trying to figure out how we proceed too. Maybe Mr Kwinter has a solution of trying to work our way through the two sets of recommendations, and where we have agreement, to give some direction to the staff to draft something. The material we presented was kind of just draft for discussion purposes. I think we all appreciate that and I assume—

Mr Kwinter: Can I just interrupt for one minute. There is another concern that I have. The concern is that we do not have any representatives from the third party. The concern I have is that we sit down and agree on something and then they come in and say: "Well, that is ridiculous. We do not agree with that." We are sort of back at square one. It would certainly be my feeling that if we go through this exercise, we should have representatives of all parties, so that at least when we agree on something, we know that we have agreed to it and do not have to go and revisit it when these guys walk into the room.

Mr Christopherson: In fairness, we should remind them, and I see the clerk leaving now to remind them, that we are at some crunch time. Bear in mind that we went through something similar when we did the pre-budget consultation. They felt there were major chunks of the decision-making process they did not want or feel a need to be a part of. We did a lot of it without them being here. I am not going to hold up the process personally if they just decide not to be here. If they have a good reason and request that we accommodate them, I am prepared to consider that at any time for anybody of any party, but if it is just a question of other priorities, I do not think we should slow down this business. It is your colleague who recognized it as a crisis and I think the Chair is anxious for us to produce a report as quickly as possible.

The Chair: I have a sense here in what we have before us of the making of a good report with recommendations to the Treasurer. I have perused both documents again and I think that at least with the people who are here, we are not far apart, except on maybe one or two issues and perhaps some of the language. If you eliminate some of the partisan language, I think there is a lot of consensus and recommendations that both sides can live with.

I just perused the government party's. For example, under long term, they are talking about sending an examination of municipal taxes and services to the Fair Tax Commission for an assessment. To me that seems to say something about the long-term solutions.

I think we are not far apart and I would like to see if we can move in that direction within a short amount of time so that we can get a recommendation. I feel, as the Chairman here, that we have to move along, because I think very shortly this committee is going to be given an awful lot of work to do. If what we are hearing about the budget coming to this committee is in fact going to happen, I feel a little bit of a compulsion to move along.

Mr Jamison: I am sorry, I did not hear that last tement.

The Chair: This committee is going to have an awful of work coming and I feel an urgency to get a report ether, even if it is just an interim report, so that we can something to the Treasurer for a number of reasons. We have in the rotation now Mr Christopherson—

Mr Phillips: I think the Hansard would show I was finished. I was interrupted.

The Chair: Okay, then I will allow you to continue, if Mr Kwinter would not interrupt you again, I think could move along.

Mr Kwinter: That was actually on a point of order.

The Chair: I am not sure that was a valid point of order, Mr Kwinter, but I had to listen to it to hear it.

Mr Phillips: I do think there is considerable merit in what the third-party recommendations will be because we actually go through point by point. I am just thinking that, as my colleague said, we may agree on certain things, but they may bring in another twist on the recommendations. I think we run the risk of it not being as productive as it could. My own instincts are that we should spend whatever time we need to clarify each other's positions in case there are questions now, then come back together again this afternoon, hopefully with the conservative recommendations before us so that we can end of work our way down where there is three-party agreement on it. It seems to have a lot more merit. We also have where their recommendations may come. They may be improving on these two.

Mr Hansen: Just taking a look at the 1988 budget where we were talking about which the Liberals brought in, where they brought—to me that was GST when it was on goods and services at that time. That was when the economy was good, and yet there was an increase. I cannot see how we can decrease 1% off the 8% retail sales tax. When we were discussing that, Mr Kwinter was saying that we were going to drop 1%, but that was to put the Ontario sales tax on top of the GST, which would work out to close to 8% gain. So there was no reduction at that particular time in the last election. That is the partisan part.

The other part is that in the United States right now they are taking a look at setting up a milk marketing board. There is supposed to be a report on 19 June. They find out, with the surplus amount of milk over there, that it is costing the US government too much money. So they are actually looking at the model we have here in Canada. There is a good possibility that in this particular area, and maybe some of the other areas, the Canadian farmer will be coming on to a level playing field.

The other thing is the price of gas, that we increased the tax by 30% by putting it up 1.7 cents and this would effectively drive more people across the border to shop for gas there. There was not anything much in the paper that the oil companies raised the price seven and eight cents a litre—I think it was on the long weekend. There was nothing said at that point, and yet everybody is throwing their hands up that 1.7 cents is a whole lot of money, 30% increase. If we are to wind up matching prices with the United States by dropping tax on gasoline, which was noted, the oil companies are picking up what we drop. So we will not wind up being very competitive in that particular area.

The other thing to note here is that we have a lot of people shopping across the border, but they want to live in Canada. What we have to do is take a look that we are a caring nation, that we take a look at the social benefits we have here, and I do not think we see people readily moving to the United States because of high taxes, etc. They might be shopping over there, but they like the benefits. That is what we have to sell people, that they like to live here in Canada but only shop in the States, and we have got to entice them to come back. I think we have to say that we have to pay the pricetag for living here in Canada.

Mr Christopherson: I want to ensure that the record is at least clear from both sides on some follow-up comments, and I suspect that we can move on. I would acknowledge that some of Mr Kwinter's comments probably narrow the gap in terms of our stand on the feds' role in all of this. There is still some disagreement, but I think we have come a long way in recognizing how much is legitimate to claim as part of the problem and where some of the political rhetoric begins to pick up. I am prepared to leave that, and in the areas we disagree, just agree to disagree.

I am surprised, however, that he would mention the 1% sales tax. In my opinion it is universally accepted that that was a rather discredited move that was done in a panic time in the election. It was not well-thought-out. There are even reports that the Premier and the Treasurer of the time were not even in concert on their approach to this. So to suggest that a well-thought-out idea that was meant to mitigate some of the damage of the ensuing recession is something we should now look at, quite frankly, I find an absolute non-starter and I really am surprised that you would raise it, because I think the history shows that was not why it was done. At this point we have no intention of following up on that recommendation.

That leads me to the idea that—and I think again there needs to be some comment on the record from the government side regarding the Treasurer's role. I am sure if I were sitting on the other side, I would feel exactly the same way and I would damn the torpedoes on every single issue. That is the role of the opposition; I would feel that is my role if I were there.

We have an obligation, as you can appreciate, to deal with all the issues, and we are the ones who have to answer to it as a government and our ministers in the House every single day. To suggest that we do not need to be considering the financial impact on the Treasury and on the government I just do not think is realistic and does not make common sense. We have to be concerned about it. For someone to ask us even in our own caucus, once the report was tabled, "Did you not even take a look at what that would do in terms of the dollars?" We just came out with a budget. Do we just turn to our colleagues and say, "That is Floyd's problem, not our problem." It is a government problem, it is a caucus problem. I think, though, that we should not be absolutely bound by every utterance of the Treasurer, Premier and cabinet on committee recommendations, but in the process of developing those opinions we are going to consider what the impact is, and I think people would expect us to do that.

Cutting the costs and programs, again it was mentioned that none of us referred to anything like that, and Mr Ward talked about the fiscal restraint concerns acknowledged in the budget, and in the budget there is a short-, medium-, and long-term plan presented by the Treasurer for dealing with the deficit and other matters. The development of the new Treasury Board is exactly the response to the very concerns raised by Mr Kwinter. Indeed, one of the things we are going to be doing through the Treasury Board is taking a look at cost-control measures to ensure that we get a handle on those things, and where we can cut, we will be doing it.

To end on a positive note—I will try to begin and end that way if I can—I agree with the process that is being suggested, and I think maybe Mr Phillips' suggestion that we at least wait until this afternoon to see if there are any recommendations tabled by the Tories is not unreasonable. Maybe we can just conclude our general remarks when we are done and then start that process. I would ask that we then recognize, if the third party is not present, that that not hold up our business, that we begin to work through, as the Chair has suggested, those areas that we can agree on, set aside the ones we cannot, and take it from there. I am still feeling very positive that we could put together a pretty helpful report that the government and the ministers affected could use.

Ms Harrington: I am very pleased that we have these two pieces of paper. It shows that you are serious, as we were last week, in coming forward with recommendations. Off the top, as a sign of goodwill, I would appreciate it if the opposition party could drop recommendation 10, which I find offensive, because we do want to work together.

With regard to the comments at the beginning about our role as a government and as a province, I think I have stated here before that the basic underlying problem is a national one and does fall to the national government. Whether it is the interest rates, the dollar or the duties at the border, these are all federal matters. I believe that we, as representatives of our individual communities, do have a role to play although it is fundamentally a federal problem, that we as a government do take that responsibility seriously, and that is why we are doing this. That is why we came up with that paper last week, and that is why we are happy with the fact that you came up with this paper. I think it is very positive that we are involved in some way, but we cannot take ownership of the basic, underlying problem.

You have mentioned a 1% retail sales tax cut. When this was done last year, first of all, I do not think it stimulated anything in particular that I know of. That was a trial run, decreasing the sales tax, and I do not think it proved to be effective. With regard to any kind of tax impact coming from a border community, I would say that that kind of direction would have the most impact if it was towards the gas. I believe there is merit in that quote you have here: "If it wasn't for the cheaper gas, we'd probably not bother coming over." I think there are enough people in border communities who do not want to spend the time at the border crossing and the hassle of going across, but if we could somehow lessen that difference of $10 a tank, and given our Canadians half a chance not to go over, then they would not spend those other dollars other than gas while they were over there. If there is any movement in this direction at all, with regard to the Treasurer, I think it could or might be more focused on the gasoline issue.

The last question I want to ask the opposition is that cross-border shopping has been an issue for a while. It just did not all of a sudden happen in January, but I know it was accelerated by the GST. What do you feel the previous government did in the way of leadership on this issue, because maybe I was not aware of any? Maybe I do not know.

Mr Phillips: Two or three points: One, Mr Christopherson kind of thinks that the 1% cut in sales tax is just a throw-in thing. Actually, our leader has constantly raised that, and we believe it is an important element in kick starting the economy again, so it was not thrown in as sort of a neat little throwaway to anger you.

Mr Christopherson: You are trying to save face, Gerry.

Mr Phillips: No, I am just saying that we feel it is a good recommendation, and it would not be there otherwise.

I think we would be happy to look at the wording of recommendation 10, if it is too offensive.

On the last point on what the previous government did, the fact is that we went through five years of the best economic growth the province has ever had. Employment growth, the economy, during those five years, by your admission and by everybody's admission, was the most robust in the history of the province, and I guess we would have—

Mr Hansen: There were 33 tax increases.

Mr Phillips: It is all part of the strong economy, and I guess if we were in government now you have many of the recommendations we would be looking at.

The Chair: I would like to interject here for a moment about an observation I have in the last debate we had on the floor here before the break. I made a comment that when the manufacturing sales tax was put into place, the rebates to the retailers was less than the 13.5%. A comment from Mr Wilson, who is here, said that the retailers had done very well by the manufacturers' rebate. So I took it upon myself to do a survey. It is not scientific in any way, but I was looking for specifically any retailer who received more money back from his or her manufacturing sales tax than was paid. There were none. The consensus is that there is a 5% to 6%, and in some cases as high as 7%, loss in revenue because of the changeover from the manufacturers' sales tax to the GST.

I further questioned them, and it became quite apparent that as of 1 January, the tax on goods in some cases was not 13.5%, but in fact where they had received only an 8% or a 6% rebate, the tax on those goods that were being sold was still somewhere between 11% and 14%. So there you have a situation where people have the expectation that these prices should be lower because the taxes are lower, but in fact the retail merchant who was in the store with his inventory in place on 1 January saw literally no decrease in the tax on the goods he had in inventory in the store at that time, and if that entory is still there, he is still not seeing any kind of increase in the cost per item in the store.

I stand by what I argued prior to the break. The amount of impact in terms of lowering the price that the GST was supposed to have has not in fact been passed on to the consumer in all cases, even to this point, five months into GST. I think that is an important consideration to look in terms of why the prices have remained high and why in some cases the prices are still higher now than they were prior to January 1991. That retailer has still to deal with that as a problem.

This is of course open for discussion here, but I would not like to add a recommendation that the federal government increase its rebate of manufacturing sales tax to the retail merchant to close that gap between what he in fact paid and what he got in return. If that is 5% or 6%, even if he receives only 3% in terms of a return, that will be a large injection into the retailer's pocket and I think would have a fundamental effect on the survivability of some of the retail merchants in the cross-border areas.

I know from the fact that the Stoney Creek Furniture presentation—I will admit up front he is a friend of mine. He and I have had many discussions. The difference between the manufacturer's sales tax on his inventory and what he received in return was $250,000. I talked to the Canadian Tire store owner in my riding. It was $160,000. I talked to a small business person who works on making tires. He told me that his was $1,800, and his is just a small retail store. From my point of view, there is a huge amount of money that the federal government has acquired because of the switch from the manufacturing sales tax to the GST. I think that is worth debating and worth considering as a recommendation, but of course it is up to the committee.

Mr Kwinter: If I could just respond briefly to that, and even if I want to make another comment, this problem with cross-border shopping did not just start 1 January. Jim, your commendation—unfortunately you are going to get exactly the same response that we have from the government side. What you are saying to them is, "Give up some of your revenue," and they are going to say, "Well, that is very nice of you to say, but we are just not prepared to do it."

That is exactly the point I am making; I think we should recommend that. Now, the chances of its happening are zero and nil, but it depends on whose ox is being yoked. You are saying, "We are not prepared to do that within ourselves, because we have to account to our colleagues for it, but we are quite happy to make that recommendation to the federal government, because we do not have to answer to them, and let them respond and say why they are not prepared to do it." It is just a matter of practical politics.

The other thing I want to respond to is that cross-border shopping is not new. We talked about this as teenagers. It goes in waves. If all of my friends wanted to have a weekend where there were things happening which were not happening in Ontario, where we could buy things, everybody went to Buffalo. It was sort of a part of the provincial culture that you went across to the United States.

What has happened that has exacerbated it is, number one, the economy is in severe recession, which means that people are looking for their economic interests, and the advent of the GST, which means that a whole range of products that were not captured by the federal tax are now captured. I talk to people all the time and their first attitude is that there is 15% in tax that is added on right there without anything. All of those things, plus the differential on the price of gasoline, the differential on the price of cigarettes, the differential on the price of alcoholic beverages, are compounding the problem.

The problem is not new, but the severity of the problem is relatively new. We are never going to stop cross-border shopping. Right now, the major driver of cross-border shopping is the economic difference, but there are other things that we cannot address, and those are selectivity, variety of products, products that just are not available in Canada, where people will go across and buy it. Price is not the object; it is just that that is the product they want, and it is not available here.

People will be going across the border, and I do not think any government will be able to stop it, or would want to stop it, because it is a two-way street, but there is no question in my mind that it is being exacerbated by all of the things we have heard, whether it is Sunday shopping, taxes or the price of gas, all of the things that are going on. This is what is accentuating the problem and these are the problems we have to address.

The Chair: Might I suggest a form of process here, that perhaps we could go through some of the recommendations we find consensus on.

Mr Jamison: Mr Chairman, I think we have been presented by the opposition with 10 recommendations. I would like to think we would have had the ability to really consider each recommendation and see where in fact we are able to meld our position with yours.

The Chair: Are you asking for an adjournment?

Mr Jamison: I think it is important that we have time to do that. Time is of the essence on this question also, but when we have 10 recommendations in front of us that we have indicated we are willing to look at, I think we should be given time enough to really consider them in their full scope. That, I think, is a logical recommendation and one which would allow us to further evaluate these recommendations and try to give as much attention to them as possible. Like you were saying, it is the government side that will really be the side that will put forward the report.

I would move at this point that we adjourn until 4 o'clock and give us on the government side enough time to really, fully discuss internally within our side the potential of combining a number of the points put forward here today. I would like to thank the opposition for taking the time to put these things together. We may not agree on all the issues, but certainly I think you have worked hard putting them together.

The Chair: Is that the consensus of the committee, to adjourn till 4 o'clock?

Agreed to.

The committee recessed at 1131.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1609.

The Chair: I see a quorum.

Mr Kwinter: The clerk is distributing a revised version of our recommendations. There are a couple of grammatical additions in number 1 and number 7. Number 1, as I say, they are relatively minor, but they are there; and, number 7, we just added the word "labour." This is on recommendation 7.

Mr Cousens: Read the sentence so I have it.

Mr Kwinter: "The NDP government should recognize..." You have it there, so you would not know it. You do not have the old one.

The other thing we did is that I took to heart some of the comments about recommendation 10, and I have toned it down and modified it somewhat. You still may not be happy with it, but I think it is less pejorative, and I have done that.

The other thing that happens is that to recommendation 6 on the third page I have added one sentence, again, to address some of the concerns about the Foodland project. This would complement it, because Foodland Ontario deals with some produce and not others, and this would just complement it. That is what has been distributed.

Mr Christopherson: Have we formally started, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: Yes we have.

Mr Christopherson: Then I would suggest that what we do is just follow what we talked about earlier today, first ask the Conservative representative, through you, if they have any recommendations to table.

Mr Cousens: Sorry to say at the present time, Mr Chairman, that I do not have them with me. I know there are some considerations under way, but was there a deadline to have them in today? Is that what you were hoping to have?

Mr Christopherson: As I understand it, at the last meeting there was discussion of the NDP proposals by all parties, and then the Liberals came this morning with their recommendations. Unfortunately there were no Conservative representatives here this morning. We agreed to wait till this afternoon before we start to move on the report. It was, I think, everybody's intention that in the afternoon session of today, we would begin to actually put the report together. I guess we are a little bit on the horns of a dilemma here in terms of where you are at.

Mr Cousens: I do apologize if I am causing any inconvenience to the committee. I do not have the series of recommendations or proposals from our caucus at the present time. I would be prepared to proceed with the consideration of your report. I have just had a chance to glance at the recommendations that have been tabled by my friend the member for Wilson Heights, and I think there can be a great deal of service to the whole committee if they are considered, and if, after that time there are further points that we would want to bring forward, we would do so. I would defer at this point, in part anyway, at first blush to what Monte has brought forward as being good points, and if there are further ones, I will see that they are brought up at the next meeting.

Mr Christopherson: Okay, then the only amendment, revision to that is that since we tabled first and went through ours, then the official opposition presented theirs and we went through those this morning, I would suggest, Mr Chair, that we return to our original document and walk through those and find out where we have got some common ground. In fact, maybe at that time, as we move through, if the Liberal members want to point out where we are close to proposals they have, we can maybe look at some kind of meshing at that time. Those things that clearly there is disagreement on, we will set aside for the time being, and then when we are finished our document, go back to the Liberal document, and anything that has not been discussed, we would review at that time with the same intent.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, this is a point of procedure. What I assume happened after the meeting this morning is that the proposals that were put forward by the official opposition were discussed and some were approved, moderately approved, totally rejected, things of that kind. It would be helpful to me to know which ones were in each category, because some of these things really overlap some of the recommendations that were made by the government, and if I knew that this was, for example, recommendation 1 and if I knew that was, in principle, acceptable, that could go to your number one recommendation, which is to participate in some task force. If there was agreement that there would be a lead minister, we could incorporate all of that into one recommendation.

It would certainly be helpful to me if I knew what the feeling was as to what areas were non-starters, and then, of course, we have the option of putting it into a minority report. But it would be helpful to me to know where there was general agreement, so we would be able to look at your recommendations in a different light, as we could then incorporate them.

Mr Cousens: I like the approach that has been tabled by Mr Kwinter. I think in that way we can go through your proposals. Have they been gone through in detail by the committee?

Mr Christopherson: If I can, Mr Chairman, my point answers your question. I was on a different committee when our document was tabled, but it is my understanding that a similar process took place with that document that took place this morning. So it just seems natural to me that we would return to the original document and I think, Monte, all the things you would like to see happen, as we get to number one of ours and we are talking about it, at that point you say, because you know your document better than anyone, "Hey, I think our number one has some room; what do you guys think?" Then we will take it from there and then just move through ours. When we are done ers, we will move immediately to yours and talk about any recommendations that have not been dealt with. I think that is fair.

Mr Kwinter: Okay.

The Chair: Would you like to proceed then?

Mr Kwinter: Thank you, Mr Chair. Recommendation 1: "That the province of Ontario participate with the federal government and the municipalities in a tri-level task force on cross-border shopping." I will let that stand.

The Chair: Should we just deal with that one the way it is? Does anybody have any problems with that?

Mr Cousens: Do you include the regional governments at that point? Is that what you mean by municipalities or do you want to say the regional municipalities and the local government? In some cases there are not regional municipalities. I mean, down in Brockville you do not have it.

Mr Christopherson: I think there is already a group coalition of municipalities that have offered themselves as representatives to participate on such a task force. That came out a couple of weeks back, when that request and suggestion was first made by municipalities.

If I can just push ahead a little, Mr Chair, item 2 is, "That individual ministries that have an interest in cross-border shopping continue to gather more data on the impact on their ministry and continue to work with local organizations in dealing with the issue." I would suggest that both of those and the recommendation 1 that came from the official opposition this morning could be refreshed—I think that is what we are looking at, just a general agreement—and then we will ask our staff to pull this together based on our discussions. Then in terms of just one minister—again, we are not really keen on a superminister—but a minister be designated who would be the representative on the task force and who would be responsible for co-ordinating the other ministries that are impacted, both the gathering of information and the generating and presenting of recommendations from the various ministries.

In your last point, Monte, the new paragraph, you have caught us flat-footed, and I suspect we might have a little bit of difficulty with talking about specific goals other than to recognize the expediency that we want things to move in. If you could perhaps expand on that to raise our comfort level on it, I think we are open to it. What we do not want to do, obviously, is allow ourselves to be boxed into something that we are going to regret later.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, if I can just comment, there are two separate issues here. One is that a task force, which is going to consist of federal, provincial, municipal, regional, whatever it is—there should be participation. We have no quarrel with that. If there is going to be a task force, we should be there.

The concern I have is that—and I alluded to it this morning—I would hate to see the province of Ontario, in a task force that had representation, say, from New Brunswick and Quebec and British Columbia and whoever else was in there, come back and say, "Well, this is what the task force decided and unfortunately it didn't address all of our concerns but we were part of the task force and it is a democracy and there had to be some kind of accommodation."

My concern and the reason for our first recommendation is that it is all well and good that we should participate in a task force. If that is going to do some good for us, that is great. But on the other hand, I think we should not be totally captured by that task force, so that if there are things that can be done in Ontario, for Ontario, that we do not have someone who is pursuing that. It may in fact be outside of what the task force is doing.

I can tell you, this is something that is a very practical problem. When I was the Minister of Financial Institutions, I would go to ministerial meetings, and because the financial institutions were so prevalent and dominant in Ontario, everybody else used to tune out. They had no real interest in what was happening with financial institutions. When you talk about déjà vu, I remember meeting with Connie Osterman, who was the financial institutions minister in Alberta, and telling her that unless she took a look at her trust companies and some of the problems there, she was going to find herself in trouble. She said: "There are no problems. We don't have your kind of problems." If you have been following what happened a couple of years later, they had lots of problems. She had to resign as a result of it.

The point I am making is that Ontario is relatively unique in economic terms in Canada. It has 42% of all of the economic activity, and things that impact in Ontario do not necessarily impact on other provinces that may have a problem. I just want to make sure that is not the resolution that is going to be there, that whatever this task force does, that is going to be our response to the problem.

Mr Christopherson: I think I can jump in and alleviate your concerns. I do not think it is in our best interests to allow ourselves to get hedged in that way either. If you want to throw in a clause—and I just jotted down the beginning of a clause, "Blah, blah, blah, shall not prevent the Ontario government from pursuing independent actions"—something that raises that comfort level, I do not think that is a problem at all.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, maybe it is more of a question than trying to combine the Liberals' recommendation 1 with recommendation 2, more or less in terms of the co-ordinated approach of the ministries gathering more information, and just leave recommendation 1 in and of itself. That will allow for both to deal with those concerns.

Mr Kwinter: I have no problem with that.

Mr Christopherson: Whatever works. I think you hear our willingness to recognize your concern and to ensure that the concern is alleviated in the language and the format of the recommendations.

Mr B. Ward: For clarification, Mr Chairman, do we have consensus that we leave recommendation 1 alone and incorporate recommendation 2 with Monte's recommendation 1?

Mr Christopherson: Maybe at this point it would be a good time to just leave the staff with our general understanding.

Mr Phillips: Let them take a look at it.

Mr Christopherson: They are very good, I have found, at the nuances.

Mr B. Ward: The flavour of the discussions.

The Chair: I think there is a consensus around the merging of the two.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, I would agree that we need recommendation 1, but the government's recommendation 2 is really a laissez-faire kind of attitude, that those who have an interest continue to gather additional data and "to work with local organizations in dealing with the issue." What our recommendation 1 is saying is that we want one minister to be designated, we want him to take action, we want him to be proactive, to go out there and do it.

Mr Christopherson: If you want to walk away from today's meeting with an understanding that your recommendation 1 and our recommendation 2 will be merged in the draft that comes forward, we do not have a problem with that.

Mr Kwinter: Okay.

Mr Phillips: Someone once said, "We don't have to say it, they know what we are thinking." Who said that?

Mr Daigeler: I wonder who that was.

Mr Christopherson: You had better watch it, Gerry, because I think I can go back to some Hansards at this very committee where you said: "Dave, don't worry too much about the details. The staff are really good at taking care of that for us. It has to come back for our approval," etc, etc.

Mr Daigeler: When he speaks, it can be printed.

Mr Christopherson: "If you do not like that one, we have another one," right?

The Chair: Could I just ask at this point if all the committee members are happy with this recommendation 1 merging with the general recommendation from the government's paper? Is that agreed? Agreed.

Mr Christopherson: Moving to our next recommendation, the first one is, "That the Canadian interest rate differential with the United States be reduced to more traditional levels," and second, "That the Canadian dollar be allowed to decline to a more realistic level." Obviously the preamble there is just recommendations that we would make to the federal government that we feel would assist us.

Mr Kwinter: I have a few problems with the wording. Who is to say what was traditional is now relevant? What I would prefer is that the federal government be urged not to hold the interest rates up artificially. What may have been traditional in the past may no longer be relevant. It may be something we will never see again.

Notwithstanding the political rhetoric, I do not think governments have too much say as to what the world market decides the value of their dollar is. I have given this lecture so many times, but just very briefly, the reason the dollar is where it is is that the interest rates are where they are. Interest rates are where they are because the central bank has made a policy decision to keep them at those artificially high levels to try to dampen inflation. Once the interest rates are allowed to find their own level, then the dollar will find its own level, but that level may not be the traditional relationship with the United States, and that is the point I want to make.

Mr Christopherson: It is a good point and we accept it. I am not sure our friend from the third party does, but we do.

Mr Cousens: The intent of where both the government and the opposition want to go is coincident with the direction that I share. In other words, I agree, but the terminology used by the former minister—and it is just a matter of interpretation and words. Interest rates, I feel, are at too high a level and need to be reduced. They really have to come down dramatically and I think it will stimulate the economy. The word "artificial" is open to interpretation, how real or artificial it is. Let's just sort of move towards more competitive interest rates within this country and allow us to become even more competitive outside this marketplace, so remove that "artificial."

I just do not like the wording, as much as anything. I like the direction you are taking, but change the intent of how you are saying it. If it is going into a report, I could not support the way you have put it here.

Mr Kwinter: We do not have the word "artificial." The point is that the central bank has the authority to set its rate of interest, the rate that it charges to the banks. That, in turn, reflects on what the interest rates are generally. They use that as a matter of government policy to either have tight money or loose money. At the present time, they have had a policy of having tight money because they have felt that the number one economic concern of this country is inflation.

Notwithstanding that the United States feels differently and there is a five-point spread, that is what they are doing. That is a matter of government policy. If the government decided, for whatever reason, that it wanted to subsidize interest rates and it wanted to drive them down to 5% and pay people a subsidized premium, it could do that as well. So it is in fact using those interest rates as a matter of economic policy. Although the term "artificial" may grate, what I am saying is that it is not allowed to find its own level; it is being stimulated by policy.

Mr Cousens: Having said that, I agree. I think it is an excellent recommendation as long as you understand that "traditional"—I mean, what should interest rates be? Did the committee ever come up with an idea of what they should be?

Mr Sutherland: Could I just clarify? The focus of this recommendation was not on where Canadian interest rates by themselves should be; it is in terms of more traditional differential levels between ours and the American rates. We heard evidence in the pre-budget consultation that that is where there has been a change. We know that Canadian interest rates have come down significantly, really, over the last few months, but we still have not seen any impact on the dollar, because of that differential. Again, "traditional" may not be the appropriate word even for describing the differential, but it is key. The focus of is recommendation is the differential between ours and the American rates, rather than just what our rates are.

Mr Cousens: I concur with that.

The Chair: I might also interject that the dollar is artificially kept high by the feds buying Canadian dollars in the international market, and that would have an impact on what you are saying.

Mr Cousens: You have agreement. It is how it is worded, in such a way that I do not offend my own other conscience.

Mr Kwinter: Do you have a sense of what we are talking about?

Ms Anderson: I think so.

The Chair: Is it fair for me to say at this point that there is a consensus around the idea and that we can revisit this when the draft comes back? Okay.

Ms M. Ward: Another point on that: I think what we are really looking at too is not just the difference between Canadian and American interest rates but the real interests which you have to take into account, because that is what you are looking at, what your interest rate is and what your inflation is. That is often what you see mentioned, the difference between the inflation rate in the United States and their interest rate, and what the situation is in Canada. That is just an additional point I thought we should consider.

The Chair: Is there any further debate on that point, anything else we would like to add? No? Can we then move on to the next point.

Mr Christopherson: I think so. Okay, number two, any problem with the way it is worded?

The Chair: "Border Controls," is that where we are?

Mr Christopherson: "That the Canadian dollar be allowed to decline to a more realistic level."

Mr Cousens: What do you mean by realistic? Is there any sense as to what that is?

Mr Sutherland: Actually, if I may, we also heard in our pre-budget consultations—I believe it was Alex Thomson from the Royal Bank and a few others—some said as low as 81 or 82, some said maybe even a bit higher, 83, but certainly at least three to four cents lower, minimum, from where it is now. Again, that wording may need to be adjusted.

Mr Kwinter: There are two sort of forces dealing with what the dollar rate should be. Manufacturers, exporters look at it and they say, "If I had the dollar down to 78 cents or 79 cents, I could really be competitive." I remember when the dollar was going up. You have to remember that when the free trade agreement started, it was at 72. When I had people appear before my committee, they said if it ever got to 80 or 81, we would be finished. They thought that was the top level of tolerance where they could be competitive, and now of course it is around 87.

What is happening is that that figure is a direct result of the interest rates. What the government is controlling are the interest rates. It is not controlling the level of the dollar. The market is controlling the level of the dollar. We do not have enough money in Canada to support our dollar to the point where we can artificially maintain it anywhere. What is happening is that if there is a 5% spread between what the US banks are paying and what Canadian banks are paying, people offshore are buying Canadian dollars because they are getting a 5% greater return on their investment. That, in turn, is making the dollar valuable, and that is what is putting the price up. If you reduce the interest rates, it becomes less attractive. There is no way the central government can say, "We are going to take our dollar to 71 cents."

The Chair: I think Mr Cousens was next.

Mr Cousens: I like what Monte just said, so I defer.

Mr Sutherland: If I may, then maybe what we need to do is take this recommendation 2 and somewhat add it on, as that is the goal of some of the interest rate differential in terms of that.

Mr Kwinter: What I would suggest is we combine 1 and 2 and talk about dealing with the interest rates, which in effect will give a positive impact on the value of the dollar. As I say, I do not think it is a practical situation to tell anybody, "You've got to change the value of the dollar."

Mr Sutherland: Sure, but as I say, the intent of the interest rates was to have some impact on the dollar, so tying them together seems like a good idea.

Mr B. Ward: I may be nitpicking, and it probably would not happen, but if the federal government listened to this committee's recommendations in its wisdom and did allow the interest rates to be lowered, I would hate for the federal government, through the Bank of Canada, to artificially keep the dollar high. If interest rates go down, the Canadian dollar should go down, but sometimes they intercede.

Mr Kwinter: Let me tell you something that is really quite interesting. Interest rates have been falling quite dramatically and the dollar is going up. The reason—that is the point that was made; I cannot remember whether it was made by Kimble or somebody—why it is still going up is the differential that they can make that spread. So it does not matter if the interest rates go down to 8%—

Mr B. Ward: The point I was trying to make was I would not want to see the federal government intercede to artificially keep the dollar high. As long as the market forces are there, it will go down.

Mr Kwinter: They do not have enough money to do that, but right now interest rates are coming down quite dramatically. They are down just at the 10% level and slightly below that. The dollar has never been higher in modern times; it is up around 87 cents.

Mr Christopherson: Can I suggest that we let staff take a crack at what they have heard here? I realize we have not reached a consensus yet and in some things it is best to sometimes let someone take stab at it and then we will look at it in the draft and recognize that this is something we may ultimately not agree on, but let them take a crack at it and then both of us will review what is presented.

Mr Cousens: Agreed.

Mr Christopherson: I will read quickly 1 through 5 just to enter it into Hansard.

"1. That the federal government collect the provincial sales tax at all border crossings.

"2. That if unwilling to collect the PST, then Ontario revenue officials be permitted to review remitted customs forms for the purpose of collecting PST, similar to New York, Pennsylvania and California.

"3. That fast-track lanes should be established solely for American tourists and not for Canadians shoppers returning to Canada.

"4. That more customs staff be hired for greater enforcement.

"5. That the government work with border states to collect our PST on state-exempt products coming into Ontario."

Mr Cousens: Was there a gathering of a consensus on that? I apologize that I have not had the pleasure of being here for all your committee hearings.

Mr Christopherson: It is certainly our loss.

Mr Cousens: I can believe that. I really can.

Mr Christopherson: Then I have got some swamp land for you.

Mr Cousens: I could not afford it with the way the taxes are.

Is there any chance that this committee could support that the federal government collect the provincial sales tax right across the province? Is this the wrong time to bring that kind of suggestion up? What happens is that we need to develop some new habits in tax collection, the whole duplication all over this country.

Mr Sutherland: Can I get a clarification of what Mr Cousens just said? He said, "the federal government collect the provincial sales tax right across the province," not just at border crossings.

Mr Cousens: That is right.

Mr Sutherland: Is that what you were saying?

Mr Cousens: That is just what I said. What is the answer to that? Does the committee have a consensus on that one? Because then that would really mean you just have one collection agency right across the whole province and reduce the cost of collecting it.

Mr Daigeler: The previous standing committee on finance and economic affairs had in fact a recommendation somewhat to that effect. So it would not be a totally new idea to put that forward, not that the committee said it should be done, but that a serious study should be taking a look at the possibilities.

Mr Christopherson: I do not know that we would be really comfortable with that at this stage in terms of the context of this report. I think if the opposition parties want to make that recommendation in terms of tax collection and revenue policies, then there is a time and a place for it, but I do not think we would be too comfortable with that in this report.

Mr Sutherland: That might be one issue to be examined under point 3 of the taxation issues that we put forward, where we call upon another task force of all levels of government "to examine the issue of duplication of services and division of responsibilities." That might be one of the items they could examine at that point.

Mr Cousens: Maybe there could just be some reference that there be a future study into that as something that opens it up.

The Chair: Could I perhaps take this one at a time? Is there any debate on the first part of "Border Controls" "That the federal government collect the provincial sales tax at all border crossings"?

Mr Cousens: I would just have to say that there are an awful lot of border crossings. It is a good step forward and I support it, but I also think that it really has to be expanded far beyond that because of all the problems we are having in this country with the duplication of tax collection mechanisms. So I support it, it is a step in the right direction, but I put the qualifier on it and say, "Come on, guys and gals across the province of Ontario, we are digging holes for ourselves because of all the tax collectors we're paying."

Mr B. Ward: Is it possible to merge recommendation 4 of the Liberals into that item 1 under border controls? It basically says the same thing.

The Chair: Are you asking me if it is okay? The committee has to make that decision.

Mr B. Ward: Okay. It is the same.

Mr Christopherson: If I can, just so that we are clear at least on where we are coming from, to Don, I think we are going to have a disagreement on that one and if you feel that needs to go to the next step, then I think you need to look at that individually.

Mr Cousens: Your intent of what you are aiming for here, I am with you. There are other ways of starting that battle.

Mr Christopherson: I am sure we will deal with it.

The Chair: Can I get a consensus that 4 and what is here are the same? Okay? Thank you.

The second part: "That if unwilling to collect the PST, then Ontario revenue officials be permitted to review remitted customs forms for the purpose of collecting PST similar to New York, Pennsylvania and California." Do I have a consensus on that, or further discussion?

Mr Kwinter: I would be a little more comfortable with that if I had some indication from our research staff whether or not this would in fact be feasible under the free trade agreement; whether it would constitute a non-tariff barrier or whether or not there would be reciprocity. I do not think these things can be done unilaterally.

Mr Sutherland: If you remember, after John Winter was here, he sent us another article that he had cut out which indicated that that was going on in those three states. That is why that recommendation has been put forward. So I can hardly see how they could do that type of thing in New York, Pennsylvania and California and then see how it would violate the free trade agreement.

Mr Kwinter: What happens is that lots of practices are carried out, and as long as there is not a concern as ng as it does not get any profile, they just happen. But the minute it becomes a cause célèbre, suddenly someone launches an action. Before you know it, you are in the bunal.

I would just feel a little more comfortable if we had someone just take a look at it and get an opinion as to whether or not this in fact would create any problems.

Mr Christopherson: Without taking a definitive stand on the substantive issue, let's ask the researchers to give us that information and then we will take a look at it.

The Chair: Okay. "Border Controls" number 3, "That fast-track lanes should be established solely for American tourists and not for Canadian shoppers returning to Canada."

Mr Kwinter: I have a problem dealing with the politics of it. I think for a government to impose these restrictions on its own citizens without imposing them on other people is going to be a political problem. I think people who will be coming back to Ontario will be saying, "Why are these Americans getting preferential treatment when I've been here and I don't get this sort of thing?" without there being some kind of reciprocity going the other way. Again, it may present some problems. I do not know exactly, but it may create more problems than it solves.

Mr Cousens: I share the sentiments that have just been expressed by Mr Kwinter and I guess it depends on the amount of delinquency that we continue to experience in cross-border shopping. If people are continuing to have large numbers of merchandise that are coming through and which we are not collecting our sales tax on, then we will have to continue to stop just every car and collect it. I think that is really what it amounts to. Because if it turns out that everybody is cheating, then I would make sure that we start collecting as it comes across. As it improves, I think that you statistically are in a position to know that every fifth car you are going to have enough there to remind them.

It is the same as when you have speed checks on Highway 401. It takes a while for people to settle in and realize you are going to get a ticket every time you speed between Yonge Street and Highway 427, and it brought the traffic speeds down along in that section when the provincial police monitored it more closely.

Therefore, when you come in with a policy statement that could have a continuing long-term segregation of Canadians from Americans, I think it poses a set of questions as to our own freedoms as citizens in coming back and forth across the border. I would say that what we really want to temper the motion with is a sense that as long as there is going to be a continuation of abuse of the laws of our country as people are coming back, then there will be a closer scrutiny of all people coming through without a separation of fast- and slow-tracking.

Mr Sutherland: A couple of points here: First of all, this recommendation is to deal with the PACE pilot project, which is the one in British Columbia where they are fast-tracking Canadians coming back across the border where you can just pull up, fill out the form yourself, pay whatever duty, put it in the envelope and go on your merry way. We certainly did not agree that that was a way of dealing with cross-border shopping. As a matter of fact, we just thought that was going to encourage more cross-border shopping. So it is kind of a response to that.

I guess the other thing that relates to this specific recommendation is, we have seen where US Customs now has its auto pass and it is offering that to Canadian citizens going through, I believe, at the Niagara Falls border or Fort Erie, one of them now, and maybe if not this specific recommendation, then Canada Customs should be looking at something like an auto pass for American residents coming through as well, because that is a way of fast-tracking.

The other related issue to the whole issue of cross-border shopping is the fact that the number of American tourists has declined. You can debate what all the reasons are, but there certainly is a general feeling that they simply cannot get across the border because of the long lineups of Canadian tourists coming back. So that is really what we are trying to deal with, those three issues, with this recommendation.

Mr Hansen: I know what Don is talking about there, but the fast-track lane should be established solely for American tourists, not for Canadian shoppers. Those are people who have something to declare. I think the wording just needs to be changed a little bit, because if I go over to school in the United States, which I did for years, I do not want to be held up by people who have to do declarations. I have gone there for one purpose, to go over to school, visit my aunt over there, whatever the case may be.

We are talking about non-shoppers. What is written in here is a Canadian shopper and they are just going to slow up the traffic coming back in if you have all these shoppers making declarations in this express lane. So I think it is mainly the wording here and I think you would go along with that, Don, that maybe we just change the wording a little bit there to make it look more like it is a Canadian shopper who has something to declare.

Mr Cousens: There is a concept involved and I like the balance that Mr Hansen is coming in with, but you see, if we have more customs staff hired—and we have got to have greater enforcement, and I have a belief that once we have stricter enforcement, number 3 is not going to be as required as it is right now. I think we need a lot more enforcement right now, but that is just one guy's view right now and I hope it diminishes to an extent that we can go back to traditional levels.

Mr Hansen: I think more enforcement will slow down the process also, so you are going to wind up, if you do not have these fast-track lanes—but I can tell you, I can remember going to school. You brought something back worth $2 at that time, you did not dare bring it back in case they would impound the car. As it is now, there are so many going across, everybody says: "They're not going to do anything to me. I'll go through the express lane that I haven't got anything. If I get caught, I'll just pay $10 or $15 or lose the bottle of whisky." I think the enforcement is a very important part of it on these express lanes, so that if you get caught in there, it might cost you a lot more than just paying the duty on a bottle of whisky or a carton of cigarettes.

Mr Christopherson: Are we maybe comfortable at the point where maybe we would ask staff if they want to recommend a word change? The intent, obviously, when we do these, is that staff is asked to try to find a common ground in terms of the language and we will take a political stand based on that at our next meeting. Okay?

Mr B. Ward: I think the intent was that we should be encouraging American tourists to come as quickly as possible.

Mr Hansen: Could we use the word "visitors"? That would cover "Canadian", because that could be a visitor in the United States returning back to Canada. It could be an American tourist or a Japanese tourist, or visitor.

The Chair: Are we comfortable with that section?

"4. That more customs staff be hired for greater enforcement." Can we be happy with that?

"5. That the government work with border states to collect our PST on state-exempt products coming into Ontario."

Mr Kwinter: Can I just get clarification of exactly what is being addressed with that?

Mr Hansen: I gave the example of what was happening at the border as it is right now, that if you go over and order a pool in the States, they will bring it back over here to Ontario. As it is now, they take the state tax off, they do not add 8% on over there. There is no duty. You only pay the 7% GST and the duty on the pool, which might be 8.5%. They tell you clearly that there is no Ontario sales tax coming in. These products are coming in exempt, but if it was a rule that anything sold in New York state, that dealer when he is bringing it to the border would have to collect that money for the Ontario government at the point of sale—

Mr Kwinter: The reason I am querying it is, why is it any different than recommendation 1?

The Chair: Could I help there a little? Recommendation 1 is collecting sales tax at the border. If I understand Mr Hansen's explanation, you are asking the vendor in New York, say, to collect the Ontario sales tax and remit that and become a tax collector for the province of Ontario.

Mr Hansen: We are looking at a whole bunch of areas here. If we can collect at this point until we get an agreement with the federal government, it is one step forward. Rather than taking one big giant step, let's take some little steps to get to this point. Then maybe we can explain to the federal government: "Look, we already are doing this. It would make it a lot simpler if the collection could be done right at the border all at once."

Mr Kwinter: My question is that if the federal government decided tomorrow that it would in fact collect the provincial sales tax, there would be no reason to have that particular provision.

Mr Hansen: That is correct.

Mr Kwinter: That is where I was a little confused. I thought that if you get both of these recommendations, you do not need both. I do not know whether you want to do it because it immediately sends a signal out you do not expect the federal government to collect the tax, but what I am saying is that there should be some mention in there that if the federal tax is not being collected, then at the very least this should be done.

Mr Hansen: I think the staff should change the sentence at the beginning, rework it there to make an explanation that if it is not collected at the border then possibly this is another area that can be done.

Mr Christopherson: I am seeing an indication from staff that they are comfortable with what we have said.

Mr B. Ward: Ron has been talking about that pool since we started the meeting.

Mr Christopherson: All his neighbours have one.

The next page takes us to our next subject, under the heading of "Retailing and Marketing." I will read it for the record:

"1. That Ontario retailers become more aggressive in their marketing through the use of such techniques as discount cards for American shoppers, more selective advertising, and putting American prices in ads.

"2. The Ontario Milk Marketing Board (OMMB), grocery distributors, retailers, gas companies and their dealers engage in a joint marketing strategy involving coupon exchanges for milk and gasoline.

"(3) That retailers increase staff training and product knowledge and service."

I think now might be an ample opportunity, Monte, for you to jump in with some of the recommendations you made about the Ontario seal, and see if we cannot mesh this.

Mr Kwinter: In this whole retailing and marketing area we really cover some of the same things and expand a bit more, and that really has to do with recommendations 6, 7, and 8, our three recommendations that cover the same areas. When we talk about the service culture, we deal with it in your recommendation 3, recommendation 6 is covered in some way in recommendation 2, and our recommendation 8 deals with recommendation 1, so if we could just incorporate the good parts of ours and get rid of the bad parts of yours, or vice versa—

Interjections.

Mr Kwinter: I said "or vice versa."

Mr Cousens: Look at this one here in recommendation 6 that the member for Wilson Heights brought in, in paragraph 2, "as announced by the Liberals." I mean, gracious sakes. The fact is that they still have not been done and they are still not all in place, but we have a high goal and expectation. It is still a good recommendation, except for those few words.

Mr Christopherson: We accept the fact that the opening gambits are entitled to be as partisan as hell, as the closing positions of everyone can be as partisan as everyone likes, but the middle ground, when the staff come back, is going to be as neutral as possible and that will be the formal report.

Mr Cousens: I just let you know that I am still awake.

Mr Christopherson: On behalf of the government, we would be comfortable to let the staff take a run at that eshing, similar to what Monte has outlined, and see what e come up with in the draft.

Mr Cousens: Could I add one recommendation? Whether or not it fits in here, there is a tremendously large misunderstanding among American visitors to our country who do not realize that the GST is a recoverable tax when they cross back into the States. Is this the place where we could do a little bit of promotion on the positive side for visitors to our country on going back, because I do not think we are doing it all that well right now. They are discouraged from coming across the border because of the value of the dollar and because of the lineups and a number of other reasons. There really have got to be two things. One is a better explanation to US shoppers coming into the country that they can recover the GST portion of the tax. That would be one recommendation. The second one I think has to be done is the extent to which we are advertising and promoting in the United States to get shoppers to come up here. Is that a part of the equation that this committee is looking at or are we only or exclusively worried about Canadians shopping in the US?

Mr Hansen: If you read "Retailing and Marketing," you have to understand we have been talking about this for about two months now, so we have sort of condensed it. That Ontario retailers become more aggressive in their marketing" and then we got a few examples, but we already went over the rebates at the border, the Ontario sales tax and the 7%, so we sort of incorporated that right in here.

Mr Cousens: That is included.

Mr Hansen: Being here for a long period of time, and talking in one day, I understand the problems. We all know this already, in a sense, but we just did not lay it all out.

Mr Cousens: That is included in the thinking—

Mr Hansen: Yes, the marketing aspect of it.

The Chair: It does raise an interesting point, though, about making sure that when the report is written people who are reading it for the first time will understand that.

Mr Duignan: I quite like Mr Cousens's suggestion, especially if we do it the same way it is done in some of the European Community countries, where actually the retailers do an aggressive campaign around the whole idea to visitors that they can get their tax back when they leave the points of entry, both at airports and at border crossings. They have a really aggressive campaign, and hopefully his committee has taken a look at that.

Mr Cousens: I appreciate that. The other half of the equation, though, is the extent to which we are trying to attract American visitors to this country. Is that part of your discussions or presentation at all? It is not as explicit in the three recommendations here as I would maybe have liked to have seen it.

Mr Sutherland: Going back to the border crossings, I think that was one area where we had mentioned about the fast-track lanes in terms of helping and abetting. If need be, if we want to list a few options under "Retailing and Marketing" to give people some advice, we tried doing that in ours in terms of just picking up on some of the things we heard, such as the discount cards. I think again of Goodyear or Goodrich down in St Catharines which now advertises the American price for tires along with its price when it is putting ads in the local paper, so people know what the true difference is. There are those types of things. We are hoping that people will be able to pick up on what the different techniques are if they have some of the background information attached to the report.

Mr Hansen: I think one thing we are looking at here is actually how we could stop the stream of shopping over the border, but we do have the problem there and try to realize some of the other problems that we have at present and try to correct a few of them as we are going along with this report. This fast lane would help the tourist industry here in Ontario also. We are looking at some other things other than just people going over the river and shopping, but what are the complications at the borders?

Mr Cousens: I guess I am raising a point that has been a hobbyhorse for me for some time. It has to do with the attractiveness of the Ontario marketplace to outsiders, and our environment, our history, our way of life, our culture. There are so many things that make people want to come to Ontario. During the regime of the last several years, the advertising has not been all that effective in increasing the number of American tourists. In fact, there has been a decline over the last several years for a combination of reasons, the cost of the dollar and whatever reasons.

To me, it could be one way from within this committee, to go back to the province, to the Ministry of Tourism and Recreation to increase—I do not want to say the money, but to make sure that they are giving a good focus to American tourists on why they should be coming into Ontario and what the advantages are so that we have got an effective program to entice or to encourage or to trap, to bring across the border people with money and something to do within our economy. I just think this could well be a place to do it. We are talking about retailers doing advertising, but the province also has to have an effective mechanism to make it happen.

Mr Duignan: Again, I have to agree with Mr Cousens. The problem of cross-border shopping is two-way. We have to stop the flow going to the States as well as encouraging tourists to come here. I was recently in Europe and some countries aggressively market the whole idea of getting the tax back to attract tourists to their countries. It is done very simply. What happens is that when you buy something in a store, you take your receipt and go to the local service desk. They fill out a form and when you leave that country, you put it in a slot and the revenue people of that particular country mail you the tax back in the form of a cheque. Or in some cases you actually get it back on the spot, at the border crossings. I think the committee should seriously take a look at that and make some recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: I think again, as Mr Hansen has pointed out, it is unfortunate that the two previous speakers have not been here to listen to the development of the discussions. When we get to page 5, there is a comprehensive recommendation there that deals with what is under the heading of "Education."

Mr Cousens: We do not go to page 5.

Mr Christopherson: Sorry. Mine is a copy that has more of the explanatory notes on it for members of the committee. I understand in the pages that you have it is on page 3.

Interjection: It gives you the bare facts.

Mr Christopherson: That is right, just the facts. It is like Dragnet. Anyway, that should cover the concerns both the previous speakers have.

Interjections.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, I believe recommendation 2 is in order.

Mr Kwinter: Where are we now?

Mr Christopherson: Recommendation 2 under "Retailing and Marketing."

The Chair: The Ontario Milk Marketing Board?

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

The Chair: Does anybody have any comments?

Mr Kwinter: Other than it should be incorporated with our recommendation 6.

The Chair: Okay, 6, 7, 8.

Mr Kwinter: Recommendation 6 really addresses number 2, recommendation 7 addresses number 3 and recommendation 8 addresses number 1—those three areas.

Mr Sutherland: If I can just add, on number 2, anyone looking at that should not look at it as limiting by only mentioning the milk marketing board. I think there is a lot of option there for other of the supply management areas to become involved in that type of marketing scheme.

Mr Kwinter: Why don't we just take out "Ontario Milk" and leave "marketing boards?"

Mr Kwinter: Okay, sure.

Mr Phillips: What about the brewers? I would like to see brewers included.

Interjection: Beer in corner stores.

Interjection: It worked once, you know.

Mr Phillips: Where did Floyd get his shoes resoled?

The Chair: I have a place in my riding, and he really is very good. Just throw them in a bag and I will get them done.

Mr Cousens: On 3, one of the things is that probably for every good deed that is done, only two or three people hear about it. For every bad deed that is done, about 10 people find out about it.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, we found that out.

Mr Cousens: Yes, we did in 1985 too.

As it stands now, what happens is that you have some retailers out there who are just insensitive to the needs of visitors to their community and their shops and so on. I do not know how you do it. The Better Business Bureau is probably one of the better ways in which we, as a community, police ourselves. Probably the best policeman is when people stop shopping at a store because the stores do not do it.

To me, when you start talking about point 3 you are talking about chambers of commerce and ways in which we, as a government, are working with the community so they can help themselves and build those marketing things.

It becomes rather an empty statement. It is almost like the preacher in church saying to the empty pews that they should be filled. What you want to find is a way of getting a mechanism so those storekeepers who are not really being responsive and doing their job are really responding to the opportunities that are on their doorstep.

The fact of the matter is that a tremendous amount of stuff is done through the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology to give them data and information on the types of people who are coming across and the types of people in their communities—learning workshops, marketing programs. It is a matter now of not just saying "the retailers increase...." It can well involve all levels, where the government is working with the community and through the boards of trade and chambers of commerce to make that circle complete.

To me it would embellish that fact with a little bit more meaningful meat if it had some of those tangents on it to make that happen, rather than just a bold statement. We are never going to get the dumb retailers. They will just be out of business and they will have missed it. The opportunists and entrepreneurs will find ways of finding that.

Mr Sutherland: I think Mr Cousens's direction in terms of the support MITT gives is fine. We had MITT in and we know the support it is in terms of marketing and other areas. Recommendation 3 was specific—staff training, development, product knowledge—because several of the surveys done in the cross-border communities highlighted that service was one of the areas—obviously not the major one or the only one, but it seemed to be a consistent area coming up—where there was some concern.

We also had a couple of presentations here where we know of areas where they do very good training. The shoe retailers' association indicated that it has a specific program designed for many of its retailers in terms of product knowledge and service and training, but there were other areas that seemed to be severely lacking. Some of us, from our own personal experience, thought that staff training in some cases was poor. That is why we have focused specifically on retailers. That is not to take away from the comments you made about MITT, but that was one specific point that was highlighted.

Mr Kwinter: On that point, the difference between our recommendation 7 and your recommendation 3 under "Retailing and Marketing" is that your recommendation 3 calls for retailers to increase their staff training on product knowledge and service. What we are saying is that this should be part of the skills development program and that the government should take the role, realizing that instead of training there are other areas of skills training. Most people think it is teaching someone to operate a computer teaching someone to operate a machine tool, but it is just as valid to teach someone to provide a service. That it could not be sloughed off as being, "Well, that's something that can be done by non-professionals," or something that can be done just on their own. That is a valid training program that generates business revenue and economic development.

Mr Christopherson: Your point is well taken. We accept the concept you are putting forward.

The Chair: "Sourcing and Distribution."

Mr Christopherson: Under that heading, number 1, "That a more comprehensive analysis of wholesaling and distribution network be undertaken to examine the reasons for the extra cost and alternatives," and number 2, "That the committee does not support increased foreign sourcing for products manufactured in Canada." I believe this may nicely with the Liberals' recommendation 9.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, I have no problem with number 1. Number 2 is a weird statement. I am sure it was not intended to be, but if you read it, it really says we do not support foreign sourcing for products manufactured in Canada, which means we should not be buying Canadian products in foreign countries. That is not obviously what you are saying. What you are really saying is that we should not be buying a foreign product if that same product or a comparable product is made in Canada. I assume that is what that is meant to say. It is not what it says, but that is what it is meant to say. Is that correct?

Mr Christopherson: The correction stands, yes. You are right.

Mr Kwinter: The point then is that we get to the basic philosophical problem of cross-border shopping. Today the Minister of Revenue stood up and said, "We are not going to in any way prevent people from cross-border shopping." We are in a competitive situation. We have to try to make ourselves more competitive. In the final analysis and in the ultimate resolution, if we are not competitive there is nothing we can do about it. You are not going to stop people from going across that border and buying.

By the same token, if a product is made in Canada and costs 10 times what it does to make it anywhere else, it is very difficult to say we are not going to encourage people to buy it. What you really have to do, and it is coming up a little later on, is this whole educational program, that if it can be bought in Canada and if it is competitive, then buy Canadian. I think you will have a tough, tough time trying to tell someone, "Look, you're going to pay six times what it's worth, but it's made here, so buy it." They are going to look at you and laugh and they are going to say: "Thanks, but no thanks. I'm not going to buy it."

What you have to do of course is the whole restructuring of our economy. We are going to have to get out of that business where we are not competitive. And what we have to do is where we are competitive and where hopefully we will be competitive, we have to convince people they should be buying it here. I think there is a problem if you think you are going to be able to convince people to pay more for a product when they can buy it somewhere else just by a sort of program of saying "The job you save may be your own" or whatever it is. It is something that sounds wonderful when you are discussing it in a committee, but I can tell you, the guy who is sitting there is saying: "Screw you, I'm going over and I'm going to save some money and I'll worry about the other thing. I'm paying my taxes. You guys look after that. But if I can save the money, I'm going to save the money, because I've got lots of problems. I've got lots of bills to pay and I'm not just going to pay money just for the sake of paying it." That is a concern that I have.

Mr Duignan: I happened to be down in the southern part of the United States last week, and they have a campaign down there to buy made-in-USA products. There sometimes is quite a big differential between what they produce and what the foreign product was on that particular shelf. It was working very effectively down there as well. There were a number of slogans such as "Keep Your Jobs in the US," etc. I may not agree with how they worded some of them, but it is working and it is working very effectively down there.

Mr Kwinter: If I could just respond to that, I have a place in the States that I spend a bit of time in and I have seen those campaigns. With all due respect, those campaigns are waged by the unions, and rightfully so. They are trying to save their jobs. But I can tell you, when you go into shopping malls, people look at the price tag, they look at the quality, and if it is made in Yugoslavia or made in Taiwan or wherever it is made, if that is the product they want to buy, that is what they are going to buy. Without question, the hard-core unionists and the guys who are out there may say, "Look, I'm prepared to pay extra to save my job." But when you consider that the people who belong to unions represent about 30% of the population, the other 70%, and many of the ones even in that 30%, are going to shop their economic interests, all things being equal. I can tell you that my wife happens to be that kind of person. All things being equal, she is even prepared to pay a little premium if it is Canadian. She may be dumb but she is not stupid. She is not going to go somewhere and see a product that has exactly the same value, the same quality, and say, "I'm going to pay twice what this is, just because it is made in Canada." They are prepared to pay a premium, but you have to decide where that differential stops.

Ms M. Ward: I just wanted to comment on maybe where this recommendation came from, some of the background. I believe we heard one of the presenters talking about grocery products; I think it was Pepsi or Coke. He reported that the product could be bought much cheaper, the retail price was much lower in the States than the wholesale price was here in Canada. I think this might have been Mr Winter; I do not recall for sure. He said he did not know where in the distribution chain this happened, and there was discussion at that point about allowing retailers to go and buy in the States at the wholesale level to get the cheaper costs. I think that may be the source of that recommendation, that the retailers could go and buy the very same product, something like Coke or Pepsi, a lot more cheaply over there wholesale. Part of the difference, I assume, is in the distribution, maybe in labeling where we have the bilingual requirements.

The Chair: I think the retailers are saying that they wanted to use American distribution networks and that this was directed to say that—

Ms M. Ward: That is the point that I wanted to make.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, we have a situation that is quite interesting. The wife of one of our members has a retail store. She finds that she can buy cheaper at the Price Club than she can from her wholesaler, and that is in Ontario. It has got to the point where they set aside one day for retailers. The retailers come in, buy the product and then go out and sell it at a markup. They sell it at a price higher than what any individual can who is a member of the Price Club, by just going into it. Of course, what they trade on is the convenience of not having to go to the Price Club, which may be four, five, seven miles away. Again it gets back to the point where, if you are in business and you want to make a profit, you are going to buy where you can buy the cheapest and sell at the highest rate of return. If that means you are going to go across the border, then you are going to do it. You are not going to go out of business and salute the flag as you sink into this mire of bankruptcy and say, "I may have gone down, but boy, I bought Canadian all the way." It is just not going to happen. They are going to go out, and if need be, they are going to buy where they can buy it.

I have no problem at all with a campaign that highlights the fact that when you buy in the States you are doing yourself, you are doing your neighbour, you are doing the economy out of this economic thing and to try and encourage people to do it. Where I do have a problem is where there is an overt intent to almost prevent people from buying things just because they are cheaper and to say, "We don't want you to buy anything that's cheaper if it isn't made in Canada." That is where I have the problem.

Mr Duignan: Very briefly on that point, my whole point on the whole issue is that if people had a choice, and knew they had a choice because the made-in-America article was very clearly identified with a tag that said on it, "Made in the US," then the people have a choice whether to buy it or not buy it. I think that is an idea we could look at, that the stuff made in Canada is clearly identified as made in Canada with a tag on it.

Mr Christopherson: A couple of those points were covered under the recommendations. Certainly the discussion is not wasted or lost, because the explanations given by the former minister, who has a great deal of experience here, is respected and in many cases educational for new members of the Legislature.

However, if I could bring us back to the matter before us, on item 2 we could have the wording changed to correct the misunderstanding based on the way it is worded and a commitment to our colleagues across the way that we will review the principle based on what has been suggested here and see whether we want to remain firm or amend this in some fashion.

Mr Kwinter: If I could, I would like to suggest that should really be in conjunction with the last item, under education 1, because it really is part and parcel of the whole thing.

Mr Christopherson: We will take a look at that.

The Chair: "Taxation" is next.

Mr Christopherson: "1. That the Fair Tax Commission be encouraged to speed up its examination of the property tax base to fund municipal services.

"2. That the provincial government continue discussions with the municipalities over issues of responsibility and funding of services.

"3. That a task force between all three levels of government be established to examine the issue of duplication of services and division of responsibilities with the purpose of making all levels of government more efficient."

Mr Sutherland: I need to make one clarification on item 1, examination of the property tax base to fund municipal services. Maybe that should say "the property tax base to fund certain services," in terms of some of the discussions that have been going on around that area.

Mr Kwinter: I have no problem with any of those three recommendations, other than I would like to see our new recommendation 10 incorporated in them as well.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, we have no problem with that.

Mr Kwinter: What I am saying is that you cannot point your finger at all these other guys and say, "But we're okay." I am just saying that you have got to incorporate your own obligations and responsibilities as being part of the problem.

Mr Christopherson: I will tell you what. We appreciate what you have said and we appreciate the fact that you revised a rather harsh first draft. In fairness, we still have some difficulty with this kind of wording, but we will submit to the staff, if you will, a counterproposal and then let you comment back on that in the draft. If the staff would be good enough to remind me in my office that we made that commitment, we will get it to you by the first of the week.

Mr Sutherland: That makes sense. If I just may make one comment on what Mr Kwinter said, I would think that in terms of all the final discussions around particularly 1 and 2, the type of comment he made would have to be taken into consideration anyway.

The Chair: Consensus? Okay. "Education" is next.

Mr Christopherson: "1. That the government of Ontario engage in a comprehensive education campaign to demonstrate the impact of cross-border shopping and the benefits of shopping in Ontario. This campaign should be conducted in conjunction with business and labour education campaigns of their own members similar to what the Ontario Teachers' Federation (OTF) has done."

Mr B. Ward: I think we expanded on that as well as we held our discussions on all the other issues about what needs to be done in the education aspect.

Mr Sutherland: I just think it is very important to iterate with this recommendation that we have heard a lot of calls for education, and we saw what OTF did sending out the notice to its own members and having it put out on the boards, but I think if we are really going to have an impact, it is important that government campaigns be coordinated with private sector campaigns and with organized labour campaigns to have the true impact. The campaigns done individually, while commendable, I think, by themselves do not have as great an impact.

The Chair: Further discussion? Okay, that ends the session for the recommendations for the government.

Mr Kwinter: Just for the record, I want it understood that we have our recommendation 2 and our recommendation 5 that we would certainly like to discuss at another time, but I think we have already talked about it this morning and we could get the staff to prepare the comments based on what we have done to date, and the members of the third party will be coming forward with something, I would assume, at some time.

The Chair: Any comments on those two sections from the government party?

Mr Christopherson: On recommendation 2, clearly we are going to have a major falling out there, and I do not think that comes as a shock. On recommendation 5, how far off are we, in your opinion, Monte, from what we have got on supplies? Are you suggesting that is a whole different area?

Mr Kwinter: What we are doing is saying it is almost like Mr Hansen's description about the tax-exempt. We are saying, if you are going to address the whole area of supply management and either eliminate it or not, whatever, that is fine, but if it is not going to be addressed, I think one of the big problems that we have got is the quota system. What is happening is that we have a situation that is kind of bizarre in that we have quotas.

I will give you a perfect example. My family is in the food processing business. We are the largest producers of processed eggs in Canada. We work on a quota. There are times when there are incredible quantities of eggs that are not made available, only because of the supply marketing system. Yet those products, in order to supplement shortages, will be brought in from the States. Other parts of Canada have ample supplies, but because of the quota system, they cannot be accessed.

What we are saying is that there is an opportunity to rationalize the market and get it to the point where a consumer can benefit if we can take a look at the whole quota system. That is really all that talks about.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you. I appreciate that. It is very helpful. I think we would be comfortable right now in including a recommendation that there be a review of the quota system outlining some of the concerns you have.

I have to say that we have not had a chance to talk through in detail the temporary import licence issue and what we would like is a chance to review that and maybe be prepared to comment on that when the draft comes down. We would not like to see that in the draft right now, but we will commit to you that we will review it ourselves and be prepared to discuss it at the next meeting.

The Acting Chair (Mr Sutherland): Are there any other recommendations that we have not dealt with from either two of those documents that we have had presented?

Mr Christopherson: Our document is completed.

The Acting Chair: If that is the case, I do not know if there are any additional recommendations we want to deal with at this time. Maybe we could just ask Mr Cousens—I am not sure if he will be back next week—if he could inform his fellow caucus members, if they would be willing to come forward. I think we are pretty close to tying things up.

Mr Christopherson: Just a comment before Mr Cousens responds so he can maybe consider this also. Although we have not set where we are going after this issue—we all know that is still up in the air right now—there is a chance that we could wrap this up completely in terms of finalizing a report at the next meeting. If there is a way your submission could still accommodate that time frame, I think we would all appreciate it very much, especially if we move on to budgetary considerations.

Mr Cousens: I do not think we have any desire to hold it up, having had a chance to see where the committee has gone. If it is—I do not think it is going to be—it could be one recommendation. I am not sure what it would be. I think there is a good consensus in this room right now and I respect the spirit in which both the Liberals and the New Democrats have proceeded with it. If there is, it is something unbeknown to me at this point. So it would not change an awful lot of the work that researchers or others would be doing.

Mr Christopherson: If you could carry that back to your caucus, we would appreciate it very much.

Mr Cousens: I will.

The Chair: Are there any further comments on the recommendations or any further recommendations at this time?

Mr Christopherson: No. I think we can move to just a quick discussion of when we can have the draft ready, and then if that is acceptable to all of us, I think we are ready for an adjournment motion.

Ms Anderson: Do you want it before the next meeting or at the next meeting?

Mr Christopherson: Before would be preferred.

Ms Anderson: So we will try for some time on Wednesday.

Mr Christopherson: I have to look at schedules. We are going to need a caucus meeting, and I am sure the other parties will too, before we can take a final position. If we cannot get it until Thursday morning, as long as the majority of our committee is available for a meeting in caucus, we can do that. That would be next Thursday.

Mr B. Ward: So that would be the agenda for next Thursday at 10.

The Chair: This is on the agenda for next Thursday at 10. Perhaps the suggestion could be that if we could have the document by Wednesday, we do not have a committee hearing on Thursday morning but have time to review it and then meet on Thursday afternoon. Is that a possibility?

Mr Sutherland: The only difficulty in doing that is that if the Tory caucus is coming forward with its recommendations, we may want to meet at 10, hear their recommendations and then maybe break earlier and then come back in the afternoon to finish off.

Mr Cousens: Go with the Thursday afternoon. I see us all being pretty adept at coming through and around words. Do not get yourself into extra meetings right now.

The Chair: What is the consensus? Should we meet for a short time at 10?

Ms Anderson: I can get it to you by Wednesday morning.

The Chair: The researcher has just indicated that they could have the draft to us by Wednesday morning. Meet Thursday afternoon? Okay.

Mr Christopherson: Give us half a second. Mr Chair, what we would recommend to you and our colleagues across the way is that if we can have the document Wednesday morning, we would like to attempt to meet Thursday morning at 10, and what we would suggest is that the committee empower you to contact or have the clerk contact on your behalf each of the three parties, and if all three are a go, then we will meet at 10 o'clock Thursday morning in the hope that we could wrap it up by the end of the day. If one party is not ready, then that will be enough for us to hold off until 3:30 Thursday afternoon, at which time everybody is expected to be ready, and we will try to deal with it in that time. If we cannot, we will meet again the following week.

The Chair: Okay, that clears that item up.

Now the next item is, if you recall, on 22 April we had the researcher and the clerk go to the meeting in Niagara Falls that unveiled the federal government's investigation into cross-border shopping. There is a follow-up meeting on Monday 17 June 1991 at the Mississauga Ballroom of the Airport Hilton Hotel at 10 am, running to 2:30. The question is, it is $40, the participants are $40. We need a motion to either allow them to go or to say no.

Mr Kwinter: I move that we allow them to go.

Mr Cousens: I second that.

The Chair: That is quick. Are there any other items of business before this committee is adjourned? No? Thank you very much. It was a very good working afternoon. This committee is adjourned.

The committee adjourned at 1736.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 6 June 1991

The committee met at 1017 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Vice-Chair: I believe we are close to having a quorum here, so maybe we should get started since we are running a little late this morning. I call this meeting to order. I believe we had agreed at the end of the last meeting that we would wait and see if the Progressive Conservative members of the committee would be coming forward with recommendations. We have not received any and we do not have any of their members present.

We also agreed that we would just check with both caucuses and see whether they had received the second draft of the report in time and had had time to go over what had been submitted and were ready to discuss that.

Mr B. Ward: Just a clarification, Mr Chairman: I may have missed it. Have we contacted the third party to make them aware that the meeting—

The Vice-Chair: If you remember at the last meeting, Mr Cousens, who was here from Markham, was going to pass on the message to his fellow—

Mr B. Ward: So they are aware that we are meeting today?

The Vice-Chair: Yes, yes. Have both caucuses here had time to go over and review?

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, we have not taken this to caucus, only because I wanted to wait until I knew what the final recommendations were going to be. I did not want to go to caucus with this and then find out that the Conservatives are coming in with some recommendations and then have to go back. I have gone through this and I have a couple of minor questions about positioning of some of these recommendations. There are three recommendations we will put in that have not been adopted, but we would put in as a minority report. Aside from that, I have no real problem.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Has the NDP caucus had time, then?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, we are all prepared.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Just before we get into that discussion, I should make you aware that Anne Anderson has passed out a couple more reports regarding provincial sales tax collection and the free trade agreement. We also have one from Dave Rampersad on a comparison of support for supply-managed commodities, USA and Canada, and then we have an article out of the Wall Street Journal about The Challenge: Merchants Mobilize to Battle Wal-Mart."

Anne would like to make a few comments on the report on provincial sales tax collection. She was able to talk to some people late yesterday and some of that information was not put in the report or needs to be clarified.

Ms Anderson: I just wanted to mention to the committee that, of all the people I talked to, no one felt the question of collecting sales tax at the border by reviewing federal documents would be contrary to the FTA. At the same time, none of them seemed to have looked at that question in very great detail.

I have spoken with a trade lawyer in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology who specializes in FTA issues. She got back to me late last night, saying that she did not see that there was a problem with the federal government's forwarding to the province the information about the customs documents that it receives at the border. She is going to submit a written response to that and I will forward that to the committee as soon as I get it. It should be early next week.

Ms M. Ward: Could I ask a question in semi-relation to that? There were some comments I heard on the radio claiming that such a practice could violate the Charter of Rights. Has any investigation been done into that aspect of it?

Ms Anderson: I have not looked at that, no.

Mrs Sullivan: I understand that perhaps the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association is challenging the British Columbia government on its decision to make the request of the federal government. We might want to look into that. It is certainly not clear-cut.

Ms S. Murdock: My understanding on the point Mrs Sullivan made is that it is under the freedom of information and protection of privacy and it could contravene that act, and that is how it is being challenged by civil libertarians.

The Vice-Chair: In terms of the federal government passing on information to the provincial?

Ms S. Murdock: Passing on the information on which the right has not been waived, yes.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Any further discussion on that point?

Mr Kwinter: Not on that point but on the other document you referred to, and that is the Wall Street Journal story about Wal-Mart. This really highlights a problem that I identified very early in these hearings, in that right now we are facing the cross-border shopping problem, but there is another problem looming on the horizon and that is the advent of the food clubs, the companies like Wal-Mart.

What it is going to do is create concern among small retailers in our communities that once one of these companies establishes itself, we are going to have exactly the same problem except, instead of being cross-border, it is going to be cross-town. That is something that is there and I really do not know how you can really stop it unless you are going to really get into the point where you are interfering in the free enterprise system.

But it is something that we should certainly be mindful of because it is going to be a problem and it is just going to compound the problem for the small retailer. He is going to be confronted and, I think, will continue to be confronted, with the problems of cross-border shopping. To add to his burden, he is then going to have to worry about cross-town shopping in these megastores which have very much cheaper distribution costs because of their economies of scale. They will be able to sell products cheaper, and we are going to see some, I think, very serious dislocation in small-town Canada with the advent of these stores.

The Vice-Chair: Any further comments on the Wal-Mart article? If I just may add one thing, when one of the groups was here, either the retail council or one of the others, they had made some suggestions about how small-town people are going to have to do more boutiques and find that individual-level niche as a way of attempting to survive those types of things.

Mr Phillips: Just a point of information. I used to think Mr Hansen was the Vice-Chair on this committee. Has there been a quiet coup?

The Vice-Chair: No, there has been a change. Mr Hansen got promoted to Chair of the standing committee on regulations and private bills and I got demoted to Vice-Chair of this committee. I do not quite look at it that way: I look at Mr Hansen being promoted; I just look at mine as a lateral transfer.

Mr Phillips: These are the little things I watch all the time.

The Vice-Chair: It was done officially at the committee, okay?

Mr Phillips: It was done here.

The Vice-Chair: Yes, the change was officially done at one meeting.

Mr Phillips: Oh, strike that from Hansard.

The Vice-Chair: Some people may say I am ambitious, but I would not do that to Mr Hansen.

Are we ready to begin some further discussion on the draft report 2?

Mr Christopherson: Before you do that, can I just, so I understand fully and it is clear in the record, ask what the status is of the third party's involvement in this report? Have they sent any messages to anyone?

The Vice-Chair: I believe the clerk's staff is attempting to contact someone from their caucus now, as is normally done when there is no representation here from a caucus, to see about having them come forward. We would like them to come forward and we hope they would take up from Mr Cousens's remarks last week where he said he would inform them that we would be looking forward for recommendations. Since they are not here, I am suggesting we continue on with the discussion as is.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine. Thank you.

The Vice-Chair: Just as a possible starting point, I believe there were a few recommendations that had come forward from the Liberals last week and that the government caucus members had said they were going to come back and comment on. Is that how you would like to proceed, or go through the report as it is?

Mr Christopherson: Could I suggest that we do a page-by-page? That obviously will take in every concern as it comes up and we can start putting some of the stuff to bed.

Maybe I can ask a question through you to Mr Kwinter. Are we looking at a potential second session where we would go back to the first page, since you have not had a chance to run this by your caucus, or are you in a position where we can agree on certain wording and say, "That is done," and turn the page?

Mr Kwinter: I do not expect that we would go word-by-word with the caucus. I think we can go through this and come to an agreement in committee, but then before we finalize I would like to at least run it by the caucus. As I say, I do not think any people will get to the point where they are going to be nitpicking over words. They may have a question about some of the recommendations or some of the basic policies. Once we get to that stage, I would just want to show it to them. The only reason I have not done it is that I was expecting that the third party would be bringing forward some recommendations that might be incorporated and then we would have to change it again anyway. But if that is not going to be the case, we can go through it and then it is really just a matter of making sure the caucus is aware of what we are agreeing to.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine, because it also suits our purposes to the extent that there are a couple of things we are going to suggest and, depending on your response, we may need a second opportunity to go back and relook at it also, depending on how your caucus feels about it. So that process is fine with us.

The Vice-Chair: We shall start going through it. Page 1. Any concerns on page 1 in the first paragraph? We will just go through page-by-page then. Any concerns with page 1? Can we move on then to page 2, the introduction? Did anyone have any concerns there?

Mr Kwinter: On the third paragraph I have a little concern with the last statement, which says, "Since the problem is complex and involves all levels of government as well as many industrial sectors, cross-border shopping is a problem without a panacea, with no simple solution."

If you say it is without a panacea, you are saying there is no cure for it. To my mind that means, what are we talking about it for? Forget about it because all we are doing is commenting on it. It would seem to me that when you say there is "no simple solution," it implies that there is a solution. It is not a simple one; it is going to be a rather complex solution. It would just seem to me that if we take out the words "without a panacea," which indicate that there is no cure, and just say "without a simple solution," and leave it at that, is that—

Ms Anderson: I was wondering whether you agree with that. That is easy to do. Yes, I think I would agree with it.

Mr Christopherson: I am sorry. I apologize. I was insulting with my colleague.

Mr Kwinter: The point is that in the third paragraph page 2 the last sentence says this "is a problem without panacea, with no simple solution." I think it is a contraction in terms. If there is no panacea, then there is no cure, there is no solution, complex or simple, and why are we even addressing it? I think we should take out the words "without a panacea," and just say that "cross-border shopping is a problem with no simple solution."

It just makes no sense to have the word no "panacea," because it means that there is no cure, there is nothing we can do about it.

Mr Christopherson: Just to respond—I am not taking a hard position—That word was used, if I remember correctly, by Mr Winter, and I think we have used it in response in the House to some questions that are raised where obviously it is the part of the opposition to try and make things as tight as possible. There is a difference between a simple solution and a panacea, I think. A panacea suggests that there is one solution that will solve everything, whereas to say there is no simple solution suggests that there may be a complex solution.

I may be nitpicking, but I think we like the word "panacea" and that direct reference since it is taken from Mr Winter, who made that statement directly in his report.

Mr Kwinter: I used to be the editorial director of a publishing company, and I am very concerned about words. When you say there is no panacea, you are saying there is no solution, there is no cure. That is what it says, "without a panacea." "Panacea" is the Greek word for "cure." There is no cure. So if there is no cure, then why are we trying to find a solution or find a cure? It seems to me that if we say that, then we are negating what we are doing here. We are trying to find some kind of a cure. It may not be a complete cure, but we are trying to find some part of solution. That is the raison d'être of this committee. It seemed to me that if we leave that word in, and it may be nitpicking, but it really is a word that says there is no cure for this thing, so forget about it; it is just going to continue to happen and go on. Whereas if you say "there is no simple solution," it implies it is not an easy solution but there are things that we can do, and we have made 10 or 12 recommendations to try and do that. Why are you making a recommendation for something if there is no cure? You are spinning your wheels and wasting your time.

Mr Christopherson: I would beg to differ. Our position is that we agree with the statement by Mr Winter. Quite frankly, there is no panacea; there is no one cure that is going to solve the problem. What we are trying to do is mitigate it as best we can, to turn it around, but there is no one, absolute cure that is available. That seems to be part of the message that we received, and we think it is part of the message that we ought to be saying to Ontarians.

I do not think there is a suggestion that by using the word "panacea" we are saying to forget about it. Certainly Mr Winter did not take that approach. I believe he used the word "panacea" early in his report, and I am going straight from memory now, and then proceeded at the end of his document to make a series of recommendations.

Mr Kwinter: You are saying one thing and this is saying something else. Every time you mention the word "panacea," you say there is no single panacea, there is no simple panacea. I have no problem with that. But when you say there is no panacea, then you are saying there is no cure. It is a little different than saying there is no single cure or no simple cure. I would suggest, if you are so enamoured with the word "panacea" and you think it should stay in there, then modify it to the point of putting in "there is no single panacea" or any words to that effect.

Mr Christopherson: Okay, we can live with "single panacea."

The Vice-Chair: Any further comment regarding page 2? Seeing none, we will move on to page 3.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, on a point of order: Now that we have a member of the third party, it would be sort of a good idea to ask him if they have anything they want to contribute to this.

The Vice-Chair: I did ask Mr Sterling when he came up front and he said he would be willing to comment in a few minutes. Are you ready to comment at this time, Mr Sterling?

Mr Sterling: Unfortunately, I have been involved in so many other things in the Legislature I have not had an opportunity to review. I have been in and out of this committee on this thing, so I feel somewhat handicapped in commenting on it.

One of the things, though, that strikes me on this issue as I read about it and hear more about it is that whether or not we have free trade, whether we have whatever it is, it is obvious, I think, to most observers that in the world market, the competitive nature of various countries is that things are coming together so that various parts of the world are trading in blocs.

I will come to the conclusion. As a result of that, what is happening, or what appears to be happening in Europe and I believe here, and I think it is inevitable, is that, whether we like it or not, as this trend in trading and the economy takes place, countries are having to give up part of their sovereignty, the right to make all the decisions in isolation. They cannot say: "We want to have an income tax at this level. We want to have gas tax at this level, we want to have tobacco tax at that level, and the hell with the rest of the world." I think what is becoming painfully obvious is that you cannot make those decisions any more in isolation.

I would have thought in the preamble there would be something about the recognition that this trend is coming along and that governments in the future, and I believe present-day governments, are going to have to look at the competing jurisdictions in terms of making internal policy. I think that is a fact. I do not know whether that was discussed or not.

The Vice-Chair: In terms of incorporating that issue into the report, I do not believe that has been discussed. I think what the other members of the committee would like to know right now for the purposes of the committee proceeding is whether your caucus will be presenting some written recommendations on the issue or not, and possibly when we could expect them, as I think we are nearing the end of dealing with this issue and trying to write the final report.

Mr Sterling: I have reviewed the recommendations. I believe my caucus disagrees with some and would also make other recommendations as well. So I guess the answer is yes, we would be—

The Vice-Chair: Could we have some indication as to when we may have those written recommendations?

Mr Sterling: I think I am going to require some time.

The Vice-Chair: Would it be possible for next week? Next Thursday?

Mr Sterling: Let's say I can try.

The Vice-Chair: I would think if today proceeds in the fashion it seems to be going, we would be very close to finishing the report off. We are just kind of tentatively waiting until we get some recommendations from your caucus for the committee as a whole to discuss.

Mr Sterling: Has the Liberal Party put forward—

The Vice-Chair: Yes, they were put forward last week and have had some discussion. Basically, discussion occurred between the two parties and there was some compromise last week and some suggestions of incorporating recommendations that have come from the government caucus and from the Liberal caucus, and some that were not, and some of them were put in. The government caucus was also going to provide some feedback on some other recommendations that they needed some time to discuss. I guess that gives us a sense of where we are. Maybe we can continue with our discussions on the report, unless there are further concerns.

Mr Kwinter: We just heard from the representative of the third party that there are certain recommendations they do not agree with and there are other recommendations they are going to be bringing forward. We did that last week, and this second draft reflects a compilation of some of the things that we had agreed to and other things that we did not.

I am just concerned about us going through this whole exercise and then finding out that we now have to go through it again, because they may make some points that, even though we do not know what they are, we may agree with. We may find that either one of our parties has agreed, yes, that may be something. We may want to modify it again.

I am just wondering about the efficacy of going through this thing now and then having to go through it all over again once we get their recommendations.

The Vice-Chair: Do you have any suggestions in terms of procedure, what you feel we should do?

Mr Kwinter: It seemed to me the last time we met we sort of had an understanding that if we did get the recommendations from the third party, we would meet in the morning to consider them and then come back in the afternoon. If we did not get the recommendations, we would come back in the afternoon and we would then assume that there were no recommendations.

The problem we have is that we do not have the recommendations, but we have been told that there are going to be some recommendations. At 11:15 I am appearing before another committee on cross-border shopping. They are dealing with it and they would like me to be there. I do not mind going through this, but it just seems to me we are probably going to have to go through it again.

The Vice-Chair: The other problem is that Mr Sterling has indicated that those recommendations from his caucus will not be available this afternoon either. Do we have any suggestions as to how we should proceed, then?

Mr Christopherson: No, I do not. Maybe what we need to do is just kind of talk this thing through a little bit, because I share a lot of the concerns raised by Mr Kwinter. The last thing anybody wants is a suggestion of a gang-up or anything. If anybody wants to check the Hansards, I think they will find that we have tried to be as accommodating and fair as possible and give the third party and each other an opportunity, as we walk through this, to fully meet with their caucuses, talk things through and give it their best foot, because, quite frankly, this is one of those issues that is not a partisan win or lose for any of us. It really has to do with the future of a lot of people of Ontario.

Again, I would ask Mr Sterling just for some feedback so we can talk it through. The most important thing to us is to try to get this finished, and the only purpose in that, the only agenda on that, is that we need to get this in the hands of the Legislature and in the hands of the cabinet so that, hopefully, they can respond to some of these initiatives. I think there is some good stuff in here, and what I would not want to see is that either we drag this thing out longer than it needs to go, or, as Mr Kwinter has rightly pointed out, we can reinvent the wheel at every meeting and tend to go round and round. I think we have made some pretty good progress and I would like to see that momentum continued, but again, we want to be fair to the third party. Maybe if we could get just a little bit of a tighter commitment from Mr Sterling, it would sure help us.

The Vice-Chair: Before Mr Sterling comments, there is also the possibility we could simply go through the text this morning and then come back, or leave any of the recommendations. That is one option we can pursue. I will go to Mr Sterling, since he was asked, and then Mr Kwinter.

Mr Sterling: I would like to give you a tighter commitment or a more definite commitment, but I am just not in a position to be able to do that.

Mr Kwinter: I think in the first eight and a half pages of this report the only comments I will make, and I assume most people will make, are on semantics, which should take hardly no time at all. Once you get past that, you are into the recommendations.

It would seem to me that it would make more sense for us to know that if recommendation 1 is supported by all three parties, then that is done. It is finished. We may have to change a word or two, but that is the end of it. All we are going to be left with at the very end is where we are in disagreement. Then the third party and the official opposition will put in minority reports, and that is for us to decide to

I have no problem if you want to go through the first eight and a half pages, but I would just suggest to you that that will not take a great deal of time. Once you have done that, you are really stymied, because there is not much sense in addressing any of the recommendations until we have had the input from the third party.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine with us.

The Vice-Chair: So we have agreement that we will go through these first eight pages anyway to try to get the semantics figured out and then we will adjourn. Seeing that there will be no recommendations coming forward this afternoon, I take it, then, it is being proposed that the committee will not reconvene this afternoon.

Mr Christopherson: There is no sense doing it twice, but I think, in fairness—and again, I am open to this; I am not taking a hard position—we should make a decision that, come hell or high water, at the next meeting we start moving through the recommendations and we start locking this thing up. Then if at that time the third party feels we have not been fair, I would offer that it could certainly comment on that in its report. That would achieve both. It would give the third party a chance to at least get its opinion in there. There is time for them to comment on these recommendations. At the same time, all of us can move forward and get this report finished and in the hands of people who can do something with it.

Mr Kwinter: I would recommend that we do exactly what we thought we were going to do this week. We now have an indication that we will be getting some recommendations and comments from the third party. If we can get them and deal with them in the morning session next week so that we can have a discussion, and then in the afternoon session deal with the recommendations in light of the discussion that took place in the morning, that is what we thought we would do this week if those recommendations had come forward.

The Vice-Chair: There seems to be a consensus, so I guess the focus is put on the third party to try and have their recommendations for next Thursday morning when the committee meets.

Can we continue through these first eight and a half pages and see if there are any other concerns people had about any of the wording.

Mrs Sullivan: On page 3, the final sentence in the first paragraph, I think material has shown that the cross-border shopping issue is also of importance in provinces such as Quebec, Alberta and Nova Scotia. I am wondering if by particularly singling out British Columbia, New Brunswick and Ontario we are not limiting the appreciation of the national scope of the issue.

The Vice-Chair: I do not want to speculate too much. I think the reason those two were cited is because we had some studies or specific data on those ones.

Ms Anderson: They were the ones that were most affected. I think the others are, but to a lesser extent.

The Vice-Chair: Further comments on Mrs Sullivan's comments?

Mr Kwinter: The reason I would like to see Quebec added is that Quebec was mentioned several times during our hearings for its zoned approach to gasoline. If you are dealing with that issue and that is somewhere along a potential solution—not the solution—I think they should certainly be included, because as I say, they were referred to several times as having that zoned gasoline tax. It would seem to me that they should be included for that reason.

Mr Christopherson: Just a question to Anne. Would their results change the message that is coming through in that sentence, and would it be consistent with what we are saying here?

Ms Anderson: My intent in putting that sentence in was to indicate that it was a wider problem than Ontario's. I just put British Columbia and New Brunswick as being two of the other big ones. But you can easily, instead of saying "especially," say, "such as Quebec, New Brunswick and British Columbia," which would be perhaps more all-encompassing than the others.

Mr Christopherson: Fine. We do not have any problem with that suggestion.

Mr Sterling: I think the bogus part of the Quebec example of the staged gasoline taxes or the area is that you look at the border and you find out that the major metropolitan areas are not on the border and that it is a fair hike to the border. So you are dealing with an entirely different situation than you would be in Ontario. You would be dealing with major metropolitan areas that would be getting a tax break on gasoline, whereas in Quebec it just is not that way. You just have along the border very, very small towns. I do not find their experience helpful at all in dealing with that issue. We have difficulty in my caucus with that anyway. We would not recommend that staged approach.

The Vice-Chair: Further comments on page 3? I see none. We will move over to page 4. Any concerns with what is on page 4? Okay, seeing none, page 5.

Mr Sterling: Just on page 4, I do not know whether the impact of some of our higher taxes, particularly on gasoline, is highlighted enough in terms of the decrease in Americans coming this way.

Last week I was in Peterborough listening to some of the people who are in the tourist business in the Kawartha area. One operator was indicating that if he goes back 10 years 70% of his business was American-based, and now it is down to less than 3%. The dropoff has been unbelievably sharp in terms of American tourists coming this way over the last two or three years. I do not know whether that is highlighted well enough there.

The Vice-Chair: Any comments on Mr Sterling's comments?

Ms M. Ward: I have a question that perhaps the researcher can answer. Did we hear any evidence as to the reason for the decline in tourism which highlighted that particular cause?

Ms Anderson: I do not think so, here.

Mr Phillips: One can speculate, I think. Our group worked yesterday in Sault Ste Marie—the Liberal task force on the budget. Not the Mike Harris task force, the Liberal task force.

Mr Christopherson: The Bob Nixon task force?

Mr Phillips: No, this is the Liberal one, all the future leadership. The number there was that 50% of the gasoline purchases for residents of Sault Ste Marie are now made in the US. So you speculate that if that is happening one way, it must be impacting the other way as well. I think it is like Mr Kwinter's earlier comment on the panacea. I suspect that tourism is impacted by a variety of things, but gasoline probably is one of the things that people have become increasingly aware of: "I used to go up to Canada, but when you drive around up there it is pretty expensive." I think there is enough kind of secondhand information that you can proceed. I guess it is also based on the tourist operators' knowledge.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Any further comments? Then page 5?

Mrs Sullivan: I have a reservation about the kind of statistical data that have been included on this page. It is perhaps because I am suspicious of some of the work that Mr Winter has done in terms of the methodology that was used to come up with the figures he presented. As well, the projections he made were not based on any kind of econometric modelling. As a consequence, the emphasis on the billion-dollar loss in sales per year it seems to me is misleading.

If the committee is seen to be taking that as the loss-in-sales base, then I think we will not end up with the credibility relating to the problem. In fact, what people who have done larger economic studies than Mr Winter's are indicating is that the billion-dollar figure in fact refers not to the sales loss, but to the overall impact in terms of job loss and other economic effects that result from a loss in sales that are of a lower level.

I know the Retail Council of Canada used the billion-dollar figure. I believe that Mr Winter was its consultant on some of the work that was done. I do not know how to fix this, because certainly he did provide that testimony, but I do not think the committee should leave the impression that this is the figure we accept as the size of the problem in terms of lost sales.

The Vice-Chair: Maybe there are one or two ways you could approach that. Possibly research could attempt to contact Mr Winter and have some indication of the methodology, of how he got to that figure.

Mrs Sullivan: We asked him those questions when he appeared before us, and I was not satisfied with his response.

The Vice-Chair: Would you like to put in some type of qualifying statement, then?

Mrs Sullivan: I think that would be appropriate.

The Vice-Chair: It has been indicated that most of the stuff early on is on the basis of testimony that we have heard, and it might be possible to put that in some of the comments once we get past page 8 and we get into the comments section. That might be a place to put in such a statement, if you felt that was necessary. Would that be fine?

Mrs Sullivan: Sure.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Any other comments here on page 5? Seeing none, are there any comments on page 6? Seeing none at this time, page 7? Page 8? I guess page 8 goes on until the end of the first paragraph on page 9, correct?

1100

Mr Kwinter: Certainly any time any member of the government stands up and tries to defend economic policy, the first two things they talk about are the high value of the Canadian dollar and the high interest rates, and there is no mention of the interest rates in that list.

Mr Sterling: We are talking about what witnesses said, not what members of the government said.

Mr Kwinter: I still think some of them had to talk about high interest rates.

The Vice-Chair: There were comments made. Did you want that reflected in terms of—

Mr Kwinter: Just another bullet point in there, high interest rates.

The Vice-Chair: Another bullet point? Okay, fair enough.

Mrs Sullivan: I agree with Mr Kwinter's point; it was certainly raised many times. The other issue that was raised on several occasions was the level of service and product knowledge.

Mr Christopherson: Is that a suggestion, or were you just throwing that out as an idea?

Mrs Sullivan: No, that was very much a part of our hearings.

Mr Kwinter: That was raised a couple of times.

The Vice-Chair: You want to add that as another bullet under underlying causes?

Mr Kwinter: As a matter of fact, I think one of your recommendations addresses it.

Mrs Sullivan: That is right.

Mr Christopherson: "Level of service and product knowledge." Okay.

The Vice-Chair: Any additional comments, then, finishing off that paragraph at 9 before we go any further?

Mr Sterling: I do not know whether to suggest the prices of gasoline taxes that we heard about.

Mr Kwinter: One of the points included it.

Mr Sterling: I know. I do not know whether I heard it here or somewhere else about tire taxes. A lot of people are buying tires over in the United States. You know the tire tax?

Mr B. Ward: —Canadian tires as a regular sort of purchase?

Mr Sterling: No, we were talking about the specifics that witnesses had mentioned, I guess.

Mr Phillips: Did we not just sell some tires to the US the bald ones?

Interjection: That was the used ones.

The Vice-Chair: I would make a comment, but I am the chair, so I will pass.

Mrs Sullivan: The announcement was made but the contract is not signed.

The Vice-Chair: Okay, if there are no other comments for now up to that point, we shall leave it there. I believe we have a consensus that we will be looking forward to the Conservative recommendations for next Thursday morning to—

Mr Sterling: Did we not hear about higher labour costs on this side of the border? Was that not a significant—

The Vice-Chair: Do you want to add one other thing?

Mrs Sullivan: And overhead. That is not in there.

Mr Christopherson: Did we not hear it?

The Vice-Chair: Did you want to tie that in, higher overhead?

Mr Sterling: I think higher labour costs are—I have heard that I do not know how many times from retailers.

Mr Christopherson: If we heard it, we have no problem including it.

Mrs Sullivan: It was part of the testimony.

Mr Christopherson: I am asking Anne.

Ms Anderson: I will check that out.

Mr Christopherson: If it is there, we have no problem acknowledging it.

The Vice-Chair: Okay, and did you want higher overhead put in as well?

Mr Kwinter: One of the issues that was raised by several of the retailers is the fact that real estate costs were significantly higher here, and that as a result of that either their capital costs or their rental costs were significantly higher.

The Vice-Chair: So higher overhead, then.

Mr Kwinter: Yes, but directly related to real estate.

Mr Sterling: The Canadian Federation of Independent Business, when it was here, talked specifically about municipal taxes and how they affected the manufacturer, the wholesaler and the retailer.

The Vice-Chair: I am just wondering if you would tie that into real estate or whether you think they should be retained as separate items.

Mr Sterling: I do not know how specific you want to be, but it seemed to be the focus of their brief.

The Vice-Chair: Maybe if people think of other underlying causes, we can return to that bit next Thursday as well.

Mr Christopherson: I think the idea here was to identify examples, not necessarily an all-inclusive list. We have some fairly broad categories here such as high Canadian taxes and regulatory burden. It covers an awful lot of ground, as it is meant to do. I would suggest that we do not want to end up with four pages of detailed bullets. We are just trying to show some of the causes we spent some time reflecting on.

Mr Phillips: I am on a completely different matter, Mr Chairman. Just before we break, I would like to talk about our hearings in the summer just to get my agenda straight.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Mrs Sullivan, you had your hand up as well.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes. I wanted to go on to a different point because I think another paragraph should be added in here somewhere.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to clarify: I agree that taxes—you know, the range, but I think that real estate cost is a separate issue.

When people say you can get land in Buffalo for $1,500 an acre, and you pay for land in Toronto at $1 million an acre, that has a significant impact on the cost of the retailer. I think it is important that that be singled out.

Mr Phillips: Before we bolt, I just want to make sure of our timing for this summer.

The Vice-Chair: Mrs Sullivan, you had a separate point regarding something you wanted done.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes. I think at some point in the introductory area we should discuss some of the points that were made relating to what people are buying in the US, in terms of where the difference is. For example, we talked about white goods, and also where the standards for safety and energy efficiency may be different from those available on the markets in Ontario, where the warranty standards are different and where warranties may not apply to products and so on. There is no place in the introductory section that discusses that. It seems to me it is an element in the cross-border shopping issue, and it has been raised by several of the intervenors. I am just suggesting that research add that in some areas there may be some differences in the products being purchased that are not reflected in decision-making about the price.

Mr Sterling: I support that. I think that by naming all these various factors, we have not prioritized what the view of the committee was on what the chief culprits are in this problem. I have my own opinion as to what they are from what I have heard. But focusing the government's attention on fixing which problem first is an important thing for the committee to do.

I am primarily concerned about the price of gasoline. I think that is probably the biggest come-on of all for people to go across the border. If I were a government, I would say, "Okay, what do we have to fix the price of gasoline or how can we help in that?"

The second one would relate to price of milk or something like that.

I also wanted to say something about the factors on page 9. I think they are unfairly written, in trying to focus blame on one level of our government rather than our taking our fair share at the provincial level. You talk about high Canadian taxes and regulatory burden but you do not talk about high provincial taxes and provincial regulatory burden.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Under the bullets on page 8.

Mr Sterling: Yes. I think it is sort of silly, actually.

Mr Christopherson: Last comment first: Nobody is negating the fact that when you say "Canadian taxes," you are not including everything. It does not say "federal taxes"; it says "Canadian." I think it is meant to be all-inclusive. That is certainly the way I read it. Anything that pertains to a Canadian to me pertains to an Ontarian.

Mr Sterling: This is the provincial government. If we are going to try to deal with matters at the provincial level, we deal with matters at the provincial level. I think we are tired of this other stuff.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate that, and we are getting back into the dueling we do in the House on how much the federal government is responsible. In a partisan fashion, we each have different agendas. We like the way this is phrased and the way it is worded. I think it is important that you hear that also.

On Mrs Sullivan's point of view and suggestion, we would be prepared to look at any language the researchers would like to present. I think the emphasis on white goods is probably well placed, since that was identified from the beginning of the free trade talks and before. That is something we would be glad to receive and review.

Mr Sterling: Can I ask a question on this preliminary part? I know the one suggestion about the cross-border people here in terms of remedies. I have heard various remedies. The collection of provincial sales tax at the border was one remedy. The other remedy I heard was the staging of gasoline prices on how far you are from the border. Did we do any research as to what other options there were or what other things have been tried in other jurisdictions?

The Vice-Chair: I do not believe so. I mean, we heard comments. We had a background report on the gas tax zone. We had a background report or some information on what they did in BC. Did we not get some more detailed information on what that one border community did with the banks? That must have been in one of the presentations that came forward and talked about the one or two things they had done there.

Mr Sterling: This problem is not new in this world. I just wondered what other tools had been tried in other areas that had met with success or were not practical. I think it would have been helpful if perhaps—

The Vice-Chair: There is a possibility we might be able to have research provide some more detail. I do not know whether we will be able to get that by then. I think we may have covered quite a bit of ground there. May I suggest that in the interests of time, we call it there for now. If there are other issues people want to address on page 8, we can possibly come back to them when we start next week and go from there.

Mr Phillips, you wanted to comment on another topic before we adjourned.

Mr Phillips: I would just like to organize my August. I think the memo that came out on our summer hearing indicated three weeks and in various places. Do we know which three weeks they are?

The Vice-Chair: My understanding is that this issue is still being negotiated between all the House leaders, so you are probably best to seek that advice from your own House leader. My understanding was that they were meeting this morning as well.

Mr Phillips: But we have determined these would be the communities we are going to, is that right?

The Vice-Chair: As far as I know, none of that information has been officially determined. It is all still open for negotiation. That is the only impression I am under. The House leaders are really handling this issue, and it has not come before the committee as of yet. Therefore, we will adjourn this committee until next Thursday morning at 10 o'clock. I hope someone will tell the Chair that he is not required to be here this afternoon, since he was not here this morning, and we will see everyone next Thursday morning at 10. Thank you.

The committee adjourned at 1112.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 13 June 1991

The committee met at 1016 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: We have a quorum. I would like to begin by thanking Mr Sutherland for sitting in the chair last Thursday morning. I would like to begin by picking up where we left off. If I understand correctly, we were in the midst of going through the document.

Mr Sutherland: We had gotten through the first eight pages and then we were coming to the point where the commendations had been incorporated. Based on a suggestion by Mr Kwinter, it was felt that we should not go any farther until we saw whether we would have recommendations coming forward from the third party. Mr Sterling had indicated they would try and have those recommendations available for us this morning. So I believe that is where we left off and we were waiting for them to make their recommendations.

Mr Stockwell: The recommendations will be here in a very short period of time; minutes, we have been advised.

The Chair: Perhaps we should discuss the other order of business. I think we need to have a subcommittee meeting, and it has been suggested by the government party that it occur at 12:30. Is that possible or do we have another time that is more acceptable?

Interjections.

Mr Sutherland: If 12:30 is not acceptable, maybe we could adjourn 15 minutes early this morning.

Mr Stockwell: That is fine for me.

Mr Sutherland: Say about a quarter to 12?

The Chair: Then there will be a subcommittee meeting at a quarter to 12. How would the committee like to proceed pending the arrival of the third party's recommendations?

Mr Stockwell: How about if we adjourn for five minutes and I will make a call and see how long it is going to be?

The Chair: Is it acceptable to adjourn for five minutes? Okay. We will adjourn for five minutes.

The committee recessed at 1018.

030

The Chair: I call this meeting back to order. Are there any comments?

Mr Hansen: Comments on what?

Mr Sutherland: Maybe we could have an explanation of their rationale for the recommendations.

Mr Stockwell: From us?

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: Sure, if you want. I think it is pretty self-explanatory.

I guess I do not need to explain recommendation 1. I think it is pretty self-explanatory. Maybe it is better, if you have any questions that you ask me. I do not really see the difficulty in comprehending these. The only one, recommendation 3, that may be somewhat difficult to see is that obviously with harmonization you are going to save yourself a considerable amount of money. We believe the money could be used to offset the losses the province would feel in the rollback of the taxes in recommendation 1.

Recommendation 4 I think is a protection clause, basically. It is a complicated issue, the harmonization and credit backs, etc. We believe it is important to have "an analysis of the effects of any relevant legislation or regulations it proposes to introduce or amend on the competitive position of the Ontario economy or, where appropriate, on specific sectors."

In the future, should there be any changes made in legislation or regulations, there should be a report done on the competitive position it leaves the Ontario economy in, under recommendations 1, 2 and 3 and whatever comes down the road in the future. There are four very simple and straightforward recommendations.

Mr B. Ward: A quick question: Are these four recommendations the third party is suggesting the committee adopt over and above the general recommendations we made in the report that is already concluded, or are you saying that—

Mr Stockwell: As we go through those—

Mr Sterling: We would comment on those. There are some we agree with. A lot of the stuff in there is sugar and makes it difficult—

Mr B. Ward: It is a separate issue than what we have already, more or less, agreed to. You may suggest that some of those are okay, but others are not.

Mr Stockwell: For instance, let me just say you are calling for a trilevel committee being struck—

Mr B. Ward: Task force and all that stuff.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, big deal. Let's strike another task force, what the hell.

Mr Hansen: Recommendation 3: "Currently it is estimated that harmonization would result in a net revenue gain of $500 million which should be used to finance a 4.2-cent-a-litre cut in the gasoline tax." The recommendation is a 4.2-cent cut in the gasoline tax, but was the $500 million figure picked out of the air or are there some figures there that would realize these savings? It is something that is there but I do not see any background or where this figure came from, if you do not mind explaining it a bit.

Mr Sterling: If there was complete harmonization, we have tried to make the best guess we can in terms of what effect it would have. There are a number of factors involved in the attraction we are now seeing of the NDP government towards harmonization. One is that if you had harmonization, there is a potential tax grab of, we estimate, somewhere around $2.5 billion a year.

Mr Stockwell: It is $2.2 billion.

Mr Sterling: It is $2.2 billion a year. If you permit businesses, as is the case with the GST, to obtain credits on their input, it takes the $2.2 billion down to $500 million a year. In other words, a lot of the retail sales tax that is paid now, if businesses use that in their operation, as is the case with the GST—if you buy something that has GST on it, then when you sell the product or you sell the service after you take out the input, you get a credit for that GST. Our assumption is that businesses would get that credit. Therefore businesses would be advantaged to the tune of $1.7 billion because they would be getting a credit of RST which they are paying out on business inputs. We think that by allowing businesses to do that, as they can with the GST, the province would end up with $500 million more.

There is a downside to this suggestion, of course, because you are putting the provincial sales tax on services that are not taxed now. It is widening the tax base significantly. We think the move in harmonization should be revenue-neutral overall. We do not think it should be a tax grab by the government to increase taxes. Therefore, we say that the offset should be used to attack the cross-border shopping issue by specifically going after what we consider the most relevant factor in cross-border shopping, and that is the price of gasoline.

Mr Hansen: If I understand correctly, it is that when a retailer makes a purchase from a wholesaler he is paying the 7% and the 8% at one time. When that retailer is going out to borrow money to purchase stock, he needs a little bit of extra money in order to pay the tax up front before he sells that item. When that item is sitting on a shelf, let's say the item is wholesaled at $10 and he would be paying $11.50 out and maybe the product sells for $20, but he does not get that back until that item is sold, so that money is sitting on a shelf. He has more money sitting a shelf because he has paid the tax upfront. Is that correct?

Mr Stockwell: Yes, it is, except I do not know any retailer who buys a product and pays on delivery unless he is filing for bankruptcy a week or two later. Obviously he has terms to pay the bill. The bill is 30 or 60 days. Hopefully it is not sitting on a shelf for that length of time. So there is an obvious turnover, plus he gets his credit back under our scheme through—

Mr Hansen: It would be quite an upfront cost for a retailer to start out a new business. In other words, when he buys his stock in, it is all going to go off the shelf in 30 or 60 days. This is why I asked the question. It looks like the retail trade would wind up paying a lot more in startup costs.

Mr Sterling: Yes, but the upside, Ron, is that they only deal with one tax collector and they are not filling out twice as many forms. I was talking to the local grocer in my area, and if harmonization had taken place back when it should have taken place, then grocery stores would have had to pay half as much for the software and the hardware to implement a combined tax rather than two different taxes. In other words, if harmonization had taken place, I know a grocery store that had to pay $80,000 in order to implement the GST and have the PST remain as it was. If it had taken place all together, it would have cost them $40,000 to redo that. So there is some benefit to a start-up retailer, because in harmonization his initial outlay in terms of accounting and dealing with the two taxes will be much simpler. There are ups and downs to it.

Mr Hansen: I would say that the public out there would take a look at, if our government harmonized—for instance, you are purchasing a new home and you need a lawyer for the transaction. As it is right now, there is a 7% GST on his fee. As it is right now, there is no Ontario sales tax on that particular purchase. But with the harmonization, we are talking about adding 8% on top of his bill on purchase of a new home, or does harmonization mean, I am going to go the other way—that we would revert and there would be no GST on a lawyer's bill? Which way would it go?

Mr Sterling: There would be tax on a lawyer's bill.

Mr Hansen: So it is a larger tax grab.

Mr Sterling: Not necessarily. When the lawyer bought his stationery or whatever else would be the input into the service, he would be able to get a credit for those off it, as he is with the GST. So there are some credit side to it as well in terms of the inputs the lawyer has. But overall, the philosophy of the GST, the part of it I agree with—I do not like the idea of taxes any more than you do—is the idea that the burden of taxation should be less in the manufacturing area and more in the service area. If you want to add strength in terms of your overall economy then in my view it makes sense to tax a service area as much as it does the other sector, probably even more.

Mr Stockwell: Otherwise, you could simply continue on the road you are on now and basically operate and watch the border towns and the stores and so on keep closing. You have to do something, and we are suggesting to you the three most important things you can do to help the border towns are to roll back gasoline, alcohol and tobacco.

There is a downside to that, and the downside is that you are down revenue. You are already $10 billion in debt this year alone. We could have just come forward and said "Forget it. We're not going to offer you constructive criticism or a constructive report. Just roll back the taxes, period." If you are going to try to resolve this cross-border issue, you know full well you are going to have to deal with the gasoline, cigarette and alcohol taxes. If you are not going to address those issues, then do not bother addressing the cross-border issue.

Mr Hansen: What I am trying to say, Mr Sterling, is that you were talking about the lawyer upon his collection but what I was talking about was the client who walks through the door who has to pay those taxes. I do not think the lawyer would be rolling back his rate. It would be the same as it would be without taxes. The main thing we have to take a look at is the client who is coming in, or the consumer who has to pay the tax. I think this is what it comes back to all the time, that people are going across the border on the amount of taxes they are paying. Mr Sterling talking about the lawyer getting the credit on what he is purchasing with the GST and with the—

Mr Sterling: But of course we do not make the recommendation in here which this leads to, which would have the most effect of all in eliminating cross-border shopping; that is, with the harmonization, it would be collected at the border and therefore would be the greatest legitimate impediment to cross-border shopping that I can envisage.

We are saying this is revenue-neutral. The Ontario public is not going to pay anything more, as a total body, in taxes. They are going to have to pay more tax over here, but they are going to get a break over there. But the bottom line of all of this is that there is not one cent more in taxes in this suggestion. You can collect at the border, and you are going to have lower gas taxes.

Mr Hansen: Okay. Then the tax comes up on this lawyer's bill, but the tax is coming off on gasoline. This is what you are saying. You are moving from one area to another.

Mr Sterling: Yes.

Mr Hansen: In other words, you have more here but less here.

Mr Sterling: Yes, and in terms of the cost of doing business, there should be some break for business. They will be more efficient in how they deal because they are dealing with one tax collector in terms of both PST and GST. There is a tremendous break for business in terms of administration, etc, so our retailers here will be able to compete better with the Americans as well. There are a number of positive benefits by taking this significant step.

Mr Christopherson: Could I suggest by way of process that we perhaps pick up where we left off, and I believe that was after page 8 or page 9, and start walking through it, giving all three parties an opportunity to comment on those recommendations. Then at the end we can consider any Liberal recommendations that were made but not included in the report and make a determination and do the same with the third party's recommendations.

Mr Sutherland: I guess I would concur with Mr Christopherson. I had one question on the Tory recommendations. In terms of harmonization, I also thought that in some of the calls you hear for harmonization the overall level would be lower. In other words, it would not be 15%. Were you recommending a specific amount?

Mr Sterling: Basically what we were saying was that whatever we were going to put in here was because of our party's position. We would not be taking any more taxes from the people. What we are talking about is a redefinition of whatever it is. We do not want tax on tax, and therefore the provincial rate may be 7.78% or whatever it is to come to the 15%. I am not sure what the exact figure is.

Mr Sutherland: Fine.

Mr Sterling: But that would be sort of the extension of when you got to the nitty-gritty in terms of what we were talking about. We are not saying we are going from 8% to 7% in taxes.

Mr Sutherland: My only question about that was what impact that would have on the figures you were suggesting here, the $2.2 billion and the $500 million, if it stayed at 15% or a different rate.

Mr Christopherson: Page 9 then, recommendation 1, is I guess where we are about to pick up. Just to get the ball rolling, we are fine on the wording of the recommendation and the following text up to the end of recommendation 1. We have a comment on recommendation 2 when you take us to that.

Mr Kwinter: If I may make a comment, it is my feeling that I am in a position to talk about those recommendations we agree with in principle and virtually agree with, but I want to reserve the right, because we have not taken this to caucus pending hearing what the third party was going to do; There is a possibility that I may come back and have another word or two to add in, only for whatever reason some caucus members may feel that should be done. I just want you to know that I am prepared to give a commitment in principle that yes, that recommendation is something we agree with, as long as it is understood that it will not get changed in principle, but there may be a word recommended that we can either accept or not.

Mr Christopherson: If I remember correctly, last week Mr Kwinter put out that same position, and I think on behalf of our caucus I suggested the same thing, to the extent that when the recommendations were tabled we would want to take a look at them and your changes obviously might have an impact on our position. So things are still fairly fluid and we are agreeing in principle.

The only thing I would suggest is that our subcommittee needs to be aware of what kind of time is available to work on this report. We are trying to get it concluded as soon as possible, both to get it in the hands of the government and also to clear the slate so we can begin the other work we are about to start. Let's just keep in mind that at some point we have to have that line, but up until then, I think all parties are still free to be fluid on some issues.

Mr Kwinter: I was just going to say that this is not going to be time-consuming. It is just that I have got to show it to them. Once I show it to them, it will be very quick.

Mr Christopherson: Fine.

Mr Sterling: Can I also just make one statement, sort of a preliminary part here, that as far as I am concerned, the words in between, as I indicated last week, are badly slanted in favour of blaming stuff on other levels of government, which we find distasteful and silly. It would be my view that we would probably be at the bottom line of putting forward a dissenting report saying that we agree with the recommendation, but in no way with adopting the language of the overall report, if you know what I mean.

We are not going to spend our time during this committee saying we do not agree with these words here; we do not agree with those words. Because of the way the report is slanted—and I understand why it is slanted that way and why government members want to do that. Notwithstanding that, as we go through these recommendations, we will just tell you simply whether or not we agree with the recommendation, and we would include in our dissenting report probably that we agree with the recommendation or whatever else. Okay?

Mr Christopherson: No problem.

The Chair: Where would we like to begin then, on what page?

Mr Christopherson: The first change we would like to put out for discussion is on page 10, recommendation 2, unless somebody has something before then. What we would like to do is to end after the first sentence. To talk about the qualifications for the minister being "an effective negotiator on Ontario's behalf" just does not seem to be necessary or appropriate, since it is a strictly subjective opinion on whether someone is an effective negotiator or not. A lot might depend on what happens at the end of the day, as opposed to heading into the negotiations. Without changing the intent or the thrust of what was proposed, we would just like to stop it after the first sentence.

Mr Kwinter: I have no objection, as long as the paragraph preceding it stays in, because it says the same thing without including the recommendation.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine, and let the last sentence cover it, yes.

If I can then push us ahead, on page 11, second paragraph, middle of the paragraph, I believe it is the third sentence, I would just like to raise with the researcher the sentence, "John Winter testified that a price comparison of 250 goods between Fort Frances and International Falls showed Ontario prices to be on average at least 50% higher." I believe what may be meant is that 50% of the goods were higher, as opposed to the way it is worded here, but I would ask Anne for a little clarification.

Ms Anderson: It was 50% of those 250 goods he had surveyed, not necessarily of all goods.

Mr Christopherson: Maybe we could just get that wording cleaned up a little.

Ms Anderson: I could put in "on those goods" after the word "prices" perhaps.

Mr Christopherson: Yes. Thank you, Anne.

In the last paragraph, the last sentence, there was just some discussion in our caucus. Maybe Anne would just clarify that sentence exactly in so many words so it will be clear. There was just a little bit of uncertainty as to exactly what we were saying there.

Ms Anderson: I was trying to indicate that the high dollar at the moment in and of itself was not necessarily causing the increase that has happened in recent years, that there had been a high dollar in the early 1980s at the equivalent level without the increase there has been then.

One of the differences has been the difference in purchasing power that has resulted from differing inflation rates. When the exchange rate floats freely, it will adjust for those different inflation rates, but I do not believe it has been adjusting freely over the last few years, so there has been a difference in purchasing power between Canada and the US. I think that is one of the reasons for the difference between the early 1980s and the late 1980s.

Mr Kwinter: If I could comment on the same point, do not agree with that paragraph in that, to my knowledge there has been no restriction on the ability of the dollar to float. What has been controlled are the interest rates. I do not think the central bank has the resources or the power to determine the value of the Canadian dollar. The market dictates that. What the central bank has the authority to do is to set the interest rates, and the interest rates have a direct impact on the value of the dollar. As long as the interest rates are maintained artificially high, where they have been, it has meant that the dollar is high because people want to benefit from the interest rates and are pushing up the value of the dollar.

But if you want to talk about allowing things to find their own level, then it is the interest rates that have got to find their own level and not the value of the dollar, because the value of the dollar is set by the market. It is set by the world financial community deciding on the value of that dollar vis-à-vis gross domestic product and the interest rates and the returns on it. I just make that comment.

Mr Stockwell: If you want to truly affect it, you should probably deal with the debt. That would have a far greater impact on the value of the dollar and interest rates. If you could retire a considerable amount of debt at the federal and provincial levels, I am certain you would be far more successful in having a better interest rate and a better Canadian dollar.

Mr Christopherson: We are okay up to page 23, Mr Chair. That would be our next—

The Chair: Any comments in between?

Mr Kwinter: How did we leave that?

Mr Christopherson: That is exactly what we did—left it.

The Chair: No, I understood there would be some clarification in that. What would the clarification be?

Ms Anderson: Maybe we could take out the end of the second half of that sentence, from "because."

Mr Kwinter: If you just substitute "interest rates" instead of "dollar," I think it is a valid statement. "Although the Canadian dollar in relation to the US was as high as higher in the early 1980s, its purchasing power has declined in recent years because the interest rates have not been able to float freely to adjust to, among other factors, the different rates of inflation between the two countries." There is absolutely a 5% spread in interest rates between Canada and the United States and that has really impacted on Canadian manufacturers, retailers and distributors, because their cost of capital is too high vis-à-vis their American competitors. If that interest rate was allowed to change then we would be fine.

The Chair: Then I see a consensus on that wording.

Mr Christopherson: Interchange "interest rate" for "dollar."

The Chair: Are there any comments between pages 11 and 20 from the opposition? Can we move on? I believe Mr Christopherson indicated that the government was happy with pages 11 through 20. Is that correct?

Mr Christopherson: To page 23. Our next change is recommendation 7.

Mr Stockwell: Hold it. Is recommendation 3 on page adopted?

Mr Christopherson: That was unanimous, was it not?

Mr Stockwell: No, totally not unanimous. It is short-sighted, naïve and schoolground thoughts.

Mr Christopherson: In your opinion.

Mr Stockwell: Yes. In my opinion, it is schoolyard thinking. This is so boldly naïve it is not even worth debating, so I will just suggest that—

Mr Hansen: But Mr Kwinter just—

Mr Stockwell: I heard what Mr Kwinter said and I suggest to Mr Kwinter that it is naïve. There is no way you are going to have this statement stand on its own and have anyone take it seriously, "The provincial government could urge the federal government to allow the interest rate differential with the United States to be reduced so that the value of the Canadian dollar can decline to a competitive level." I want some background, a little bit of better background on that than what we have, and if not, fine, we will just simply not adopt that recommendation, or we will change it.

Mr Kwinter: I have to apologize. Actually, when I was reading the paragraph on page 11, I was just reacting to it from an economic point of view, without realizing it was tied into that resolution. In fact, I was right, because what I said here is what is reflected there, but I did not realize it was there.

The point that has to be made is that we are not talking about practicality; we are talking about recommendations that are the ideal. Ideally, the central bank is keeping up interest rates for one reason. They have decided in conjunction with the government—and I am convinced they have to talk to the powers that be in Ottawa about it—that inflation is the number one economic problem facing this country. In order to keep inflation down, they have to keep interest rates high. If they were to allow the interest rates to drop, then what would happen is that it would reduce the cost of capital for Canadian businessmen, which would make them more competitive.

From a political point of view, that may be a non-starter, because the federal government may say: "That's great. We're just not going to do it, because we're not prepared to tolerate the kind of inflation that would result from lowering those interest rates." Having said that, when you talk to businessmen, and when you listen even to ministers of this government, whenever they stand up to talk about the problems they talk about the high value of the dollar and the high interest rates that are creating a problem for Ontario business.

Again, I keep repeating, that one is the result of the other. The high dollar is the result of the high interest rates. If you can get the interest rates down, you will get the value of the dollar down, and you will become more competitive. It may not be practical and, as the members of the third party say, it is naïve. I agree it may not be practical, given the politics, given the fact that the government in power in Ottawa right now has said: "We're not going to do it. We're going to keep those interest rates artificially high because we think inflation is worse than the competitive problem." I do not agree with them, and that is where we have a difference, but I have no problem with that recommendation.

Mr Stockwell: We have a problem with that recommendation, as I suggested before.

The Chair: Other comments on this, or should we move on to page 23?

Mr Sterling: We object to recommendations 4 and 5. I do not understand 5. With regard to 4, I do not know who is a shopper or not a shopper. Do you say, "You can go in the fast-track lane if you are a shopper"? I do not understand that. I think 4 is not responsible. If the provincial government wants collection of taxes and more enforcement, then it is going to have to be involved in some kind of compensation for it.

Mr Sutherland: If I may, I think this committee is already having an impact, because I believe the Minister of National Revenue has already said he is going to hire more enforcement staff.

Mr Sterling: He did it because we said that?

Mr Sutherland: Yes, for sure, so we can tell our constituents we are having an impact already.

Mr Sterling: Are you naïve.

Mr Sutherland: At any rate, with regard to recommendation 5, the reason that recommendation is in is that we have heard evidence of some of the Peace Arch Customs Entry projects that are going on in British Columbia, about how that is to help shoppers get back quickly. We were not happy with that process, but we are also familiar with the autopass thing that the United States has set up at the border at Niagara Falls, which allows Canadian tourists to go across much more quickly.

The purpose of this recommendation is to have a similar thing set up here to allow American tourists to come up. The twofold problem with cross-border shopping is not only Canadians going across there, but because of the long lineups it is also discouraging American tourists from coming here. The purpose of this recommendation is to provide the incentive and to make that process a little easier.

It baffles my mind that we are quite happy to set up a process—

Mr Sterling: Why is the Canadian a visitor when he is coming back to Canada?

Mr Kwinter: If I could just respond, I took this recommendation to mean what happens at Terminal 3, what happens at Heathrow Airport in London. When you arrive, there are green and yellow or red and yellow things, and if you are coming through with nothing to declare and you do not have to go through immigration, you go through that. They have spot checks where they will grab you, even though you say you have nothing to declare, just to do a spot check.

The big difference would be that right now, when you come across the Peace Bridge, everybody goes through the same thing, whether you have nothing to declare or something to declare, whether you are an immigrant, or a Canadian citizen. Whatever it is, everybody has to wait in line to get his chance to tell the guy, "I've got nothing to declare," whereas under this system there would be whole lanes where it would say, "Canadian citizens with nothing to declare, just go," and they have spot checks. As I say, it works.

Mr Stockwell: What happens if you get caught?

Mr Kwinter: You get penalized.

Mr Stockwell: What? You pay your tax on what you came over with?

Mr Kwinter: No, you get the same thing you get if you smuggle.

Mr Stockwell: Goods impounded?

Mr Kwinter: Whatever it is that happens to you. As I say, this is not radical. It is happening right now at Terminal 3 and it certainly happens in other airports around the world. There is no reason why it could not be implemented, as long as you can physically do it.

The Chair: I think there is a slight problem of a misplaced modifier there. It could be that this could be corrected by saying, "The provincial government should urge the federal government to establish fast-track lanes for use by American visitors and Canadians returning who are not shoppers with nothing to declare."

Mr Kwinter: It is the matter of shoppers with nothing to declare.

The Chair: Or you could just take that out and put "those coming into Canada with nothing to declare."

Mr Sutherland: If that would make it clearer, rather than the term "Canadian visitors," or "visitors" right after "Canadian," that might be good.

Mr Stockwell: Sure, fine.

The Chair: Are there any other comments? We are now moving to page 23.

Mr Christopherson: With regard to recommendation 7, we have a suggested wording change to clarify and strengthen the intent. It is the latter part of the sentence, but I will read the entire sentence as we would suggest it, "The provincial government should work with industry and local border communities to develop regional campaigns in support of more aggressive marketing by Ontario retailers." There is no great change; we just thought that clarifies and strengthens the intent of that recommendation.

The Chair: Are there any comments on that?

Mr Jamison: I would like to make a suggestion on recommendation 7. It seems to be a very defined group of people there. There are other groups that have shown interest in being involved in the cross-border shopping issue. One, for example, would be labour. Also, I think the whole thrust behind 7 is really joint participation where we can develop it. I think it is one that should not be narrowly explained by the committee. We should be talking about including many groups in that process.

The Chair: What wording would you suggest, Mr Jamison?

Mr Jamison: Just to expand and indicate that other interested groups—

Mr Christopherson: Maybe remove the word "and" if there is no problem with the suggestion, replace it with a comma, and then after "communities" "and other groups." For instance, I know the Ontario Teachers' Federation has been promoting the "Buy Canadian" and the cost of Ontarians of cross-border shopping with its membership. I think that is what Mr Jamison is suggesting, that we want to keep that net big enough to catch everyone who is involved and offer support to them.

The Chair: Would this be correct, "The provincial government should work with industry, local border communities and other interested groups," or "other groups"?

Mr Christopherson: "Other interested groups."

The Chair: "Other interested groups to develop regional campaigns in support of"—

Mr Christopherson: Yes, and then kick in with the new wording.

The Chair: Any other comments? Page 24 or should we just jump—

Mr Stockwell: Recommendation 8, that is a winner.

Interjection: It is unanimous.

Mr Stockwell: That will keep thousands of them in the country. Make sure the seal is red.

Mr Christopherson: Recommendation 9.

Mr Stockwell: There is another winner.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, unlike your in-depth analysis.

Mr Stockwell: Let's add training courses in seals. That will solve the problem.

Mr Christopherson: Listen, we were throwing fish the other way yesterday.

The Liberal recommendation 3 I believe is next on the order of discussion, after recommendation 9. I think we deferred and said we would have that recommendation come now for discussion.

Mr Kwinter: It is kind of redundant because introduction of the government's bill on Sunday shopping covers it. It allows a municipal option. It allows everybody to be open anyway, so it is not a problem.

Mr Stockwell: I think they did that because you said that.

Mr Christopherson: We are listening. That is fine. I had it on my order paper, if you will, to deal with it.

Interjection: Another example of the impact this committee has.

Mr Christopherson: We do not want to be accused of steamrolling until we actually are.

Mr Kwinter: We were going to include it as a recommendation, but as I say I think the government has already responded to it.

Mr Christopherson: Fine. The next thing we have is on page 27. The recommendation, if there is nothing else from the other two parties, is that recommendation 10 would actually appear at the end—or let me word it another way: The paragraph that comes after this would start up, "It ould be noted, one alternative proposed by some retails....” That paragraph would be completed and then recommendation 10 replaces 11. We are just suggesting to delete 11. We had quite a discussion on it last time when Mr Kwinter went on at great length and we thought his points were well taken. So we would propose deleting recommendation 11 and placing 10 in its place. As I said, start the paragraph now beginning, “One alternative proposed,” with the words, “It should be noted.”

Mr Stockwell: So you are dropping recommendation
1?

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: Okay.

Mr Christopherson: We had some difficulty at first with the wording and the intent and then the actual merit of the recommendation itself.

Mr Stockwell: I agree that it is not meritorious.

Mr Christopherson: If that is not a problem, I would move us to page 29, which is the Liberal recommendation 5.

Mr Kwinter: Perhaps I could just speak to that for a minute. You notice there is a letter from the National Grocers that was on our desk today, and they have their recommendations. Recommendation 1 is supply management marketing boards. As I mentioned when we had the hearings, the mere mention of even tampering with supply management will draw the ire of every agricultural worker in Ontario and the tractors will be circling Queen’s Park.

Having said that, I think one of the things that could be done is a method of trying to allocate the quotas more fairly. We have what is really an anomaly, in that we have supply management. The main purpose is to protect the economic viability of those people in the agricultural sector and yet, from time to time, because of the quota system, there is a provision whereby produce can be brought in from the United States.

We have a situation where Ontario may be short of its quota and where there may be an abundance of quota in other parts of the country. The purpose of this recommendation is to just make sure the quota is set at a level that will keep the produce coming from Canada—I am not just talking about Ontario because we bring it from all over—and not be set in such a way that even though it is supposed to protect Canadian producers, there are many occasions when, because of the market—I will give you an example. At Thanksgiving, because the quota is set in advance, there are turkeys required for the market, there is a shortage and they are brought in from the United States, whereas Canadian producers could have been producing those turkeys if the quota had been more realistically set.

All we are calling for here is a recommendation that the quota system be examined to make sure it is kept in tune with the marketplace to the advantage of Canadian producers, as opposed to leaving a window of opportunity for Americans to fill that is created because of the inefficiency of the quota system. That is basically what it is about.

Mr Christopherson: We had a pretty good discussion about it in our caucus, and we can support the recommendation.

Mr B. Ward: Is that recommendation 5?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, Liberal recommendation 5.

Mr Kwinter: Liberal recommendation 5, and this would become new recommendation 11, I assume, and fit into where we are.

Mr Christopherson: In terms of structure, do we have a preamble for that?

Interjection: We have supply management.

Mr Christopherson: We are okay with that.

The Chair: Next section.

Mr Christopherson: Page 32, at the bottom of the draft report, talks about recommendations 2 and 10 of the Liberal proposals.

Mr Kwinter: Our recommendation 2 is basically the third party’s recommendation 1.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, neither of which is acceptable, but I do not think that comes as any great surprise, and we talked about that earlier. On the issue of recommendation 10, we wanted to propose the following language—

Mr Kwinter: Just for clarification, our recommendation 10 encompasses pretty well what the third party has in its recommendation 4.

Mr Christopherson: Correct. I expect both will pop up in minority reports, loud and clear.

I would like to move us to your recommendation 10.
What we would like to offer is the following amended language, but in the interests of maintaining the spirit of what you have suggested. The wording would be: “All levels of government should consider the issue of cross-border shopping in all fields of policy-making. The government should continue, and where possible increase, the level of consultation with labour, business and consumer representatives around the problem of cross-border shopping.”

Mr Kwinter: I suggest that would probably more suitably be presented if it were expanded into the NDP’s recommendation 2.

Mr Christopherson: The draft report recommendation 2?

Mr Kwinter: We are talking about the whole idea of what the government should be doing, appointing a lead minister to work with all players at all levels of government, and then expand, take what you have just said and incorporate it into what that person should be doing.

Mr Christopherson: I hear the point and I do not think we want to split hairs. Perhaps I could suggest that it may be properly in its place if you think about the fact that we have two pages of discussion on taxation and your recommendation is slanted one way and ours presents it a different way. But the whole point, I think, is that government needs to consider the impact of policy decisions on cross-border shopping and we want to make that very clear and to ensure everything is being considered. There should be at least as much consultation as is going on now and we should increase it wherever possible. I suggest it is possibly in its right place. I would not want to water down the recommendation to the lead minister to be appointed. We have talked about that among ourselves only and we feel that is an excellent recommendation. We like where it is and we would really like to see it stand alone because we would like to see the Premier do that.

Mr Kwinter: Then I suggest that maybe what you have just said should be incorporated into your recommendation 1, where you talk about the task force. If you take a look at the material that goes on, it talks about all the things that should be happening. If you take a look at the bottom of page 8, "Many groups felt that the issue needed to be addressed at a broad, structural level with co-ordination and co-operation among all participants in the public and private sectors." There is a national task force with a high level of representation from all of these different people and it would seem to me that is where that particular recommendation should be incorporated.

Mr Christopherson: We should not spend a lot of time on this because it is a moot point about really where it goes, but I suggest to Mr Kwinter, that the difference might be that with recommendation 1, we are asking that this trilevel task force more or less deal with the issues in place now, and what it can do about existing regulations, laws, practices, etc. This is really meant to talk about from here forward and it is not meant to deal just with legislation that currently, obviously, impacts on cross-border shopping. When any legislation is being looked at, the effect and impact on cross-border shopping should be a consideration. I suggest it is a broader recommendation and is really meant for policies and laws which are being considered from here forward.

The Chair: Is it our understanding that what you have just said, Mr Christopherson, could go in as recommendation 15?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, that is correct. We were suggesting the Liberal recommendation 10, as numbered in its report, be amended in the way we have suggested, and you are correct that it would become recommendation 15.

Mr Kwinter: I have no problem with adding that recommendation 15. I do have a problem with amending our recommendation 10 because I do not think it is quite the same and we will be using our number 10 separately.

Interjection: Take it to caucus—

Mr Christopherson: That is fine.

Mr Phillips: Perhaps I could just speak on our recommendation 10, just to be on the record because I would like to have these things around a year from now when you reverse engines and have to make some fundamental changes. I think your budget is fundamentally wrong. I think you will come to that realization in a year.

Mr Sutherland: You are not using "180 degrees"?

Mr Phillips: Whatever. There is not a lot of sense in debating it right now because only time will tell, but I just say that in the end we will hold you accountable for it. I think you are going to see more jobs lost in the province. We feel very strongly about our recommendation 10, and I would just like to have the Hansards around a year from now; that is all.

Mr Sterling: Just before you leave 10, there has been an allegation that our recommendation 4 is the same as the Liberals' 10. I think ours is really quite a bit wider in scope, in that it says we want a competitive test put not only to fiscal policy, but also to regulatory policy, legislation policy etc. In other words, we think all governments should be bound—as perhaps land is bound by an environmental assessment—by a competitive assessment before they do things. That is basically the thrust of 4. I am not sure whether the Liberals are interpreting it that way or not, but that is the intent of our recommendation 4.

The Chair: Further discussion?

Mr Phillips: On what?

The Chair: On this issue, unless I get some indication that we are done with it.

Mr Phillips: Are we debating the third party's recommendation 4?

The Chair: Mr Sterling was just indicating that Mr Kwinter's comments suggested it was the same as yours and he wanted to expand and say that is not the case: that it is broader. Are there any other comments?

Mr Phillips: The one thing that everyone might be able to agree on in recommendation 4, because I have a feeling, but the government may not—what is your feeling on recommendation 4?

Mr Christopherson: We more or less considered it similar to your recommendation 2, I believe.

Mr Stockwell: Recommendation 10.

Mr Christopherson: Was it 10? It was 10 or 2.

Mr Phillips: You are not in favour of it or you—

Mr Christopherson: No. We offered up our own wording. Just give me one second to read this. There was a suggestion during the discussion that it was similar to your recommendation 10. We have offered amended language to that. We have heard back from Mr Kwinter and from Mr Sterling that this is unacceptable and they would be reflecting that in their minority report. We have acknowledged that you are going to do that.

Mr Phillips: Is there a compromise on the third party's recommendation 4, that it may still want to have it in the minority report, but that rather than "competitive position," any relevant legislation contain a "jobs analysis"?

Mr Stockwell: As opposed to "competitive position"?

Mr Phillips: I am just trying to see if there is something all parties can agree on. Maybe you would still have it in your minority report, but at least there would be the impact that regulations and legislation has on jobs.

Mr Christopherson: In most cases that I am aware of in the short time I have been here where there have been initiatives announced by cabinet, they have put a great deal of weight on the number of jobs created and are—

Mr Stockwell: I think we are talking about job loss.

Mr Phillips: I wonder if that might not be a useful recommendation for the committee, to ask that when legislation or regulation comes forward, it includes an analysis of the impact on job creation.

Mr Stockwell: And loss.

Mr Christopherson: Let me ask a question. We are going to be coming back at least once more on this matter, I understand it, Mr Chair?

The Chair: That is up to the committee. If the committee does not feel it has completed its work on this report, then, yes, we will be coming back.

Mr Phillips: I think it might be interesting. I have a feeling that the word "competitive"—not just because of what I saw in the paper this week—may be tough for the government side to buy, but it may be able to buy "jobs."

Mr Christopherson: We will take a look at it, okay? Before we wrap up we will give you an indication whether we agree to go with that kind of recommendation in the main body.

Mr Phillips: I think it may be very useful.

Mr Christopherson: We will take a serious look at it.

Mr Phillips: I guess we are in the middle here.

Interjection: A mediator, Gerry.

The Chair: Are there any other comments on this action? Can we move along?

Mr Christopherson: We are done.

The Chair: Are there any other comments or recommendations? What is the will of the committee? Is it the will of this committee that we adjourn the discussion on this draft report and come back this afternoon with the final recommendations?

Mr Christopherson: I am sorry, Mr Chair, I was looking at the document.

The Chair: You said, "We are done," and I am trying to get a sense of where we go from here. Do we come back this afternoon to complete? Obviously the discussion on recommendation 4 of the third party has not been completed, but at the same time you said, "We are done." I am trying to get some handle on where we go from here.

Mr Christopherson: We would all still have to see the final document to give approval to it, would we not?

The Chair: I think before we can have a final document or give instructions to the writers for a final document, we may have to make some decision on recommendation 4 of the third party.

Mr Christopherson: Yes. The subcommittee is going to meet in about 13 minutes and I am wondering, if that is the only thing holding us up, whether maybe we can have a fast caucus and come back to the other two parties with a response on that recommendation. I do not know; I need to talk to my colleagues.

The Chair: Should we take an adjournment for five minutes and come back?

Mr Stockwell: Can they not do it and then write the final report subject to approval of that one recommendation?

Mr Christopherson: As I understand it, we have to come back this afternoon regardless, because we need an update on the subcommittee's discussions.

The Chair: Right.

Mr Christopherson: Let's assume that we come back with a response that is our hard and fast position one way or the other. What process would follow?

The Chair: If you come back with the wording of your response, there would be some discussion among the committee members about that and it would either go to a vote or it would be—

Mr Christopherson: I know that. I mean in terms of finalizing the report.

The Chair: I would ask at that point if there were any further discussion on the report as it stood. If there were no further discussion, I would take it that the report should go on to be drafted in its final version. That would then return to the committee, perhaps next week, for final recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: Okay, that is fine.

Mr Kwinter: Perhaps if I could suggest that if we could get a final draft prior to our caucus—your caucus meets Tuesday?

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: If we could get a—

The Chair: Sorry to interrupt, Mr Kwinter, but Ms Anderson has just indicated that she can give us a final draft version of all of these updates this afternoon, except for recommendation 15.

Mr Kwinter: That was the point I was going to make. If we could get a final draft, we could come back next Thursday and be in a position to proceed.

Mr Sutherland: I do not think we need an update this afternoon of what we have done this morning, but if that could be in everyone's office tomorrow or Monday, we would be in good shape for Thursday.

Mr Stockwell: What is the hurry?

Mr Christopherson: The hurry is that it is a pressing issue and we want to get it into the hands of the cabinet as quickly as possible. That is the only thing driving it, and clearing the deck for our other work.

If you want to make it a return at 4 o'clock, that would give us time and we will try and finalize this last item. If everything else can be done, I am still in favour of using one hour this afternoon to get it finished, because starting next Thursday, we are going to be very busy people. That is just a personal point.

The Chair: Should I recess the committee now until 4 o'clock this afternoon with the subcommittee meeting starting right now?

Mr Phillips: Could I just raise one issue? I was rather personally offended to see a big survey done and released on cross-border shopping that I had known nothing about. I found it rather insulting, actually. I wanted to raise that here, that the Kitchener-Waterloo Record got hold of this and this makes this committee seem, in the cabinet, irrelevant. I will just say I was terribly offended also when you moved that the committee adjourn when the Treasurer was here. I wanted to register with you people that both of those things offended me.

Mr Stockwell: I am not sure why we could not have been informed that this study was taking place and had some input into how they were doing the study. I was also somewhat offended to see the results in the Kitchener-Waterloo Record. I do not know if you people knew or not, but it really does make this committee—as I say, what is the hurry? I cannot believe that after commissioning that study the cabinet really cares what the hell we have to say anyway, considering it is out commissioning expensive studies without any information going to the committee which is supposed to be looking into the matter.

The Chair: This committee stands recessed until 4 and the subcommittee will meet right now?

The committee recessed at 1138.

The committee resumed at 1610.

Mr Stockwell: One concern I had at the subcommittee meeting, and I would like to express it again today on the record, is the expert witnesses. We are going to have four. It would make more sense to me that if you are going to have one witness from both opposition parties, you would have one witness from the government. Thereby you could cut out an hour's worth of presentation or you could extend the presentations to an hour and 20 minutes each.

But it does not seem unreasonable to me to think that if the Liberals get a choice, we get a choice and the government gets a choice. I think you are assuming a lot if you automatically think both opposition parties are going to bring in someone strongly opposed to the budget. I am talking about the Liberals more specifically. There is a lot of stuff they support in the budget. But if we are going to go this route we should allow one witness per party. It seems reasonable.

Mr Sutherland: As was stated at the subcommittee, this is a very fair process. The opposition as a whole gets two witnesses and the government as a whole gets two witnesses. That is very even in balance. If we really wanted to be concerned about it, we could apply that to questioning, 50% and 50%, but we do not want to do that. We want to be fair, so we have divided it equally three ways, rather than saying the government side will have 60% of the questioning and the opposition will have 40% of the questioning.

I do think it is fair that the opposition will have its opportunity to have its witnesses forward and we will have an opportunity to have ours and we will have adequate time for all parties to question all witnesses in a fair and equitable manner. It allows for some reasonable perspectives to be brought forward and some time for committee members to make their analyses and question the analyses put forward by the different experts.

Mr Stockwell: I will be curious to find that this is the same kind of approach we are using on the tour, when there are appearances and requests for appearances to be made. I think it was clear the government never wanted to take the process, and I hope that we are dealing with this in a fair third-third-third fashion. So I will leave it at that. It is just that I want to be recorded that I consider this to be unfair, and when we go out on tour I want to be very clear that it be a very equitable split of time.

The Chair: Could I have a clarification of what you mean by "equitable split of time"?

Mr Stockwell: I was on the Constitution tour briefly. I found it to be lopsided in the witnesses who were being requested to attend. In fact, a consultant was hired, I think for a couple of hundred thousand dollars, to seek out certain groups to appear. It tended to slant the view of the constitutional tour committee. I just want to make sure that if we are going to go on this tour, this kind of attitude does not prevail, that this person was in favour in the budget or this one is opposed and so on and so forth, and that if we are going to do this, we just do it in an evenhanded fashion.

Mr Christopherson: To ensure the record is fair, the difference here is that, quite frankly, it is going to come down to a pro or con on the budget in many ways. I doubt very much that either of you is going to be asking John Kenneth Galbraith to come in and be your expert witness. So there is very definitely a pro and a con position on the budget as a whole, although some experts may indeed say yea to some parts and nay to others.

The opposition parties would not be doing themselves any good if they brought in someone whom they were not sure of ahead of time to support the positions they have been taking in the House and outside the House. When you have a clear black-and-white issue like that, I think the distribution can be seen to be very fair. Otherwise what we are looking at is two con experts and one pro, which is unfair, particularly since we have the majority in the House. We asked for it to be divided this way for that reason. I would only suggest to Mr Stockwell that we cross the other bridge when we come to it, in terms of how we are going to arrange the groups that come in and the speakers and the questioning, etc. I think we will let fairness rule the day when those issues are in front of us.

Mr Stockwell: God bless you.

The Chair: Can we turn to the report of the subcommittee now? Sorry, Mr Ward. I apologize.

Mr B. Ward: Just as a brief comment, I would like to challenge Mr Stockwell's comments on the Constitution committee. I sat on that committee when it was in Brantford and I found the presentations to be very opinionated and balanced. They were not slanted one way or the other and were a good cross-section of the community in Brantford. So maybe where you sat—

Mr Kwinter: It is a contradiction in terms. They cannot be opinionated and balanced at the same time.

Mr B. Ward: Yes, but besides that—

Mr Stockwell: Overall balanced opinions.

Mr B. Ward: Yes. Perhaps something happened when you were on the committee, but when I was there it seemed to be a good cross-section of the community and everyone had a different opinion.

The Chair: Mr Stockwell's comments would assume a self-fulfilling prophesy from the Confederation committee, and I do not think that was the case.

Mr Stockwell: I do.

The Chair: Now can we turn to the subcommittee report? Would you like to walk us through it, Mr Sutherland?

Mr Sutherland: I think it is pretty straightforward, as the clerk has outlined here. Next Thursday we will attempt to accommodate what was said earlier in terms of Mr Kwinter being able to take the final draft of the report to the caucus and then come back and wrap that up. At that time we may need to adjourn for a few minutes and have another subcommittee meeting and talk a little more about where we will be going in terms of committee hearings on the budget. Then at 11 the Treasurer has agreed to come back and will be allowed time for a statement of up to 15 minutes. He does not have to take that much. Whatever time is remaining will be divided among all three parties.

In the afternoon the Treasury staff will be coming in. They will be making a presentation of maybe 15 or 20 minutes, a technical presentation of the budget, and then time remaining will be divided three ways again for questioning.

The subsequent Thursday we will have four one-hour presentations from our so-called experts, with the government caucus providing two witnesses and the official opposition and the third party providing one witness each. Again, the same format as the Treasurer: Those people will be allowed up to 15 minutes for presentation and the rest of the time will be divided equally between the three parties for questioning. So that is where we are basically going to the end of the month.

The Chair: Are there any questions about this? At some point we have to decide the geographic locations for hearings as well.

Mr Sutherland: Yes, and that probably should be done at a subcommittee meeting first.

The Chair: If you notice the bottom, the clerk has indicated, "Other issues: Advertising for budget review hearings." We have to give him enough notice that he can put the advertisements in the local newspapers with sufficient time so that people can not only know we are coming but prepare briefs to present.

Mr Sutherland: If we are able to decide next Thursday in terms of where the communities are, I think that would give the clerk and people ample time to prepare. I am not sure what was officially decided today but I think it was that we would not be going out on tour for a few weeks anyway. I have not had a chance to confer with my people, but there was some indication that it may not be until late July that we reconvene.

Mr Kwinter: I have not had a chance to talk to our House leader, but at our last caucus meeting he indicated to me that the leaders would not approve any committees sitting until the second week of August. That is what was indicated last Tuesday, and that is when I was told there would be three weeks starting the second week of August for 12 days, no Fridays, just Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. Whether that has been confirmed, I do not know. I also saw a list of where we were going. There are three or four days in Toronto and Thunder Bay and Kingston and Ottawa, wherever it was. Whether that is official, I do not know.

Mr Sutherland: We should have time to confer with our House leaders and caucus and be able to come to some conclusions next week.

The Chair: Are there any other items we should be discussing with respect to planning the hearings on the budget? If not, then do you want to do the budget now?

Clerk of the Committee: Sure.

The Chair: Okay. We will hand out the budget for this committee and we can look at that. While we are handing this out, maybe we can move to the second issue, and that is the translation of the cross-border shopping into French and provision of copies to the Treasurer and other relevant ministers prior to translation, printing and tabling.

The suggestion here was that, as soon as the cross-border shopping brief is done, we send it along to cabinet and the Treasurer, and if it is the will of the committee to have it translated, that the translation come afterwards, as we did with the pre-budget consultation. What is the will of the committee? Where do we go with that one?

Mr Christopherson: Was there not some discussion somewhere about trying to put French and English into the same report because it saves paper and we do not have a lot of extra reports floating around? It is the time factor. How much time do we have?

The Chair: Yes. What happened with the pre-budget consultation, after the final draft was put together, that was sent immediately to the Treasurer and then the finished report was published in English and French and then bound and sent out.

Mr Christopherson: In the same report. I am talking back-to-back pages too. It was done that way?

The Chair: Yes. If you need copies of that report, I have some.

Mr Christopherson: I have a couple kicking around. Thank you, that is fine.

The Chair: What is the will of the committee with respect to translation? Is the scenario I outlined fine?

Mr Christopherson: Sounds fine.

The Chair: Now, if we could turn to the Legislative Assembly standing committee on finance and economic affairs' budget, 1991-92, I asked the clerk to put together a budget for this coming year and this is what we have before us. Maybe we should take a couple of minutes to look through it and then we can discuss it. Did you want to say anything?

Mr Sutherland: No, I will wait until you are ready to start discussion.

Mr Stockwell: May I ask a question? What are witness fees and expenses?

The Chair: I believe the committee picked up the expenses to bring in some of the expert witnesses whom we asked in for the pre-budget consultation. If the same situation arose for this committee to invite in experts, then there are funds available to pay for their expenses to come before the committee.

Mr Stockwell: Well, you can probably strike that; we are just having citizens.

Mr Hansen: These were agreed upon by the subcommittee.

Mr Stockwell: Oh, I am sorry. Were they?

The Chair: Just to continue along, I think I understand your concern about money and how it is going to be spent. For the pre-budget consultation period we had a budget of $74,000. We only spent about $34,000, so we not spend a lot of money in order to do the pre-budget. What happens here is that these are the normal expenses that may or may not be incurred by a committee that has to travel. If they are not incurred, that is fine, but if you do not have it in the budget when we go before the Board of Internal Economy and we need it, then we have missed the boat.

Mr Sutherland and then Mr Christopherson.

Mr Sutherland: A lot of it has been based on the eight weeks and I do not know where the clerk got that figure. I had never heard that we would be doing it for eight. The maximum I have heard is six, and then I am not even sure whether it was going to be a full six. I suggest they can at least be brought down to there. By next week they may be brought down more, but that is the most that I have heard of.

Clerk of the Committee: When I prepared this budget at the Chairman's request, I basically pulled figures out of the air, because without knowing exactly what we are doing and to what extent we are going to travel, they are really very rough estimates.

The eight weeks are based on four weeks of meetings during the summer period, and because this budget carries us through to next year, I am making the assumption that we would have some meetings during the winter period, perhaps in pre-budget consultation. So this budget includes a budget for our activities next winter as well.

Mr Sutherland: Oh, sorry. So this is the budget for the full 1991-92 year, not the budget for the 1991-92 budget hearings.

Clerk of the Committee: Right.

Mr Christopherson: Could I have a quick thumbnail sketch of who the nine staff are?

Clerk of the Committee: Depending on where we travel in the province to hold hearings, the French Language Services Act requires us to provide interpretation services on site. If we are travelling to a community where we are required by law to do that, we require three staff from broadcast and recording, three staff to provide the interpretation services, a Hansard reporter, the clerk of the committee and the research officer, for a total of nine people who would be required in those communities. There are a few communities in Ontario that are not covered by the French Language Services Act, so the interpretation staff would not be required, but nine would be the basic minimum virtually everywhere in the province.

The Chair: How would we travel? By bus, by air, or both?

Clerk of the Committee: Depending on where we are going.

Mr Kwinter: You are not going to go by bus to Thunder Bay.

Clerk of the Committee: By plane mostly.

Mr Hansen: Well, you know, I was a little scared there when it said $1,000 for maps there.

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, have you completed your comment?

Mr Christopherson: My question was satisfactorily answered.

Mr Kwinter: I was just going to comment when Mr Sutherland made his comments that this is a budget that has to go to the Board of Internal Economy. It does not say you must spend it, but unless it is in there, you cannot spend it. So really it is sort of a ballpark figure that says this is what is potentially out there. I think all of us are mandated to be as economical and as careful as possible, but this is just the provision for it to be there. It does not mean you have to spend it.

The Chair: No, and in these times, I think it would look very good if we did not spend it all. Are there any other comments? Ms Ward.

Ms M. Ward: Why are there 56 days under meal allowances, as opposed to 30 days under meetings? Eight weeks, that would mean a seven-day week?

Clerk of the Committee: This budget makes provision for the maximum that could occur. Members are entitled to claim meal allowances and travel per diems on days other than when the committee meets. So assuming the committee were to meet Monday through Friday, members might travel to Toronto for the meetings on a Sunday and return home on a Saturday, so they would have a seven-week travel schedule and therefore would have seven days of meal expenses per week. It would be unlikely that that full amount would be spent.

The Chair: Before we go forward on that, the clerk has asked if the $2,000 would be enough for witness fees and expenses and whether we would be giving honorariums to expert witnesses who would come before this committee. I have absolutely no idea of what has been done in the past.

Mr Sutherland: As past practice, an honorarium has been given, and we have last year's expenditure figures.

Clerk of the Committee: I do not have them with me. I could bring them to the next meeting or send them to you in the meantime if you want to see them. As far as honorariums are paid, it is totally up to the committee, although the maximum the Legislative Assembly allows a committee to pay to an expert witness is $350 a day. After the sub-committee meeting this morning, I was aware that we were going to be inviting some expert witnesses. If we are going to be offering the honorariums or offering to pay travel expenses to and from the hearings, it struck me that the $2,000 might not be enough.

Mr Christopherson: Could somebody throw around a figure that might be more appropriate? Is it a global budget and the line items can be moved around by motion or by the Chair's direction?

Clerk of the Committee: Yes. All except for advertising and travel amounts, which require a change by the Board of Internal Economy. But on the other amount, if we over-expend in one line item and if we finish the year with a surplus, it moves from one item to the other. Considering that, perhaps you are right; we would have enough flexibility in other areas to cover it.

Mr Christopherson: I would hope so, but I am very conscious of what Mr Kwinter has pointed out. I think we saw that last time. I do not think we spent nearly what the entire budget was last time, but it was there if we needed it. Certainly the budget is one of the most important things we will deal with. My hunch is there is enough flexibility there even if you tripled it. I think if you take a look at some of the other dollar figures that have been allotted, we are not going to use the full amount. Unless somebody can make a good case—I am open to it—but I think it will probably be okay.

Mr Kwinter: If we run out, we will just go without lunch.

The Chair: Okay. When do we go before the Board of Internal Economy?

Interjection: I think it is the 20th.

The Chair: Are there any other items that we should deal with?

Mr Sutherland: On the cross-border shopping report, copies to the Treasurer, the relevant minister, before we table in the House—I am just wondering too about the day we table it—will we be sending copies to the Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping and the Sunday shopping group or some of those other groups that we had before us?

The Chair: Yes. That was the same as the pre-budget consultation. We sent the pre-budget consultation report to every witness who appeared before the committee.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. Great.

Mr B. Ward: Mr Chair, is that after we table it?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr B. Ward: When the House officially receives it, then we can distribute it, but not before.

The Chair: Yes. How many copies are we going to create? I think that is an important question. There is a cost factor there.

Clerk of the Committee: On the pre-budget consultation report, we printed 1,200 copies, which gave a leftover amount after all of the other amounts we were required to have of 30 copies for each member of the committee, which is what had been agreed to at the time that the report was adopted. Members may or may not want that many copies of this report or may feel there is a larger public interest and the demand might be high.

The Chair: I seem to still have a large number in my office.

Mr Christopherson: There was a fair demand, an interest in the budget document, if you took per member and then the number of people from the pre-budget who were interested. I suspect this could have more appeal to constituents than a pre-budget consultation, which is probably of more interest to interest groups, which are more aware of the process and care about the dynamics. I would not want to do too much less than what we did the last time, because I could see members wanting to have copies available to constituents who ask for copies along the way or, when they read about it, would like one, or just if the issue is raised. We all do get calls about it, so I do not know that shaving back a few hundred is really going to be saving anything at this point.

The Chair: So 1,200?

Mr Christopherson: What is the cost per copy? What does it work out to roughly?

Clerk of the Committee: We printed 1,200 copies of the report. The bill, I believe, was something around $6,000, so it is about $5 a copy.

Mr Christopherson: We all know in campaigns it is the initial cost that really bumps up the dollars. When you start adding 1,000 or 2,000 of the campaign literature at the end, it is relatively inexpensive. I would be comfortable going again with 1,200. I do not think that is way out of line.

The Chair: Fine. Are there any other items of business?

Mr Hansen: There is one thing on this. Maybe Mr Stockwell could give an idea, with the number of faxes that came in, of how many copies of the report would be required in the end.

Mr Stockwell: How many faxes I got?

Mr Hansen: Not so much, but all these requests for the budget.

Mr Stockwell: Oh, yes. Most of those did not want the budget, though.

Mr Hansen: No, but they want to see the end result of this task force going around the province on the budget.

The Chair: We are not talking about that budget. We are talking about the cross-border shopping document.

Mr Hansen: I am sorry. I got off that one. Okay.

The Chair: We have not even discussed that.

Clerk of the Committee: So 1,200 of the cross-border shopping?

Mr Stockwell: That is fine by me.

The Chair: Any other items of business? The way it was left, there is one item left on the report to consider. Has the government caucus caucused?

Mr Christopherson: Always working. We would like to respond to the recommendation of the third party, which we acknowledged was similar to that contained in recommendation 10 of the Liberal document. First, the point, we thought, was well taken and we could see this as an effective tool for all of us. What we would like to suggest is the following language that would amend the number 4 proposal:

"The Ontario government should produce and make publicly available an analysis of the impact on jobs of any relevant legislation or regulations it proposes to introduce or amend as it relates to cross-border shopping."

The Chair: Are there any comments?

Mr Stockwell: It is going to be a very difficult job to determine exactly the piece of legislation or regulation that affects cross-border shopping.

Mr Christopherson: If I could suggest, no more so than the subjective opinion of what will impact on competitiveness and what does not.

Mr Stockwell: Right, except you are looking at all legislation and regulation.

Mr Christopherson: Except the focus of this whole exercise is to talk about cross-border shopping, so we thought it was fair to target it to that issue. The way it is ordered, we are not prepared to support that amendment, but something very close to it we are.

40

Mr Kwinter: I appreciate the intent and the attempt to accommodate the principle. The problem I have is that when you put in the words "cross-border shopping"—and I'm just giving you my perception; I do not know whether it is right or not—there is a tendency to say, "What that does it relates to the border communities," and to make sure that whatever we do does not sort of exacerbate that problem, whereas when you take a look at cross-border shopping, you have to take a look at the total context of why people are going across and shopping in the United States.

The problem I have is that somewhere along the line, if we adopt your words, someone is going to arbitrarily make the decision that by our increasing whatever it is, whether it be an employer tax or whatever else, it is not going to really impact on cross-border shopping so we do not have to worry about it, whereas this particular thing is going to relate to cross-border shopping so we should take that into consideration.

Who is going to decide what particular measure impacts on cross-border shopping and which one does not? There may be a difference of opinion, maybe a great difference of opinion. Let's say the minimum wage, a perfect example. You may not look upon that as a cross-border shopping issue, but it may be. I would suggest it certainly will be. But that may be looked at and it may be said: "What has that got to do with cross-border shopping? That has to do with our commitment to raise the minimum wage and as a result we don't have to really apply that particular test." That is my concern.

Mr Christopherson: I hear your point and it is well taken. I certainly respect it. If you take a look at the wording proposed even by the third party, the word "relevant" is about as subjective as you can possibly get. I think the issue you raised is important, but that is an argument that will always take place, particularly in this place, so it is a question of how focused we want to make it.

Mr Stockwell: "Relevant" is there. For instance, let's deal with today's agenda, Bill 36, to review the legislation on assessment and the collection of the information. We put "relevant" in there because we really do not think that has a lot to do with or would impact in any great detail or has anything to do with cross-border shopping or financing or costs of doing business.

Mr Christopherson: But would you agree someone else could say they do? I mean, they would have the right.

Mr Stockwell: I do not suggest that anyone does not have the right, but I think anyone in his right thinking would say—

Mr Christopherson: In your opinion.

Mr Stockwell: I guess the point I am making is, by defining it strictly to cross-border shopping, you have made a very narrow interpretation of what we were striving for here. I think Mr Kwinter makes an excellent point. The minimum wage is an example, and I can give you other ones that in the way they are dealt with in the House, very little comes up with respect to cross-border shopping but they do affect the cost of doing business at a border community.

So we did not want to just specifically say, "Okay, a cross-border shopping issue," because all kinds of decisions we make in the House affect cross-border communities and "cross-border" never comes up during the debate. Minimum wage is a very good example. Here is an example of where we are going to talk about increasing the minimum wage, which will then make those cross-border towns that much more uncompetitive. We will have no relevant study in which to make that point.

Mr Christopherson: I would disagree. I do not think it really takes away from your ability to make the obvious—

Mr Stockwell: Like minimum wage?

Mr Christopherson: I would think so. You would make the argument. I do not think this negates your ability to make that argument under this language. There may be something else extraneous that you might feel is lost in this focus, but then, to be frank, what we are trying to do is keep this document relative to the issue at hand and not see it used as a tool for other things. If you want that analysis for other things, there are other places and ways to do it.

Mr Stockwell: No disagreement, but even you will accept the fact that any impact on the tax point of view, any changes to the taxation level, are going to affect cross-border communities. Everyone will accept that. It is up to your government, if this is adopted, to say, "Fine, we should produce and make public an analysis of the effects of any relevant legislation or regulation." That means when they are doing it in concert, is there analysis? There is no point in bringing the legislation forward, having me stand up and say, "Gee, where's your analysis?" and you saying, "We didn't really think it was part of this," and then asking for it and by the time you end up getting the analysis, the legislation is through the House.

Mr Christopherson: But what I am arguing to you is that you could find yourself in that position regardless of which wording you use. You still have to make the case if the government decides that a job impact analysis is not necessary because it does not think it relates to competitiveness. That debate, that difference of opinion, may still occur.

Mr Stockwell: I agree, but the gap is significantly reduced.

Mr Christopherson: Right, and we make no bones about the fact that we are trying to narrow the gap and focus it, and we are substantiating that by saying, "This is a report on cross-border shopping." So all we have said is that the legislation we are talking about is things that impact on cross-border shopping. Bear in mind we have already said earlier in other recommendations that the impact overall on cross-border shopping should be a factor in all legislation that the government looks on henceforward. We have agreed to that with you.

Mr Stockwell: All right.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to illustrate a couple of practical examples. Believe me, I hope it will be interpreted as not being partisan. There are two situations that have happened within the last month in the Legislature that indicate to me the need to really bring to the attention of the government the need to take a look at this particular issue.

Number one is the gas guzzler tax. The thing that disturbs me about that is that somewhere, 30 people, more or less, give or take one or two, sat around at a table and thought that was fine. They looked at it, someone had to approve it and said, "Yes, that's what we are going to do," without, obviously, any consideration as to the impact it was going to have on some jobs. Now that it has sort of been brought to the attention of these people, they are scrambling around to say, "Okay, let's see how we can address this."

My concern is, there has to be an awareness level before these people say it is all right. They have to say, "Hey, let's just think about this thing." I know you have an agenda out there for the environment, but is it going to be effective and what is it going to do to some jobs? Now there is going to have to be some retrenching. Exactly the same thing happened with Bill 70.

Again, without being derogatory, without being critical, you do not have to be a rocket scientist to have seen the provisions that were there. I can tell you, when I first saw it, I stood up in caucus and I said: "This is absurd. These guys are going to drive business out of this province. The business community is going to go wild. I have never seen such draconian legislation."

I am not telling any tales out of school. Some of my caucus colleagues said: "It's not so bad. You're overreacting." I said: "Trust me. I am a businessman. I can tell you that it will drive them wild." I have not heard of one piece of proposed legislation that has so gotten the attention of the business community as Bill 70. What happened? The minister had to stand up and say, "Okay, we're going to take all that away." I am telling you, if you think we have a problem now in Ontario with the economy, that would have been the final nail in the coffin. The point is—

Mr Christopherson: The point is, we listened.

Mr Kwinter: It happened, but the point I am trying to make is, it would have been a lot better if someone had taken a look at that before it came out, because the genie is out of the bottle. Yes, it has been retracted, but there are hundreds of thousands of people out there who are saying, "You know about that law they are putting into Ontario?" and they have not heard that it is not going forward. All they are talking about is, "You know they're going to make directors responsible for severance or wages or pensions a year after they leave?" It just has a negative impact on jobs.

The point is that there has to be someone waving the flag before it happens, so they say: "Let's take a look at this thing. What is its impact going to be on jobs in Ontario? If it's going to be negative, let's look at it." If you just equate it and use the term "cross-border shopping," that is a problem, but it is a manifestation of another problem. That is competitiveness and everything else.

My concern is I do not want to see another gas guzzler tax or another Bill 70 provision that gets through, because we have said this and they do not equate it to cross-border shopping. They do not say: "What's that got to do with cross-border shopping? Forget about it," whereas our whole fiscal responsibility, our competitiveness and our job creation is something that I think every single piece of legislation should be measured against: What is this going to do to the job market? What is it going to do to our ability to keep the economy of this province viable? We have to weigh it in that perspective.

It is important and I just feel that if you restrict it to the terms of cross-border shopping, a lot more of those things are going to fall through the sieve. They are not going to get caught because people are not going to make the relationship. They are going to say, "This has nothing to do with cross-border shopping, so forget it."

Mr Christopherson: Listen, I have great respect for your position and what you have argued. I think it is just a question of you would like it as wide as possible and we would like to keep it as narrow as possible.

Mr Kwinter: Why though?

Mr Christopherson: Why not? There are other committees that are dealing with other issues. It is your job, of course, to try and get as many tools in your hands as possible, through whatever means possible, that help you in your job in opposition. It is our job, I think, to try to represent the government point of view, which is to ensure that we are dealing with the matters at hand and that we are addressing in a fair, equitable fashion the issues that you raise in opposition to what we propose on this committee as they relate to the issues that we have before us. The issue before us is cross-border shopping.

I think that really what it comes down to is that there is a partisan difference here, and there is a difference of opinion based on the fact that you have got government members and non-government members. I think the arguments you make are correct in their own right but go further than we are mandated to look at here. That is our position.

Mr Kwinter: Could I just respond to that for a minute? What I would suggest is that by making it less narrow, you do not necessarily make it broader. I am not saying that it should be an all-encompassing thing, that every single thing should be looked at, but what I am saying is that the minute you put in the words "cross-border shopping" you restrict it to the point where it is a very narrow focus. I am not in any way trying to be specific and say that every social service activity, everything—I am just saying that you could just leave it non-specific but also non-broad. You can interpret it any way you want, but I just feel this is too restrictive.

Mr Christopherson: I hear you, but to pick up on the example you started to use, a social service, it would probably be a stretch to make that apply to the cross-border shopping, although one could stand up and argue to some degree. I mean, you could reach and find arguments. If you made it the issue of a competitive position, certainly our friends in the third party might begin to argue about the st of social programs and how that impacts on competitiveness.

Mr Kwinter: Well—

Mr Christopherson: Just let me finish. The one thing is not is to run away from the word “competitiveness,” which seems to be a favourite point of discussion among my friends in the media these days. Contrary to that, we are not afraid of the word. In fact, I think and hope we are dealing with it head-on, because we need to. All we are trying to do here is keep this recommendation focused on the issue that is at hand.

Mr Stockwell: I guess my problem is I do not really understand—

The Chair: They liked you down the hall.

Mr Stockwell: That is because I—no, they were not happy because you introduced me.

My problem is, I hear your arguments, but what comes to my mind is, so what? All we are looking for is information when you are making a decision. If the third-party members push this to the extreme and say, “According to social services, we need that benefit,” I do not think it will happen, but so what? All you are getting is more information. I think that is what we are here to try and get, information.

If you are going to suggest that by including it the way it is phrased now we are going to have too much information or you are going to allow us the upper hand because we learned what really happens when you introduce certain pieces of legislation, that is really shortsighted. It is reasonable.

I think the two examples cited are clear indicators to me why you as the government would be agreeing to it, because you can save face. Rather than backtracking some few weeks or months later, you can learn all this information up front, and if you are going to continue on with the legislation, you can line up your arguments beforehand. It just does not make sense to me why anyone would not want the information about what this legislation will do to affect jobs and competitiveness. Why anyone would not want that information is beyond me.

Mr Jamison: I do not know. I think the proposal of the government side here does not limit you from looking at anything. The report itself is a report that deals with cross-border shopping. That is what we are dealing with and trying to round out here. It is a cross-border shopping report from this committee. I do not know how that could cause anyone heartburn. That is what we are doing here today. Certainly the effects of different legislation, pending legislation, tax increases or decreases, can be weighed in and factored in.

In a non-partisan way, as you have already said, Monte, I really do not understand this debate that has been going on here for the last 15 minutes, because in my mind it is not restrictive. The wording that has been put forward really does not hem us in. I know that as a government member, I want to be able to scrutinize, just the same as the opposition and the third-party members, the effects of any legislation that would affect the particular issue we are dealing with in committee now, the cross-border shopping report from the finance and economics committee.

The whole situation on cross-border shopping is vast really. There are multitudes of things that could affect that particular issue. I do not understand why this has caused this committee such a long and strenuous kind of debate around particular wording when the wording we are in fact debating is “cross-border shopping.” I just do not understand why we are allowing ourselves to get off the track on this thing.

The Chair: Ms Anderson has brought a question, and that is, are we dealing with the amendment to the third party’s number 4 as a separate issue or are we dealing with it instead of what would be number 15 of the report?

Mr Christopherson: No. It was a separate point. We thought it was strong enough.

I will just make one point and then that is our position explained ad nauseam. The last thing is—and I think Mr Kwinter twigged to it when he said that we tried to accommodate—the fact of the matter is that if we were not interested in having information come out, then really, politically, internally within the government, the best thing for us to do would have been to just ignore number 4 and set it aside, because information is something that is not always desired by some individuals in some circumstances, but we thought the point was well taken, and I say that with all due respect. All we wanted to do was to make sure that indeed it was relevant to the issue before us and that it was not in any way a back door—

Mr Stockwell: I give up.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, just to reply to Mr Jamison, you have not seen me in a prolonged debate. You have not seen me in a strenuous debate. If you think my objection is prolonged and strenuous, it was really just a comment, just something that came up, and I was putting forward a point of view. It is certainly not something that, as I say, I had given any prolonged effort or any strain to. It was just a matter of pointing it out in the same way that the last time we met I raised the question about the word “panacea.” I am just raising it. I am quite prepared to have it discussed, as we have, and to move on. That was it, no more, no less.

Mr Stockwell: Okay. Let’s go with yours.

Mr Jamison: I look forward to the day when I can see you in a strenuous debate.

The Chair: I was just going to ask, is this a threat, a warning or a comment?

Mr Stockwell: He only gets to those in caucus.

The Chair: Are there further comments to the report?

Mr Christopherson: No, we are satisfied with the report as amended to this moment.

The Chair: Are there any further comments about any part of the report, or can we pass this along to the writing team to put together a final draft?

Mr Stockwell: We reserve the right to take it back to our respective caucuses. Okay.

Mr Christopherson: I just wrote that one now. I do not think there will be a problem.

Mr Stockwell: Water off a duck for you guys.

Mr Christopherson: Usually you would think the other way around, would you not?

The Chair: Are there any other items of business we should deal with now, or do we adjourn this committee?

Mr Stockwell: I move adjournment.

The Chair: All in favour? This committee is adjourned till 10 o'clock next Thursday.

The committee adjourned at 1700.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 20 June 1991

The committee met at 1018 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: I think I am going to see a quorum and begin this because, as Mr Kwinter indicated, at 10:30 he is to go to a meeting and we want to be sure that we wrap it up so that when the Treasurer comes in at 11 o'clock we are done with the cross-border shopping.

Where would we like to begin this morning? Have we noticed any changes we would like to discuss or are there any outstanding issues we need to address?

Mr Christopherson: On the first point from Anne, does the committee wish to indicate in the report those commendations that are unanimous?" obviously we would like to. I think that is entirely in the hands of the opposition members as to what their comfort level is with that idea.

Mr Kwinter: Both our party and the third party have indicated we are going to be putting in minority reports. There are certain proposals in here that I personally, and I assume my colleagues, do not have a feeling about one way or the other. It was not something sufficiently outrageous or contentious that we wanted to dispute it, but it was not something we thought was the be-all and end-all. It was just there and we said: "We have no problem. If you want to put that in, go ahead and put it in. We don't really have a problem with it." The ones we do have a problem with we are going to address in our minority report.

From that point of view, I would be just as happy without commenting one way or the other whether it is unanimous or not. The fact is it is in the report. It is the report of the committee and we will sign it, but I would feel a little uncomfortable giving the impression that I have 100% agreement with every single one of these things. I do not have any great disagreement with them but there are two or three of those things I just do not have a feeling about one way or the other. I do not know whether anyone else wants to comment.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine. That really is fine. No argument from us whatsoever. I can appreciate your position. The only thing I would suggest is that some of the recommendations may have added weight with the cabinet if it were indicated that these are things the three of us agree on. I just leave that thought out there, and if the opposition is not comfortable with that way, we certainly respect that.

While I have the floor, I would just acknowledge that in the next point, the two recommendations from Anne are also acceptable. On the third point, I think it is probably appropriate that we indeed show the revised estimate and keep the report as current as possible, as close to the date that appears on it that we completed our work. I think that makes good sense.

Ms Anderson: If I can just make a suggestion for some wording for that, perhaps on page 6, at the end of paragraph 2, we could add some words, something to the effect of, "A subsequent study by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology, publicized after the committee's hearings, estimates the loss of retail sales to be $2.2 billion, more than double the previous estimate."

Mr Christopherson: Whatever reflects the truth.

The Chair: Are we comfortable with that? Any discussion on that? Seeing none, are there any other points?

Mr B. Ward: Are we wrapping up the report?

The Chair: Yes, we are. That is our hope. My sense from the committee was that is what we would try to do this morning.

Mr B. Ward: Before we finalize everything, two or three weeks ago I asked research to see if it could find information on the economic status of the American border communities and states. We received a report that was a tax comparison between us and the Americans, but we never did get information on the economic wellbeing of the American communities. I am just wondering if it was perhaps too difficult or we just could not do it. Some questions, in my mind, are still there.

If Buffalo is receiving all this economic activity from Ontario companies through relocation, why in the last year or so did it feel compelled to shut down its transit system because it could not afford to pay for it? New York City's mayor, just a week and a half ago, went on record as saying that they are going to have to shut down every fourth streetlight because they cannot afford to run them. I do not know why they have to do that. Perhaps Anne could clarify that. Maybe that information is not out there and that is why our research could not come up with some report on the economic health and wellbeing of the American communities and states at borders.

Ms Anderson: The information is difficult to compare between the different states and the different—

Mr B. Ward: I am not saying comparing.

Ms Anderson: Perhaps there was a slight misunderstanding. I thought you were trying to find some kind of comparison between the bordering states and Ontario, and that is partly what the tax information was to address.

Mr B. Ward: That was what we received, the tax comparison, but it never really covered why the American communities and states are in financial trouble if they are doing so well. It never really touched on that. Perhaps it is too late, because we are closing the book on this chapter, but if we happen to have cross-border shopping come back to this committee, that is something we would want to take a look at in greater detail.

The Chair: Mr Sterling moves that we add recommendation 18 to the report, and that recommendation 18 be, "The Ontario government should roll back the gasoline, fuel, alcohol and tobacco tax increases imposed by the 1991 budget."

Mr Sterling: I would like a recorded vote on this, Mr Chair.

The committee divided on Mr Sterling's motion, which was negated on the following vote:

Ayes—4

Kwinter, Miclash, Phillips, G., Sterling.

Nays—5

Christopherson, Hansen, Sutherland, Ward, B., Ward, M.

The Chair: Mr Sterling moves that we add to this report as recommendation 18, "The Ontario government should harmonize its provincial sales tax with the federal goods and services tax."

Discussion?

Mr Christopherson: Just a question. Norm, for simplicity's sake, are you just moving the recommendations that were on your page?

Mr Sterling: Yes. It is recommendation 2.

The Chair: Hearing no discussion, all those in favour?

Mr Sterling: I would like a recorded vote as well.

The committee divided on Mr Sterling's motion, which was negated on the following vote:

Ayes—1

Sterling.

Nays—8

Christopherson, Hansen, Kwinter, Miclash, Phillips, G., Sutherland, Ward, B., Ward, M.

The Chair: Mr Sterling moves that the Ontario government should produce and make publicly available an analysis of the effects of any relevant legislation or regulations it proposes to introduce or amend on the competitive position of the Ontario economy or, where appropriate, on specific sectors.

Mr Christopherson: Briefly, I just want the record to show that in our previous discussions we did offer up a response to that. There is now language in the main report that we believe deals with the substantive matter contained in the motion, but we recognize the changes that the opposition would like to see, and hence the motion that is before us, but the record should reflect that we do believe we accommodated much of what recommendation 4 says.

The Chair: Further discussion?

Mr Sterling: It is a recorded vote too, Mr Chair.

The committee divided on Mr Sterling's motion, which was negated on the following vote:

Ayes—3

Miclash, Phillips, G., Sterling.

Nays—5

Christopherson, Hansen, Jamison, Ward, B., Ward, M.

1030

The Chair: Mr Christopherson moves the adoption of the report as contained in draft 3 with the amendments that were made today.

Mr Sterling: I am going to vote against the report and we will be submitting a dissenting opinion. I consider the report to have no significant recommendations which will in effect, deal with the cross-border shopping issue and alleviate the concerns of border communities. I believe most of it is recommendations which will have, perhaps, little effect, but not very much effect on the problem.

The committee divided on Mr. Christopherson's motion which was agreed to on the following vote:

Ayes—6

Christopherson, Hansen, Jamison, Sutherland, Ward, B., Ward, M.

Nays—3

Miclash, Phillips, G., Sterling.

The Chair: We need to have a deadline for the dissenting opinion so that we can get the report to the Treasurer. He has indicated to me that sooner rather than later would be his preference, so what is the will of the committee in terms of the dissenting report?

Mr Sutherland: If I could make a comment, I think it is important that we have this report ready to release before the House adjourns. I think the positions have been very well-thought-out. The Liberal caucus has brought forward its recommendations, and we debated them, and I think they know where they are going. As for the third party, I think we have been very accommodating in waiting for initial recommendations to come forward. I think one of the reasons they were delayed is because the two members who were supposed to represent the third party on this committee decided that the budget hearings across the province by their caucus should take precedence over the official business of the House, and we have been very accommodating there. So I hope we would have a very short deadline so that we can have this report tabled in the House before we adjourn next week.

The Chair: Are you recommending a date, Mr Sutherland?

Mr Sutherland: I guess I need to know, once those reports are in, how long it would take to attach them and then have the whole report tabled in the House. I am not quite sure; is it a day process, is it a two-day process?

The Chair: The clerk is informing me that it has to be translated, then bound, then prepared to present to the House. Perhaps you would like to comment on the possibility of doing it before next Thursday.

Clerk of the Committee: The translation is really a time-consuming process. Even if we had the dissenting opinions by tomorrow, I am not sure we could get it translated in time. The committee could agree to table an English version, with the French to follow, although last week in discussion, the committee agreed that it wanted it together back-to-back in the same document.

Mr Hansen: Is it not possible to translate this document here? It would be a very short document from each of the other parties, the opposition party and the third party, and possibly we would be able to meet the deadline.

The Chair: As the clerk has just informed me, it depends on the deadline for the dissenting opinions; obviously the deadline would have to be sooner rather than later. Do we have a date?

Mr Sterling: I would hope to be able to provide you with a dissenting opinion by Tuesday of next week, which is only three or four days from now. I had hoped that there would be changes with regard to the government's report, so I call this committee's report. We may be able to have it done before that time.

The Chair: The clerk has informed me that the body of the report could be sent out to begin translation today, and that the dissenting reports could be translated and in some version, not bound, but perhaps a photocopied version that could be tabled in the House by the end of sitting next week.

Mr B. Ward: If you get it Tuesday.

The Chair: Is that the instruction to the clerk? We need a motion.

Mr Christopherson moves that the opposition be requested to provide their dissenting reports by Tuesday of next week, to the clerk of the committee.

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Do we need a motion to table it in its unbound form?

Clerk of the Committee: No, that is not a problem, but does the committee want to have the report simply tabled, or tabled and debated with a motion to adopt the recommendations?

Mr B. Ward: Do you need a motion for that?

The Chair: I would think, yes.

Mr B. Ward: I so move.

The Chair: Which one?

Mr B. Ward: What is normal procedure here?

The Chair: With the pre-budget document—it was first tabled—there was no debate.

Mr B. Ward: Is that normal procedure?

Mr Sterling: That does not matter. They do that in case they want to debate it some time in the future, because it is up to the government House leader to call it or not. That is the normal procedure.

The Chair: Standing orders also give this committee an option to ask for comprehensive comment from the government on the recommendations within 180 days of the tabling of the report.

Mr Sterling: Sounds good to me.

Mr Christopherson: This side of the room, the government side, has continually said how important we consider this matter to be, and that we want this report to have some strength to it. That has not been rhetoric; we mean it. I think that asking for that kind of response is consistent with the message that we have sent our colleagues, and I think we would agree to make that request also.

The Chair: Are there any other comments or discussion on the report? Then I consider this matter to be closed and I thank the committee for their co-operation. The Chair has appreciated that. Since the Treasurer is not going to appear until 11 o'clock, are there other matters of business this committee should consider before we hear from the Treasurer?

Mr Christopherson: Is Norm going to be driving the bus when we travel in August?

Mr Sterling: Are we travelling in August?

Mr Phillips: Have the dates been set yet?

Mr Sutherland: Correct me if I am wrong, but I thought we were meeting the last week of July, starting 29 July, for four days here—

Mr Christopherson: Could I interject for a moment and indicate that we are now moving into the discussion of the budget and the budget itinerary for the upcoming hearings.

Mr Sutherland: Probably what needs to be done is another subcommittee meeting just to confirm some of those details before we formally discuss it here. I was under the impression that we are meeting, starting 29 July, the week before the civic holiday, for four days, and then we take the week of the civic holiday off, and then we are back for, I believe, three more weeks of four days travelling around. That is tentatively what I have heard. I would not want to be held to that as a final in-stone decision.

Mr Sterling: What are you going to do if we do hold you to it?

What are the four weeks? Do you know, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: Other than what Mr Sutherland has just said to you, I—

Mr Sterling: Okay. Why do we not discuss it when we have the information?

The Chair: The other point we have to settle here concerns the expert witnesses who are being brought forward by the parties.

Mr Sutherland: May I suggest, Mr Chair, that if we could have a subcommittee meeting on Monday some time, we might be able to get all those issues resolved in terms of what weeks the committee is holding hearings and who exactly the expert witnesses will be. I do not know whether Mr Kwinter is coming back—

Mr Phillips: He will be back.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. Maybe we can agree as to when we can have a subcommittee meeting on Monday to finalize those details.

The Chair: All right. Are there any other matters before the Treasurer arrives? Should we take a short recess until about five to 11, so that we are here in time for the Treasurer? Is that agreed? I think it is agreed.

The committee recessed at 1041.

1991-92 BUDGET

The Chair: I would like to call this session to order. We have with us this morning the Treasurer of Ontario to discuss the budget. Welcome, Mr Treasurer. I understand you have some opening comments you would like to make.

HONOURABLE FLOYD LAUGHREN

Hon Mr Laughren: Thank you for the invitation to appear here. Despite what others might have said, I welcome these hearings. I think they are an opportunity to have a good debate on the budget and substitute some light for the heat that has been there on it. So I really do look forward to it.

I am very pleased as well that you have decided to travel; I gather you have decided to travel. I do not know your exact schedule, but I am really happy about that because there are a lot of people out there who want to know the whole story on the budget, not just the distortions that have been raised about it. So I am really happy that you are going to be travelling across the province. I do not know how much time I am going to be able to spend with you on that, but they are not my hearings anyway. They are your hearings, not the Treasury's.

With me this morning is Bryan Davies, who is the Deputy Treasurer. He will help me out on any questions you might have that I do not know the answers to. There are some other people from Treasury here too who will help out if you have questions that are perhaps too technical or that I simply do not know the answer to.

I think the job you have to do is an important one. As a long-time advocate of the committee system in this province, I almost envy you, Mr Chair, as you head across the province in August, I believe, conducting these hearings.

It has now been about two months since the budget was brought down, the first budget we have ever had the opportunity to deliver in this province. There has been a lot of debate over the budget, some in the Legislature, although not as much as I would have liked. I really wish we could have got on with the debate on the budget, but that is history and I will not dwell on it. There has been a lot of debate in the media and the fax lines have even heated up, dealing with the budget. I am happy that we are now in an open legislative process, where we should be debating the budget. It is an important budget, it makes some important statements and I am really pleased that we have reached the point now where elected representatives are having an opportunity to debate it.

I wanted to start off by putting the budget in the context of the economic conditions in which we find ourselves and in which we found ourselves as we were drafting the budget. The recession, as we know, is the worst that we have experienced since the Second World War. We lost over 250,000 jobs last year, basically private sector jobs, in this province. The manufacturing sector in particular experienced a very severe decline in output. House sales and car sales dropped dramatically and capital investment was down as well.

We just received the Canadian figures for the first quarter of the calendar year, the January to March period. Taking that first quarter and transferring it into an annual rate, the real gross domestic product declined at an annual rate of 4.6%. When you combine that with the fourth quarter of last year, which was down to minus 4.9%, it is the worst two-quarter decline in GDP since the recession. That is how serious the recession has been.

Hon Mr Laughren: Since the war at least, yes. That is why there were 260,000 jobs lost in the economy of Ontario. Ten years ago when there was a recession, there were about 223,000 jobs lost, so it is more severe. I will comment on the nature of some of the closures too.

The drop in economic output in Ontario saw a decline from an average of 3.6% of annual increases in the 1980s to minus 3.3% in 1991. That gives you an example of the magnitude of the drop.

We are certain as well that the recession has signalled some very fundamental changes in the Ontario economy. The shift is going on away from manufacturing and toward the service industries, and that has been accelerated while this recession is on. We need to adjust to that new reality.

It was against that backdrop of a severe recession that we found ourselves planning for and then delivering our first budget as a government. We made a decision, and have not had a moment of doubt or second thought or hesitation that our decision, a deliberate decision to fight the recession rather than the deficit, was the right one. We would do it again. I am proud that we decided to fight this recession and protect people in the worst recession since the Second World War.

The $9.7-billion deficit that people do not like was not caused by a wild spending spree. By no stretch of the imagination was it caused by that. The effect of the recession on revenues and expenditures is really what got us there not because we are a big-spending government.

If you look at the results of the recession just on our revenues, for example, you will see that in 1991, if we were to experience the same revenues as we had because of growth in the 1980s, our revenues would be between $3.3 billion and $3.7 billion higher for 1991-92. In other words, if we had had the same kind of growth that we had been rolling along with in this province, approximately $3.5 billion in increased revenues would have come our way.

On top of that, we had the federal government. I do not think anybody has disputed this fact; not even the Tories in this House have disputed the fact that the cutbacks in transfer payments from the federal government cost us about $1.6 billion. We had to make up for that, my friends. You never bring that into the equation when you talk about it in the assembly, I notice.

We have statutory obligations to pay people assistance when they lose their job, at least partly because of the new regulations on the UIC, I might add. We have a statutory requirement to pay those people assistance when they go off unemployment and on to social assistance. Unless you believe we should just turn them on to the streets, we have obligation to pay those people some income maintenance. In 1991-92, that will be up by about $1.4 billion. That is a lot of money and that is a statutory requirement. That is a 40% increase, and do not tell me that this government had any role to play in causing those welfare rates to go up 40%. You might look to some other people as to why we have a recession like this.

That is why I get very angry when I see the federal Tories criticizing Ontario. Their high dollar and high interest rates had more to do with this recession than even the previous government did, so I think we should put in perspective just why we are in this recession and how we had to cope with it and why we had to cope with it.

I want to get into some more options that we could have dealt with if we had wanted to satisfy the Tories and not have this deficit, and I am going to be very specific this morning.

We really believe we made the right choice. This year we are spending $4.3 billion in capital expenditures. When the private sector tells me we are spending too much and that the deficit is too high, I say to them, "Should we cut back on capital expenditures?" I hear, "Well, no, you really shouldn't cut back on capital expenditures because that is an investment in the future."

Besides, who does the capital expenditure work? When we spend money on capital, who does the work? It is the private sector that does the work, so there is an advantage to the private sector in our spending that $4.3 billion in capital.

More important, it is an investment in Ontario. I hope the people in this room will read budget paper E attached to the budget because there is a clear statement in there of how we view Ontario. We believe that putting money, capital expenditures now, is what is going to make Ontario competitive in the future. We feel very, very strongly about that and I have not had too many people complain about that.

We know as well that the deficit has helped maintain and create—a combination of those two things—70,000 jobs. If you think that 260,000 jobs is not enough jobs to lose in the province and you would rather have 330,000, then stand up and say so, because that is what this deficit did; it protected or created 70,000 jobs.

The anti-recession package alone, the $700 million package which, when you add on the local government contribution, came to pretty close to $1 billion—the last number I saw was about $940 million or $950 million—created about 14,000 jobs in the province; person jobs, not all full-year jobs because a lot of the projects were short-term and it was all capital project jobs.

Those were not programs. They were not programs that are going to be built into the system and continued; they were capital works that needed to be done anyway. They were on the shelf waiting to be done. We either did them in the future or we did them now. But why put them off? Why not do them now when they are desperately needed? The jobs are needed and the improvements to our infrastructure in this province are needed now as well, so why not do it now? And yet I hear the Tories telling me that we should not be doing that kind of thing because our deficit is too high. Well, fine. Tell us that you do not want those jobs out there, but do not pretend that you can have it both ways, that you can create jobs without having a deficit at a time of recession. It is simply not possible.

We did in this budget expand training opportunities for workers who want to enter or re-enter the workforce. We are committed to reforming the social assistance system and we have put $215 million into reforming the system, because if I feel strongly about one thing, it is the term "transitions" in that Social Assistance Review Committee report, transitions from welfare to work. We want to do that in a very positive way and that is what that $215 million in the budget is designed to do. We think that is what people want; they want that system reformed. Everybody tells us that, the private sector, the public sector, the recipients, everybody wants that system revised. Well, you cannot do it for free. You better get that in your heads. It costs money to reform the social assistance system and get people back to work, and we think now is the time to do it, both in terms of training and counselling and getting people back into the workplace.

For people at the bottom end of the income scale, we are providing tax relief through the Ontario tax reduction program, the largest enrichment in the history of this province, and we are very proud of that. Unless, of course, you believe those at the bottom of the scale should not be getting any benefits out of the system; then I suppose you would tell us that we should not improve that, either.

We are improving the supports to employment program to help social assistance recipients keep part of their net earnings while on welfare to help them get back into the workplace, because we got a lot of complaints that you go out and work and then it does not pay you to go out and work. We think that is an important ingredient in that whole transition concept as well.

We increased the grants to municipalities, which had been frozen, as you may recall, in order that they can cope with some of their demands. We did not do the offloading that the federal Tories did. That would have been part of the solution of keeping the deficit down. We could have stuck it to the municipalities and to the school boards and to the hospitals, but you do not tell us to do that; you just tell us to keep the deficit down. It is time there was some honest debate around this deficit and this budget.

We are increasing the supply of affordable housing with an additional 10,000 rent-geared-to-income units. If you think those should not be there, say so, but I think they should be. I think it is an important part not just of economic development but of social development, and housing is one of the best economic stimulants there is, because when you build houses, you also need furniture, appliances and landscaping. It is a very good economic stimulant, a good multiplier, and we think that is an important statement to make.

We also decided not to put the provincial sales tax on top of the GST. That in itself saved almost $470 million. If the Tories think we should be putting it on top of the GST, they should say so. Say if that is the way you think we should be reducing the deficit so at least we will know where you stand.

I wanted to get into some of the alternatives we had, because I think that is something people have not been talking about very much. Just to put it in perspective, we ended last year with a $3-billion deficit. I really have not heard anybody blame the government for that, not even the Tories. They are blaming us for the $9.7 billion this year, but not the $3 billion. I have not heard anybody do that. There may be some, but I think most fair-minded people understand that we inherited a government in the midst of a recession when the bottom was falling out of the Ontario economy and we certainly were not the cause of that.

But if you put into perspective what we could have done to satisfy the Tories on reducing the deficit back to the $3 billion—not even back to zero; I have not heard you say that, but you certainly think we should have kept the deficit down to $3 billion, I understand—there are some things we could have done.

We could have flat-lined the major transfer payments to our major transfer partners. I think people understand that means the municipalities, it means the school boards, it means the hospitals and it means the colleges and the universities. I remind you that enrolment is going up in our educational institutions, we have an aging population, so there is increased utilization of the health care system.

Talk to any municipal politician, talk to people at the local level and see what they think about having their property taxes go up. See what they think. Tell them that is what you want them to do. Tell them you want the provincial government to keep its deficit down, offload the costs on to the municipalities so the property tax will be higher. Be honest; say that to them. I have not heard you say that, but that is what is implied in what you are telling us.

If we had done that, if we had flat-lined transfers to our partners out there, as we call them, enrolment in colleges and universities would have had to be cut, we think, by about 25,000 students. Almost 5,000 hospital beds would have had to be closed; 10% of the hospital beds in this province would have had to be closed in order to meet those numbers. We think that without any additional funds for municipalities and school boards, either property taxes would have had to be increased by 4.2% over 1990 levels or 6,000 classrooms would have had to be closed, and public health operations would have been slashed by 33%.

That is not all we could have done. We could have eliminated all new spending initiatives, undertaken no new spending initiatives by the government whatsoever. We could have discontinued the home care programs for seniors and the disabled. We could have discontinued entirely the legal aid program. We could have eliminated the winter maintenance program for provincial highways. We could have eliminated the technology fund, slashed welfare rates by 10%, dropped the Ontario drug benefit for both seniors and social assistance recipients. Those are some of the things that we could have done, and do you know what? Even if we had done those, we could not have kept the deficit at $3 billion.

I am waiting to hear what we should have done. I want to hear this, how we could have got back to the $3 billion. All I am hearing is that the deficit is too high. I agree the deficit is too high. Who wants a deficit of $9.7 billion? But I think it was the responsible thing to do in the midst of the worst recession since the Second World War, and I do not regret that.

Do I have a time limit, Mr Chair?

The Chair: About four more minutes.

Hon Mr Laughren: Oh, I did not know I had a time limit. I am sorry. But I can tell you that if we had made all those cuts, there would have been substantially higher unemployment in this province. Is that what you want? Do you want higher unemployment in this province? I have not heard anybody say that. So I think that the alternatives were not only unpalatable, they were simply unacceptable. We just simply could not do that, and we wanted to make sure that Ontario is ready for the recovery, and by investing in Ontario, we think it will be.

I hasten to add though that we are concerned about the deficit and we are going to tackle it. There are some things we have already done, such as the agreement with the Ontario Medical Association. We put in the budget a medium-term fiscal plan which has the deficit dropping to $7.8 billion in three years. I know that is a high number and a lot of people are concerned that number is too high but we wanted to be very realistic in that number too. We did not want to put in a number that we could not achieve. We really wanted to be realistic about that.

We know that debt servicing is going to stabilize at a little over 12 cents on every dollar. I remind you that the federal level is 34 cents on every dollar and we are determined not to make the mistakes the federal government has made. We are determined not to get into that trap.

As I say, we have put in place for the first time in Ontario an agreement with the medical profession to contain the costs of health care—it is the first time that has happened—and we are reforming the drug plan. We are containing out-of-province health care costs as well. We have the Fair Tax Commission churning away. We are hoping it will help us develop a fair tax system in the province. We are putting in place a Treasury Board, which I believe is going to be debated this afternoon. I look forward to that debate in the Legislature, which is going to be completely preoccupied with expenditure management. There has not been in this province a process to look at entire allocations, entire ministries, entire programs. It has split between Treasury and Management Board, and we are really going to try and get a focus on expenditure management.

I wanted to end on—there is more I could say—a positive note because I think things are looking a little better. There are some numbers coming in that are encouraging. There was an increase in employment in Ontario in the last numbers, the house and car sales are up, interest rates have been dropping. All of that is very helpful, but we are not expecting the rebound from this recession will be as strong as it was in 1981-82. If you look at the unemployment numbers for the next three years, they stay very high. I think even by 1995 they are still over 7%, almost 8%, as I recall. That is a very high number. That is why we had to be very realistic about the medium-term fiscal plan, so really, I would also ask you to think about the future in Ontario and the kind of economy we want to have.

I think most of us understand that we must have a high value added economy here. If we cannot have in Ontario a high value added, high-quality, high-wage economy given its positioning with our expenditures on education and infrastructure, who can? We are extremely well positioned to play a leading role in high-quality jobs and high value added jobs in the 1990s. We cannot survive in a beggar-my-neighbour approach where we try to cope with the lowest possible wages anywhere in the world. That is ridiculous. We would not succeed if we tried. So let's make sure we have a plan to go the other way.

We want to work together with the organized labour movement in this province, with the business community in this province. I also recognize the fact that we have to work very hard with the business community to make a partnership work. I understand that, because there is scepticism that we have to overcome. We are prepared to work very hard at that; we are trying and we are determined to make it work.

I am hoping that people will see it is in all our best interests to work together, because we believe very strongly that is the route we must go. We have confidence in the future of this province. That is why we are investing in it as strongly as we are, and I look forward to the comments of the members of this committee. I wish you very well in your travels across the province. I think you will hear an interesting array of opinions on the budget and I almost—not quite—envy you your task. Thank you very much for this opportunity.

The Chair: We have approximately 30 minutes. The time will be divided equally, 10 minutes per party. We begin with the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr Sterling: I would like to welcome you, Floyd, to the Mike Harris hearings here in the Legislature.

Hon Mr Laughren: Thanks, Norm. Where is Mike Harris, by the way?

Mr Sterling: He is at his son's graduation in North Bay.

Hon Mr Laughren: I noticed he was not here. I thought he would attend his own hearings.

Mr Sterling: He is in North Bay.

Hon Mr Laughren: I understand.

Mr Sterling: Thank you for your courtesy, and letting me have my say.

You blame a lot of other people for the problems that are found here: transfer payments, federal government. We have heard that time and time again. Do you take any responsibility at all for the lack of confidence the business community has shown in your budget and in Ontario over the two months since your budget?

Hon Mr Laughren: The business community I talk to has confidence in Ontario; the investors I talk to in Ontario and the United States have confidence in Ontario. I do not believe the business community has a lack of confidence in this province. They may not like some of the principles which this government stands for, but I think that when we sit down and talk to them, they at least understand where we are coming from. We are not trying to surprise them. We are determined to consult with them very widely.

I understand the fact that people in the business community do not like a high deficit, but at the same time, when I ask them if they believe we should be investing in the future of Ontario, they say yes. When I ask them if we should be closing hospital beds, they say no. When I ask them if we should be investing in our educational institutions, they say yes. They do not like the macro numbers, if you will, but they like the fact that we are maintaining a very high level of education and of capital expenditures in this province. I think you have to be careful in a blanket statement like, "They do not have confidence in the government." I do not think that is fair.

Mr Sterling: In terms of talking to business people, chambers of commerce, boards of trade, which both Mr Turnbull and I had the opportunity to do on the Mike Harris task force, that certainly was a message we were getting. Can you tell me whether you have taken any major steps on your part to restrain government spending? What steps have you taken?

Hon Mr Laughren: Absolutely. I am pleased to. I perhaps should have expanded on it more in my opening statement. I think probably the best example, while some people may not like it, was the fact that we worked out an arrangement with the Ontario Medical Association. It was a major commitment on our part to contain the costs of health care, which have been escalating at a remarkable rate, the total health care costs I think about 12% a year and the drug part of it around 19% a year—remarkable increases. Someone will correct me if I am wrong, but those are average numbers, the way they have been increasing, and we are finally going to get a handle on that. This may sound almost glib, but I think if we are going to save medicare, we have to control the costs of medicare. I am not saying this because you are a Conservative, Mr Sterling, but the federal government is making it very difficult to contain the costs of health care with its refusal to allow its transfer payments to increase the way they should. So that is one thing, the agreement with the Ontario Medical Association.

We are taking a look at the containment of costs in the drug plan and the out-of-province costs as well, and I touched on those briefly.

The establishment of the Treasury Board: Basically, its sole purpose is to engage in multi-year planning and looking at entire programs for expenditure management, so I think that is a major commitment.

A fairminded person would do this, and having known you as long as I have, Mr Sterling, I know you will recognize the fact that you do not suddenly stand all social programs in a province the size of Ontario on their heads and make massive and wholesale cuts your first eight months in government, before you have had a chance to really establish priorities and look at entire programs and do them in a serious way, and consult not only with the people who are recipients of those programs but also with the people who deliver those programs. We are determined to do that.

Mr Sterling: Some would argue very strenuously that what you have done with the OMA is exactly the opposite; that is, you have handed it over to an arbitrator to make a decision on a major part of our budget, I believe somewhere in the neighbourhood of $4 billion or $5 billion. Turning over to the arbitrator a decision to spend taxpayers' money, in our view, is a mistake.

I asked you before about the confidence of the business community in your government. Bill 70 was brought forward by the Minister of Labour. It has been gutted over the last two weeks because of the strenuous objections by business and the opposition. What are you going to do to gain their confidence? What are you going to do in the future to show that in fact you are sensitive to their needs and concerns at this time?

Hon Mr Laughren: I think that is a fair question. I would take issue with your use of the word "guttled." When we do sit down and talk to them about their concerns about a piece of legislation, that is not the law of the land but a bill that had been introduced. Surely to goodness, one of the purposes of first reading of a bill is to get it out there to allow people to look at it and think about it, so when we sat down and talked to people in the business community and they expressed concern about the liability issue, we listened and we made changes.

You can call that gutting the bill if you like, if you want to be pejorative about it, but it seems to me it was part of sitting down with the business community, taking its concerns seriously and being prepared to compromise the original position in the bill, and I think, quite frankly, we have a better bill now. You can call it gutting the bill if you like; I prefer to see it as that is how we want to deal with the business community and others out there.

I cannot make any announcements today because there are too many t's to cross and i's to dot yet, but when we heard the concerns of the business community and others about the gas guzzler tax, we brought them in, we sat down, we talked to them and we are working very hard to come up with the fine-tuning of that.

So I hope those are important signals we are sending out, because we are serious about it. These are not some kind of optics in which we are engaged. If it were, we would not be making the changes. We would sit down and talk to them and say, "We listened to you; we are not going to make the changes." That is not the case. Now I am not saying that every time we sit down with organized labour or the business community or anybody else we will be able to make changes. I am not pretending that, but when we can and when there is a better idea, we will take it. I think those are very strong signals we have sent out and I think the business community will recognize that and appreciate it.

Mr Sterling: I am going to turn it over to Mr Turnbull in a minute, but quite frankly I think the business community did not think the Minister of Labour or the government thought through Bill 70 very carefully before it was introduced. That is its concern and its lack of confidence in your ability to govern.

Mr Turnbull: Treasurer, you are going to double the debt in the next four years. You are going to double the amount of debt we have built up since Confederation to something around $70 billion. According to your budget documents you are suggesting we are going to start coming out of the recession towards the end of this year. Much as I dislike Keynesian economics—but you seem to espouse them—you are not following even John Maynard Keynes' theory that you pay back as times get better. Are you going to whine through the next four years that times are bad and consequently you are going to dump all this debt on the backs of our children?

By the time you leave office, you are going to have $8,000 debt for every child born in this province. When they are born, they owe $8,000. You are very keen on dumping on the federal government, and I might do some of that myself, but I have to tell you that we should not be repeating in this province the mistakes that have been made elsewhere. We should learn from that.

Hon Mr Laughren: I happen to agree with you completely.

Mr Turnbull: But you are doing it.

Hon Mr Laughren: I do agree with you. We should not be duplicating the mistake the federal government has made. If you look at those numbers carefully, you will notice that in the budget we are separating capital from operating, not to disguise the consolidated deficit by any stretch of the imagination. People are not stupid, they would see through that, but—

Mr Turnbull: Are you suggesting there was not a capital component before?

The Chair: Mr Turnbull, your time is up.

Hon Mr Laughren: Let me finish. You talked about the increase in the debt in the next four years, and you are quite right; there is a substantial increase in the debt for the next four years. You can see that in the numbers. But if you break down those numbers into capital and operating, you will see that by the end of the three-year, medium-term forecast, which is 1994-95, the operating part of the deficit—if you take away the capital component of it, which everybody agrees needs to be there—

Mr Turnbull: But it is still a debt.

The Chair: Mr Turnbull, please.

Hon Mr Laughren: It is still a debt, but everybody agrees we should be putting that money into capital.

Mr Turnbull: But we have always put it into capital.

Hon Mr Laughren: But we have not always had the kind of times we are having now either. I want to hear from you what your options are, and I hope that as this committee travels the province, you will put out your options for getting the deficit down.

Mr Turnbull: We have, and you have not been listening.

Hon Mr Laughren: Oh, I have heard. Do you know what I have heard you say? I have heard you say, "Reduce the wages in the public sector."

Mr Turnbull: We said, "Cap the increases," instead of giving $11,000 to senior civil servants.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Turnbull, we have two other questioners.

Hon Mr Laughren: Let me give you an example of those numbers. Let me tell you something: Even if we ent stronger than you are suggesting, if we put a freeze on every civil servant in Ontario, a complete freeze this year, do you know how much we would save?

Mr Turnbull: You would save $750 million if you put it to 2%.

Hon Mr Laughren: Let me finish my sentence. If we had put a cap on every directly employed civil servant, we could have saved, I believe, about $250 million. If we had frozen the salary of everybody who is vaguely connected to the public sector in the province, all of those people out there in the hospitals and schools and everywhere else—if we had frozen them, not even the 2% that you have said—we would have saved $1 billion. So now you are down to $3.7 billion.

Mr Turnbull: It is pretty significant.

Hon Mr Laughren: It is a significant number. Is it fair? Is it a fair start, Mr Turnbull?

Mr Turnbull: It is a fair start.

Hon Mr Laughren: Oh, I see. Okay.

The Chair: Excuse me. It is now time for the Liberal party.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the Treasurer being here. I think this is the fourth time he has been here and that has been exemplary on his part.

The most interesting table in the budget to me was on page 55, and that outlines your thinking over the next four or five years. You have often said that in tough times you have to spend money, but then there are good times coming, the 3% or 4% in real economic growth and we are still seeing deficits in the $7-billion to $8-billion range. I think you have answered this before, but that presupposes, even to get to the $7.8 billion, about $5 billion in new taxes. Then for the following three years I do not think you get below about a $7-billion deficit, even in 1997-98.

I think this is what people are looking at as a signal from the government, that good times or bad times, we are looking at major deficits in the province. If my numbers are right, the debt will go from maybe $40 billion when you came in to about $100 billion in 1997-98. I think that's the number. Is that kind of a philosophy you will pursue, that there is not going to be a balanced budget?

I remember your remarks to this committee here about not hiding capital, because I know you say you will balance the operating 1997-98 but, as you said, "I think it would be so transparent to try." This is talking about not putting capital in.

So what I am saying is that I think the business community—and I do not just mean the business community—but I think the community out there could accept that in bad times you spend but in good times we can see some light at the end of the tunnel. But I do not see where our deficit ever gets below $7 billion, even in good times seven years from now with all the restraint programs. I think that is what is worrying people.

Have I accurately reflected how you view the budgets, and is that what we should look forward to realistically?

Hon Mr Laughren: I would put things a little differently than you put them, Mr Phillips. Also, we did mention in the budget, I think, that by 1997 the amount of deficit would be reflected by capital spending. In other words, the operating would be in effect in balance. That is a funny way of putting it.

Mr Phillips: Right, and I assume there will be $7 billion of capital spent by that year.

Hon Mr Laughren: I thought it would be less than that; I thought it was around $6 billion.

Mr Phillips: Okay.

Hon Mr Laughren: I think it is a little unfair to say we are not working at the—you did not quite say that, but about in good times getting the deficit down. You will notice in the table on page 55 to which you refer that the deficit does indeed decline every year and it will continue to decline.

Mr Phillips: But that assumes new taxes.

Hon Mr Laughren: It assumes new taxes and growth in the economy, absolutely. When you are working that far ahead, you do not know what that mix will be, but you are quite right, of course it does. I feel confident that as long as we stick to our guns on reducing that deficit every year people will understand that we are not spendthrifts, that we are determined to get the deficit down.

It is like a mortgage on your house. I do not want to be overly simplistic about it, but I think most people understand they cannot go out and pay cash for their house and they need to have a mortgage, and often a very substantial mortgage, but as long as their credit cards are not running way over all the time—and if they are high, then they start working those credit card balances down.

I feel very strongly about that. We have to do that, because I happen to believe, and I suspect you would agree with this, that our credibility is going to rest on how well we are able to manage the economy and get those deficits down. I have no doubt about that whatsoever, so my determination is fierce in that regard, and so is the Premier's, I can tell you. If you ever go to the speeches he or I make largely to the business or financial community, you will see reflected in our comments in every single case that we are determined to do that.

Mr Phillips: Just a difference of opinion: On the OMA agreement, I know this is sort of the centrepiece of your cost-saving—

Hon Mr Laughren: So far.

Mr Phillips: —but first, the OMA has a fundamental disagreement with your numbers. You say 5%; they say 1%. They say unfettered, binding arbitration. I believe you have turned over 10% of your budget to an unfettered, independent arbitrator, so have you resolved the difference of opinion between yourselves on this?

Hon Mr Laughren: Wait a minute. Let's be fair about this. The payments to physicians are 10% of the provincial budget right now, not of the health care budget.

Mr Phillips: It is $5 billion.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, roughly about that. I am using fairly round numbers, but that is right. The health care budget is almost $17 billion this year, I think, so it is almost a third of that. I think that for the very first time in the history of this province we are putting a cap on expenditures. I am being fair about this. We are going to get some heat on this; I have already had some letters saying "You shouldn't be cutting back on this out-of-province cost."

Mr Phillips: On which expenditures?

Hon Mr Laughren: Health care. That is part of the agreement with the OMA. We are going to work with them, in the sense of partnership, but we want to contain and control the number, distribution and remuneration of doctors. Let's be fair about this. For the first time, in a spirit of partnership with the doctors and with the medical association we want to get a handle on it. They agree with this and I give them full marks. As you may recall, it was not an agreement that was unanimously approved by the membership of the OMA, so there are people who think it was too tight, but we think it is the beginning. I am sure there will be fine-tuning required as we go down the road with the medical profession, but we had to start somewhere.

Mr Phillips: Do you agree that it is unfettered, binding arbitration?

Hon Mr Laughren: That is not what they tell me. I did not do the negotiations with them and I do not pretend to be an expert on that part of it, but I am told they must consider the economic conditions of the province or all the details on that. It was my sense that it was not unfettered.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to talk to you about the process. A couple of comments made by the Premier, by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology and by you really got me a little disturbed. I am not talking specifically about the gas guzzling tax, but that is a good example. The feeling was that we could not really talk to them about it beforehand because of budget secrecy. I think that is sort of an absurd statement. It seems to me that a responsible Treasurer and a responsible government would try to anticipate the impact any of their measures was going to have on any sector of the economy and would meet with those people and certainly canvass the options.

I agree that the final and ultimate decision is yours and that it should be made in secret, but there is nothing to prevent anybody from discussing what some of the options are to get their input as to what would happen if proposals A or B were advanced. Do you have any comments on that?

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, and I happen to agree with you that the process is absurd. I find it bizarre too. I do not mind confessing that to you. There is even a comment in the budget about trying to change the process. I have asked this committee. As a matter of fact, I wrote to the committee and asked it to think about ways of changing it. You might argue that I could have done this without writing to the committee and without asking for input from this committee on how to do it. Technically you are right; we could have done that.

There is not a history of that and I am not blaming previous governments. When finance ministers or treasurers consult, if they are too specific they get in deep trouble. There has been evidence of that at the federal level when they did get too specific in talking about a tax measure or whatever. Naturally finance ministers and treasurers are very jumpy in talking about tax measures and I understand that, but I do not disagree with you that there is a better way to do it and that is why it is in the budget itself that we want to make the process more open.

I was in New York talking to the people who sell and buy our bonds, and so forth. I then went to Washington to talk about budgeting process down there. I wish we had more time because this very idea of how to make it more open and more consultative before the fact as opposed to after the fact—I do not disagree with the thrust of Mr Kwinter's remarks. They have it much more open there apparently. I am still not an expert on their system, but they were saying, "For heaven's sake, don't do what we do."

They get brokered to death and have difficulty accomplishing what they set out to do with a tax measure for example. It has reached the point now, they tell me—they had a copy of the President's initial budget, which is this thick and which they say has no relevance to reality or to where they know they are going to end up. I hope there is room for us somewhere between this cloak of secrecy we have and a process that is so open it does not go anywhere. I really hope this committee will be of assistance because we are quite serious about that. I do not like the system either.

Mr Christopherson: I think it is good that we as the government representatives are the last to ask questions and make comments, because that will underscore the point that so far nobody has offered up anything that talks about alternatives and choices. That is the whole idea of a party system and of what these hearings ought to be, to offer up to the people not just the bashing of the deficit but talk about what was done that generated the deficit and what the implications are. Rightly so, but there is an obligation on the part of the opposition parties to say what they would do differently and be specific and then we can all talk about the implications of those.

That will mean we have an opportunity in this province to have what we have not had yet, a fair and open democratic debate on what should be happening with the budget for the province of Ontario for the coming year. Mr Chairman, I would hope that the opposition parties will take seriously what we see as that part of their obligation, to provide specifically what they would do differently and, in terms of expenditures, what they think should be taken out. Then we can talk about the implications of that and say why we believe the right steps were taken.

That leads me to the question, and I think it is something that is not talked about enough—

Mr Turnbull: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I think we have to correct the record, in the sense that in the pre-budget consultations with this committee there were specific recommendations made by the Conservative Party and they have been ignored.

The Chair: Sorry, it is not a point of order.

Mr Turnbull: It may not be a point of order, but it is true.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Turnbull; you have had ample time.

Mr Turnbull: No, I did not have ample time.

The Chair: Continue.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Chair. I would like to ask the Treasurer a question regarding the operating budget that will be reduced in coming years and balanced in the years the budget projects. I would like to ask it in concert with what he believes the budget is doing that will lay the groundwork both for the recovery of the economy from the recession, and also how that ties in to the ability to reduce and eventually balance the operating budget.

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Christopherson is quite correct in that we are serious about that. To me, the investment that is in the budget in capital and in education, if I had to pick two areas, because everybody tells us—I was reading about an economist in the United States who was saying you could take and duplicate every manufacturing process there is anywhere in the world except for one component, namely, the quality of labour engaged in it. That you could not duplicate, but you could duplicate all of the process. Therein lie our opportunities, in making sure we invest in our infrastructure. By that I mean not just education and training, but also our roads and our sewer and water systems. I think that is terribly important.

We talk about training in the budget as well. We think that training is not well done in this country as a whole. I am not pointing fingers in this regard. I do not think that collectively, as governments and the private sector, we ever have a handle on training. We are going to try. When we talk about partnerships we often bring in training as an example, where we need the federal government—and I think we will get co-operation there—and the private sector—and I think we will get co-operation there—organized labour and ourselves as a provincial government.

Those are the kinds of things we think we need to invest in that will have us well placed as the recovery occurs. We cannot despair about this recession. We have to be optimistic and invest in the province and encourage others to do the same. That is why I think we are one of the most attractive places in the world. There have been two studies done recently that indicate Ontario is either number two or number three. There were two different studies done as a quality-of-life place. We are right up there and I think we have to maintain that.

I do not want to make an anti-American speech by any stretch of the imagination, but when I go south of the border and see the problems in their cities—in New York City they have a population of almost 10 million, almost the population of Ontario. They were talking about spending $300 million a year on capital in a city that size. How can you maintain your infrastructure? They cannot have a deficit in New York City and neither can the state. They are not allowed to by law. That has caused them a lot of anguish. I have started a rambling answer.

Mr Jamison: I have a question that really concerns the cost of carrying the debt. I know some people here today have made references to the cost of carrying the debt, for example, compared to the federal debt. I wonder if beyond that you could explain the current federal cutbacks that have impacted your ability to lessen the deficit. What kinds of makeup and history, etc, are there?

Hon Mr Laughren: In my head I just sort of use 10% as an easy number when I am thinking about the cost of carrying the debt. The cost of a $9.7-billion deficit is about $1 billion, in very round numbers, I hasten to add. That is sort of the ballpark figure I think in when I am thinking about the deficit.

You asked about our problems with the federal government. I know they have problems too with their debt and their deficit, very serious problems. Their cost of carrying their debt is 34 cents of every revenue dollar. That is unacceptably high. Ours is 11.6 cents, getting up to 12.3 cents I think, so that is a big difference, but I hasten to add that we do not want to get there.

I understand the federal government's concern, but I have never understood how transferring the public debt from one jurisdiction to another solves the problem for Canada. I think fair-minded people would admit that when they offload on us, that is what they are doing. If they were to continue with their transfers, their debt would be higher and ours would be lower. There is nothing magical about that. They have really hurt us. If you go back to the 1980s to the base of transfer payments, if you ever added them up cumulatively the impact of the restrictions on transfer payments to the province—I think they are around $7 billion, $8 billion, $9 billion. They are extremely high. Even this year it is about $1.5 billion. That has really hurt us, and I do not see it getting any better. I wish it would. I would like to be more optimistic in that regard, but I have no reason to believe they are going to make improvements in that regard.

They have just announced, by the way—I was not very happy—they are going to have consultation on the whole issue of transfer payments. It is going to be part of this constitutional review group for the fall and they are going to put transfer payments into that mix. At the same time, they extend the freeze on the transfer payments to us. It is a weird kind of way to say they are going to have us open to some of the process, all within the framework of a freeze. To me, that is not—

Mr Sterling: How many tax points did we steal over—

Interjection: It is our time, Norm.

Mr B. Ward: A quick question on the issue of taxation. There was a decision made by yourself, after consultation, that corporate income taxes would not be increased. Perhaps you could expand on the rationale, because that was one avenue where perhaps the deficit could have been reduced by increasing revenue.

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Ward, you raise a good point. We did not touch broadly the provincial income tax. We increased the surcharge at the top and we increased the tax credit at the bottom for low-income earners, but we did not increase the rate, the 53% rate on federal tax payable. We did not touch that. We did not increase the corporate income tax, that base, although we did increase the capital tax, from 0.8% to 1%, as I recall.

Interjection.

Hon Mr Laughren: For banks, right.

What we thought was that it is a serious recession and to increase those taxes at this time would not have been appropriate; it is as simple as that. The combination of not increasing that tax, not imposing Ontario's retail sales tax on top of the GST, for those reasons we did not want to do it but to leave that money out there in the economy. And of course the corporate tax, I think it really would have been outrageous, quite frankly, to have increased the corporation tax in a year when corporate profits tax coming to us was down by over $1 billion. That is a huge drop, so to have increased the rate of corporate income tax I think really would have been completely inappropriate. Those are the reasons we did what we did. I suppose you could argue that we could have reduced the deficit if we had increased those taxes, and I think that is true, but it would have been, I think, the wrong thing to do right in the middle of the recession.

The Chair: Mr Hansen, you have the last question.

Mr Hansen: It is more of a statement, maybe. The Mike Harris task force has I think misled a lot of people with fax machines. It is not the ordinary person out there who has a fax machine, and I think with this committee travelling around the province we will get the true feeling out there. At least in my riding, the municipality of Pelham was very pleased to have a balanced budget this year.

But people out there are saying: "I pay provincial and I pay federal tax. Why are the feds stopping that money coming down to educate my children?" And parents want cash for new Niagara schools. What do I tell these people? Do I say that the feds are not giving us any money, that we have to go deeper into debt? We are the closest partners to the municipalities, but our partner in Ottawa has to also be a partner with the municipalities and the province.

I am glad Mr Harris saw to it that we get around the province to explain exactly what is going on and why their dollars from the federal government are not flowing down to the municipal level. I have not heard what I have heard here at Queen's Park. It is different out on the road, and I think they are going to be very surprised when we come back with a report.

Another thing I would like to say too is that in our pre-budget consultation, in the end, when I read through that book in a lot of areas, we have covered those particular areas. So it is an open process and we have listened.

Hon Mr Laughren: Could I make one comment, because Mr Hansen has raised a point I did not dwell on in my comments. We use words like "federal transfer payments," and I am not too sure people relate to those kind of words very much. Where they have held back from transferring what we think we have a right to are what they call the established programs financing, which helps pay for health care and post-secondary education, and on the Canada assistance plan, which helps us pay for welfare costs, social assistance costs. Those are the areas where we have been hit hardest by the failure of the federal government to live up to its obligations. So it is not just something called transfer payments, it is post-secondary education, it is health care and it is social assistance. Thank you for raising that.

Thank you, Mr Chairman, for this opportunity.

The Chair: Thank you, Treasurer, for coming and giving us this overview of the budget. We appreciate the time you spend with us.

Mr Sterling: Mr Chair, just on a point of procedure: Before the Treasurer goes, are we going to have an opportunity to question him during the hearings? Are you going to be available?

Hon Mr Laughren: Never again.

Mr Sterling: He says, "Never again." I can understand his reluctance, but—

Hon Mr Laughren: No, no, I am only kidding.

The Chair: These issues will be decided by the sub-committee if we should invite him back again. There are other expert witnesses and the procedure has been outlined by discussion from the party whips.

Mr Sterling: He says he is not opposed to that. That is fine.

The Chair: Hearing the bells, I think this meeting is adjourned until 3:30.

The committee recessed at 1206.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1556.

MINISTRY OF TREASURY AND ECONOMICS

The Chair: Mr Davies, deputy minister, welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

Mr Davies: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. We are at the pleasure of the committee as to how you would like us to proceed. We have prepared a package of 13 slides that are intended to provide highlights from the budget.

I was going to propose that I have several of my associates from the Ministry of Treasury and Economics go over the individual sections of the slide material. It really breaks into four sections, and this parallels the construction of the budget itself. The first pages are on the economic outlook, then the fiscal outlook, then the tax initiatives incorporated in the budget and the financing of the deficit part of the budget. We are prepared to go through that either with interjections or without; we look to your guidance on how to proceed.

Mr Sterling: I would rather go section by section.

The Chair: That is probably a fair way of doing it. Since we are all going to be here a little while this afternoon, I think everybody will have a fair opportunity to ask the questions they feel are important, so why do we not do that way?

Mr Davies: That is fine. I would suggest then that we begin with the Ontario economic outlook section, and I would ask Qaid Silk, who is the director of the economic forecasting branch to walk you through the three pages. Then, as I understand it, we pause and pursue questions on that, if desired, or continue on.

Mr Silk: Thank you, Bryan. I am going to take you through the first three slides. This talks about the short-term economic forecast that was presented in the budget, and then the medium-term forecast.

The first slide, basically, is the 1990-91 forecast. As you can see, at the time of the budget, we said we would have a decline in real output of 3.3% for the calendar year as a whole. We would lose about 184,000 jobs. The unemployment rate would average 10% and inflation would average 5.6%.

We have also given you the range of other people's forecasts at the time the budget was presented. You can see that, by and large, for real growth and employment loss, for example, we were at the high end of that range. We were slightly more pessimistic than most. Similarly for the unemployment rate. For inflation we were at the mid-point.

Essentially, our forecast was that we were in the middle of a recession. Hopefully, the economy would recover by the third quarter of 1991. We would get some modest job gains in the second half of the year. The unemployment rate, none the less, would remain high throughout the year, despite the fact that there was job growth. The inflation rate would average 5.6%, but a significant portion of that increase—1.5 percentage points to be precise—would be because of the GST being introduced on 1 January. That was our budget forecast.

The next slide talks about developments since then. What we have seen are quite early signs of recovery. We have had employment hit bottom in February, and since then we have had three consecutive months of job creation—34,000 jobs being created in the province as a whole, in all sectors, since February. We have had, of course, reasonable strength in home sales, both resale and new homes. We have interest rates continuing to fall in the last two months, a decline that started about the fall of last year and has just continued. We have had auto sales picking up. Manufacturing shipments were up in May; the numbers just came out this week, and they were up 2.2%, the highest in the past two years and, of course, industrial production in the US, a major market for us, was also up in May. So things appear to be looking up. Consequently, our view is that, yes, we had anticipated the recovery beginning in the second half of 1991, and we think our budget forecast is still on track. That is a view consistent with most other forecasters, who expected the recovery to begin about the same time.

Given the turnaround in employment, we think it is possible that our job-loss figure of 184,000 for the year as a whole may be an overestimate. We may get less job loss than that and, similarly, our inflation of 5.6% may be slightly higher, given what we have actually seen in the first five months of the year. But at this point we do not think we need to shade it yet.

Essentially, the third slide looks at growth in the medium term, and what we have in different boxes is the picture for 1990-94. In the first box we have the real growth. As you know, we had a recession, a 1991 decline, and over the next three years we have seen steady growth over the medium term. On the job front, we are expecting average annual creation of more than 100,000 jobs over those three years, and the unemployment rate to come steadily down but unfortunately remain high even at the end of this horizon, at 7.8%. As for inflation, there is the 1991 spike—due to GST—of 1.5%, but once that GST has been absorbed, we expect the inflation rate to remain below 4% throughout the next three years.

That is our budget forecast review of how we think it has shaped up in the medium term.

Mr Christopherson: Qaid chose 1994 as the low point in the first half of the decade. Why is that?

Mr Silk: After a recession a recovery normally tends to have momentum, so an economy tends to pick up some speed. Now, we do not think it will be as buoyant as coming out of the 1981-82 recession, so that even in 1992 and 1993 we do not think we will get the 5%, 6% growth rates that we saw in the early 1980s; but normally that is what happens: An economy, having plunged, tends to pick up speed coming out and then gets back to what you might think of as a normal trend growth rate of 3% to 3.5%. So it is going towards this trend.

Mr Christopherson: Is that then a levelling off point in 1994 or, if you were going to later years, would you continue to see a decline? I know that as you get into later years it is very hard to predict with any kind of accuracy, and I respect that. I would just appreciate your best shot or even an explanation of what the usual kind of contemporary thinking is on that question.

Mr Silk: Without some policy changes, we would expect that the potential of the Ontario economy to grow is around 3% to 3.5%. Essentially, after a strong recovery phase, the long-term expansion might be around that rate. Now, it is possible through significant policy initiatives to alter that for the better, but that would be roughly the tendency, to go back towards that rate.

Mr Sterling: I was wondering, in terms of the employment picture looking a little bit better now, and the 34,000 rise in Ontario employment since February, are we gaining or losing in the manufacturing area? Do you have that broken down at all?

Mr Davies: Maybe I could introduce John Hoicka of our office on economic policy. John is one of our experts in this area.

Mr Hoicka: February was the low point for manufacturing. If I remember correctly, it was 851,000 or 853,000 employed. As of the most recent numbers, May, that had jumped up to 899,000.

Mr Sterling: So it has gone up?

Mr Hoicka: It has gone up, but that 853,000 was the lowest point in the decade. In comparison it was about 870,000 at the low point in the 1981-82 recession.

Mr Sterling: Quite a dip.

Mr Hoicka: It was quite a dip, so it is hard to interpret how big that recovery is at this point.

Mr Sterling: In terms of what forecasters and economists do, I think everyone would agree with one part which the Treasurer talked about: that we want high value added jobs in our country. That is the only way you eventually get to a higher standard of living. Of course, that is why I am very much a proponent of free trade and a world economy. I believe that is the way you get to the high value added jobs, by being competitive; you have to earn them.

Do you keep any kind of overall income statistics that will indicate when these jobs are coming back and whether they are high- or low-value jobs?

Mr Hoicka: We would not have any reasonable data on such a short-term basis. There is information on average hours worked and pay per hour, but we would not follow them on a month-by-month basis simply because, as you get into the two-digit industry figures, subcategories become quite variable, and it is quite easy to misunderstand or falsely think something is happening when it is not happening. Over the past decade there has not been essentially any increase in manufacturing wages as an average. Obviously that would vary somewhat in real terms, and it would vary by industry. It is something we will be starting to look at, I think, when we have another couple of months of data and we are quite certain there is an up trend. Then we will start to look at which industries are coming back. But at this moment, even those numbers would be quite variable.

Mr Sterling: Is there any way to collect that kind of information and plot it? I think it is extremely important for us to really understand whether or not we are improving our economy.

Mr Hoicka: The data are certainly available for manufacturing as a whole. The extent to which they are available for the subindustries I have to recheck. I think they are there. I think there is a delay. It is not a problem of getting the data; the problem is that it bounces around, and it is hard to determine whether that is a random bounce or whether it is part of a trend. That is certainly available, with some degree of lag. It may be available, for example, to March. I doubt that it would be available after March.

Mr Sterling: I was interested more in the long term, in looking back two or three years from now and saying, have we really created jobs that have value added or not, or are we continuing on the same plateau as before in relative importance of those jobs?

Mr Silk: As John pointed out, the budget talks about real wages and total manufacturing. The data are produced by Statistics Canada, and we can definitely produce them right now for you. As you point out, we will definitely monitor this over the next few years to see where those jobs are and what kind of incomes are being generated by those jobs, and yes, we will get a picture over time.

The Chair: If you can collect that information, could you pass it along to the committee?

Mr Silk: Of course.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, I apologize for being late. Could you tell me, are you covering page 3 as well?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: I guess I will address this to the deputy. I am curious as to the methodology of your projections of real growth. For 1991 you show negative growth, minus 3.3%, and you are projecting that in 1992 there will be real growth of 3.4%. Does that mean the economy is going to grow by 6.7% this year?

Mr Silk: In 1992?

Mr Kwinter: In 1992.

Mr Silk: No. What we are saying is that after having dropped 3.3% in 1991, the next year will see 3.4% growth.

Mr Kwinter: It will be like 0.1% over this year?

Mr Silk: Over that two-year period we will have made up most of the ground we lost, yes—all the ground we lost.

Mr Kwinter: I think that is fairly significant, because when people talk about the growth of the economy—and I said this in a speech last week—we were lucky to be in power at a time when the economy was in real growth showing growth as high as 4% and 5%. I think this is one of the big problems we have when we talk about recovery. We are going through a very severe economic downturn and we have been for the last year and a half. The projection of 3.4% gives the impression that there is going to be incredible growth, it is going to be booming. What in fact you are saying is that after this terrible time that we have just gone through, in 1992 we can expect the economy to grow by 0.1%. If you are wrong, it could be no growth at all, when you are using that narrow a margin.

Mr Silk: If I may explain it perhaps in a different way: In 1990 we started at a certain level; in 1991 we fell a certain amount; by 1992 we have come back to where we were in 1990. Okay? It is like a saucer. Over that two-year period we lost some ground, and we think we will make it up.

That is quite dramatic when you look at employment, for example. We think we will lose 184,000 jobs in 1991. As I was explaining earlier, it is possible that we will lose less, because the recent data suggest slightly more momentum and more growth than we had thought.

In any case, suppose we lose about 180,000 jobs in 1991. Unfortunately, in 1992 the economy will not create 180,000 jobs; it will create well below that, so by 1992 the level will be below the level of 1990. Having lost ground there, unfortunately, we will not make it up. On the output side, we think we will have just barely made it up. You are right, we could be wrong. Our estimates could be out, our forecasts could be out, and we may not make it up. There is a margin of error. It is a deep recession and it takes some time to recover that ground.

Mr Davies: I would just reinforce one of the lines that Qaid used, because I always find that graphically it makes it come home to me. It is a saucer-shaped graph when you plot the gross domestic product on the one axis and the time horizontally. You start up here, you go down and then you start coming back.

Mr Kwinter: As I say, I am not being critical. I am just pointing out that for someone who is not used to looking at these graphs, this could give a distorted picture, because it could look as if the economy is going to grow by 6.7%, taken from a low of 3.3% to a high of 3.4% in one year. What I am saying is, if you had shown it in that saucer-shaped graph, it would give a more accurate picture of what was really happening. That is the only point I was making.

The Chair: One of the indicators is durable goods and machine tools. I am just curious if we have any information on how well we are doing with that indicator in the economy.

Mr Davies: Just give us a second, we might have some data with us.

Mr Silk: We do not have data for Ontario for the first quarter of 1991, but we know that for Canada as a whole, consumer durable spending, spending on automobiles, appliances and so on, fell 27% at annual rates. Basically, as the Treasurer pointed out in his remarks, in the first quarter we continue to see the Canadian economy decline at 4.6% at annual rates. A lot of the weakness was because consumer spending on durables was very weak. It dropped dramatically.

On machinery and equipment, which is the other thing you were mentioning, at least for Canada, spending rose in the first quarter by 4.7% at annual rates. There is some strength there, modest but none the less some growth.

We do not have Ontario numbers. We will not have them for another two or three weeks.

Mr Phillips: Earlier this morning with the Treasurer I indicated that what concerns me most is what you call the medium-term fiscal plan. I think the world understands deficits—

Interjection.

Mr Phillips: I am sorry, I thought you were dealing with Ontario's economic outlook.

The Chair: We are up to page 3.

Mr Phillips: Okay, sorry. I thought you were dealing with the whole section.

Can I go back on employment just for moment? It is a neat way of saying employment is up, but I think unemployment is up more than employment. Ontario has dropped from number one ranking in the nation in unemployment a year ago; now I think we are number five. We are behind all the western provinces. In the unemployment rate, we used to be the best and now we are fifth in a period of 12 months. I think unemployment has gone up again. There were 497,000 people unemployed in April; there are 509,000 unemployed in May in Ontario.

Galbraith and the government feel this is the right budget. How come the other provinces seem to be doing better on employment than we are? Why are we slipping?

Mr Davies: I will start off on that and then let those more familiar with—

Mr Sterling: I can answer that. Maybe I will have a crack at answering that.

Mr Phillips: I want to hear the experts, though.

Mr Davies: I have never encountered so many people eager to answer questions.

Mr Sterling: I would like to answer a Liberal.

Mr Phillips: Maybe I can answer my own question. I think I have the answer right here.

Mr Davies: Not to overstate the obvious, with the nature of the Ontario economy, with our high propensity for manufacturing and our dependence on markets, particularly the United States, we have much more vulnerability to downturns in that economy, just from the structure of our economy.

I will let Qaid elaborate and correct me if I am wrong and add other points.

Mr Silk: Exactly. We are a very interest-rate-sensitive economy and a very export-oriented economy, so when our major market, the United States, takes a downturn, we just go along; we are interest-rate-sensitive, so housing is extremely adversely affected, and the exchange rate as well.

All those three things affect us much more than the prairie provinces, which have lower unemployment rates. That does not mean they do not go through business cycles. They go through cycles too, but their cycles are generated differently. Theirs is very resource-based, so when resource markets take a downturn, that is when they are affected.

Sometimes in fact it happens the other way. When resource markets are doing badly, when prices are down, for example, for oil, it is actually good for us but it is bad for the resource-rich economies. We are not necessarily all synchronized in that sense throughout the country.

Mr Kwinter: I do not know which one is the expert on monetary and fiscal policy, but whoever it is, if he could respond.

One of the common givens is that the reason our dollar is so high is that our interest rates are high and the government is artificially keeping the interest rates high to dampen inflation, yet in the last month or so we have seen interest rates drop dramatically, and the dollar still stays high. If anything, it reached new highs. Can anyone explain why that is?

Mr Davies: I am going to let Qaid take a run at that.

Mr Silk: I wish I knew the full answer myself. It is a mystery, because we know, for example, if you go back through history the United States through the mid-1980s had an enormous current account deficit, and yet its dollar kept growing in strength. Then at some point the dollar just could not stay that high and it fell. It fell quite sharply. In a sense, if you look at the factors that affect our dollar, you are right: It should be the interest rate spread between our Canadian interest rates and American interest rates, it should be the performance of our trade balances, and all those do not appear to be good enough or strong enough to keep the dollar high.

One explanation is that for quite some time, basically both Canadians and people abroad have believed that Mr Crow is not only serious about his inflation targets but is likely to achieve them over the medium term. Our forecast actually suggests that we do not think he will get there, but none the less inflation will be low. In any case, a lot of people believe he is an inflation fighter, an anti-inflation man. Low-inflation countries tend to be strong currency countries.

At this point, to some extent it is the anticipation that inflation will come down. In some observers' minds that means we continue to have this high dollar, despite the fact that our interest rates are falling. The spread has fallen quite dramatically from 500 basis points to something under 300 basis points now. It has fallen, yes, and it is a bit of a mystery to us.

There are two camps. Some people believe the hard currency story and think the exchange rate will remain high; but there are enough other people, including ourselves, who think the dollar will fall. We think at present it will fall to 84 cents by the end of the year because you cannot keep it up without the support of the interest rate spread. We could be wrong. We most likely will be wrong, but there are enough other people who believe that, yes, the dollar is too high and it should come down. Once you let that interest rate spread narrow, there is no support for it, there is nothing holding it up.

Mr Davies: I would just add that it is counter-intuitive that the dollar is staying where it is with interest rates coming down. The only other observation in addition to those Qaid has made is that monetary conditions around the world are relative to one another, and traders looking at our dollar and at other dollars weigh our strength relative to others, and for one reason or another, it is holding up there.

Mr Kwinter: As impartial observers, would you confirm or deny that the only control the government has is on interest rates, that Crow can arbitrarily say, "This is what the interest rate is going to be," because he can set the bank rate; but the value of the dollar is a function of that plus other things that are really beyond the government's control? They cannot arbitrarily set the value of the dollar. The market sets the value of the dollar. I just want a comment on that.

Mr Davies: Certainly there is a series of factors that influence people's confidence in a currency, interest rates being one factor; just general impressions of where a country is heading.

Mr Kwinter: What I am trying to find out is, is it possible for the central government or the central bank to artificially keep the value of the dollar high by supports?

Mr Silk: Yes. It is possible for a central bank to maintain the value of the exchange rate. It would do that by influencing interest rates. You are quite right that Mr Crow does not, at least publicly, claim that is his objective. He claims his public objective is to reduce inflation, whatever the value of the dollar that results from that.

As the deputy points out, a lot of things influence the value of the dollar. One of the things that influence it is the credibility of the monetary authorities. Some observers are now coming to the view that one of the reasons the dollar is remaining high despite the narrowing of the interest rate spread is the credibility of Mr Crow as an anti-inflation fighter. His actions do affect the value of the dollar indirectly.

Central banks can directly target the exchange rate. They can say they want the exchange rate to be X, even in a free market, and set interest rates to influence and directly affect the value.

Mr Sterling: Therefore, our real trouble in Canada is that Mr Crow has too much credibility. Is that it?

The Chair: Can we move on to the next section now?

Mr Davies: I am going to ask Tony Salerno, who is the director of the fiscal planning policy branch, to take us through the next three slides. This summarizes the fiscal portion of the budget document.

Mr Salerno: On page 4 we have a summary of the 1991-92 fiscal plan. The revenues are forecast at $43 billion. I might indicate that this is the first time revenues are actually declining year over year. There is about a 1% decline. Expenditures are projected at $52.7 billion, giving a consolidated deficit of $9.7 billion.

In the total expenditure of $52.7 billion there is a capital budget of $4.3 billion, of which over $600 million is the anti-recession program the Treasurer spoke of this morning. Deducting that from the consolidated deficit gives the operating deficit of $5.4 billion.

Down below we have a few measures of fiscal indicators, as we call them. You will see that the consolidated deficit is 3.4% of the GDP, the gross domestic product. As a proportion of revenue, the consolidated deficit is 22.6%. The public debt interest, or PDI, which is part of the total expenditure, is forecast at $5 billion. PDI, the debt service charges, as a proportion of the revenues are 11.6%.

So far we have only two months of actual revenue inflows, and I can report that to date they are pretty well budget. There are a few, such as retail sales tax, that are marginally higher, and corporation tax is slightly lower.

On the next page is the medium-term fiscal plan the Treasurer spoke of this morning. By the way, this is the first time Ontario has presented a medium-term fiscal plan in the budget. In the past we have seen what have been referred to as medium-term fiscal projections in the grey book. But I think the fiscal plan is an indication of the government's intention a little more than the fiscal projections that were presented in the past in the grey book.

As the Treasurer indicated this morning, the medium-term projection in the plan of the government is to reduce the deficit and ultimately achieve a balanced operating position by the year 1997. This is, by the way, six years after the recession, which is consistent with the experience after the 1981-82 recession.

We have here the consolidated deficit. There is a typographical error. The first column, of course, is 1991-92, the second column 1992-93. From 1992-93 to 1994-95, the deficit is projected to decline from the 1991-92 level of $9.7 billion to $7.8 billion by 1994-95.

Capital expenditure, I may add, is one of the fastest growing components in this projection, but again, these are variable numbers. This is just a projection. The real commitment, as the Treasurer indicated this morning, is to the consolidated deficit targets.

With the capital expenditures presented here, the operating deficit declines from $5.4 billion in 1991-92 to $3 billion in 1994-95.

Looking at the fiscal indicators below, we have the deficit to GDP declining from 3.4% in 1991-92 to 2.2% in 1994-95. Essentially, all the fiscal indicators are trending downwards, except PDI is increasing modestly between 1992-93 and 1993-94 and it is stabilizing at the 12.3% level in 1994-95.

On the next page we reiterate what the Treasurer indicated this morning, again an indication of how the government intends to achieve these targets.

One of the things the Treasurer indicated, and second reading is today, is the establishment of a Treasury Board. The emphasis in the new Treasury Board will be to exercise greater budgetary controls and undertake a program review exercise.

In terms of indications of how the spending will be brought under control, again the Treasurer indicated this morning the recent success in negotiating the physicians' settlement, which essentially brings down the rate of growth in payments to physicians from an average of 12% plus over the last number of years to 7% this year and 6% over the next two years.

As well, the budget indicated intentions to modify the current policy for reimbursing other-country health care costs and plans to implement tighter controls in the drug benefit plan. These are projected to yield savings of $260 million in the current fiscal year and over $570 million by 1993-94.

Again, as I indicated in the previous slide, the budget also placed greater emphasis on capital spending and made a distinction between the capital and operating funds.

Mr Davies: That is the end of that section on the fiscal outlook.

Mr Kwinter: I do not want to turn this thing into a standing committee on estimates report, but I am just trying to get a handle on how valid are your projections as to revenue and expenditures.

One of the things that sticks out in my mind, and I would like a comment on it because I used to have responsibility for it, is the LCBO. We have a situation where the trend line in alcohol sales is down and has been for the last several years. We have a new 5% tax imposed. We have cross-border shopping. We have a situation where it would seem to me that by all indications, given all those factors, revenues should be down rather than up, yet you are showing revenues up $15 million over last year. Again, I do not want to get into it line by line—

Mr Davies: I am sorry, Mr Kwinter; showing revenues up over the year just passed?

Mr Kwinter: I am not looking at this document, I am looking at the budget itself, on page 60. You show LCBO profits of $650 million last year, or the interim estimate of $650 million, and current plans—

Mr Davies: Look at them to grow to $665 million in the coming year.

Mr Kwinter: Yes. Given, as I say, the cross-border shopping, the 5% increase in tax—and there is a direct correlation: The higher the tax, the farther down sales keep going, and the trend line on sales of alcoholic beverages is down fairly dramatically.

Mr Davies: The pattern of LCBO profits to which Mr Kwinter refers has been reasonably flat over recent years. This table shows $640 million last year, estimated $650 million—I do not know if we have the final numbers in yet—and the forecast at $665 million. I just observe that is pretty flat overall.

This budget we are analysing here today had a tax change in it affecting the LCBO which we are presuming is not going to cause so much of a decline in consumption that it would wipe out the benefits of that tax change. The tax move on the LCBO profits, which is a volume levy increase of five cents, is forecast to generate $45 million in 1991-92. So on the tax side we expect to be up $45 million, but on the overall revenues we expect to be up only $15 million. The difference reflects all those other variables you are pointing out, that consumption is dropping.

Mr Kwinter: You feel this is a fairly small conservative estimate of what revenues you can expect?

Mr Davies: We work very closely with the people at the liquor control board who give us these numbers to work from and it is part of their business, hopefully, to know their business.

Mr Phillips: As I said earlier this morning, if I can crank myself back up, the median term for the fiscal plan is really interesting to me. How much in new taxes do you need in each of these three years to hit these revenue numbers? What are your assumptions on new taxes each year to hit the revenue numbers?

Mr Davies: As the Treasurer indicated this morning, he has not determined his budgets or the government's budgets for those years yet. The revenue growth as reflected in these numbers averages 9.8% per year for the 1991 through the 1994-95 period. I point out that in the 1984-90 period, it averaged around 10.5% or about 0.7% higher. As the Treasurer pointed out this morning, the revenue projections reflect a combination of growth in the economy and new, as yet undefined, tax moves.

Mr Phillips: In the budget, you say on page 50 that revenues grow at 90% of the gross domestic product, so you can calculate the whole thing. I said one other time to the Treasurer that it requires, in 1994-95, $5-billion worth of new taxes to hit those revenue numbers, and I think he agreed with that. I just want to make sure I am not off base, that if you take 90% of the gross domestic product you would need about $5 billion of new taxes to hit the revenue numbers.

Mr Salerno: That is correct.

Mr Phillips: The second thing that is really interesting to me is the capital fund. It is a neat political thing to do, but I am going to have some real questions about it as we go along.

In your Ontario capital fund in the budget, you say, "It has become clear that parts of our aging infrastructure require significant infusions of new investment to ensure that the people of Ontario will be well served in the future." Therefore—it is on page 55—capital is going to go from $4.3 billion to $4.6 billion to $5 billion to $5.5 billion, and I presume will continue at that level, the $5.5-billion or $6-billion-a-year level.

Mr Davies: We have gone out to 1994-95. To be honest, I would have to check with Tony to see if we had projected beyond 1994-95 in capital.

Mr Salerno: We have. The projections, as you go three and four years down the road, become more hazy, of course. These again are only projections, one set of numbers that will yield the deficit numbers you see there. The Treasurer indicated earlier this morning as well that the capital fund is one of the fastest-growing components in this plan.

Mr Phillips: I must say I view the capital fund as a device to try and hide the real debt, but I realize this is all going to be revealed. I do not know why you do not just build in, as the private sector would, an annual depreciation.

Mr Salerno: There is provision for depreciation built in that enters the operating numbers. The assumed depreciation is a straight line, 5% in other words, amortized over 20 years.

Mr Phillips: But that is on the new capital. Why would you not build in a depreciation of the—

Mr Salerno: Oh, you mean of the stock?

Mr Phillips: I mean the prior $6 billion a year. If you were a business, you would be showing on your operating costs some figure that represents the depreciation cost of replacing your—

Mr Salerno: In fact, in terms of accounting, the old capital essentially has been depreciated, because it is carried on our books at $1, I believe.

Mr Kwinter: Yes, but you do not pay any taxes.

Mr Phillips: I do not think you will get away with the capital fund the way it is in here. That will be at the public debate. Someone said it is like buying a new house. I do not think it is like buying a new house, it is like constantly repairing your infrastructure. What you are going to show in the operating are just the carrying costs on the new capital fund. I think the public will say, "Listen, as far as we're concerned you're spending that capital every year." And the debt has gone up, I guess, to another $5 billion a year.

On managing health care funds, I have a disagreement with your numbers on two fronts. The numbers I have seen from the Ontario Medical Association say the savings are not 5% a year, they are 1% a year. I wonder if you have been able to reconcile the difference. I asked the minister that recently in the House, but there is quite a difference of opinion on the interpretation of the agreement.

Mr Davies: This is 5% versus—sorry.

Mr Phillips: You are saying, "Instead of 12%, it will be 7%."

Mr Davies: That is right. That is our 1991-92 estimate.

Mr Phillips: Yes, the OMA would say, "Instead of 12% it might be 11%." There is a 1% saving, not a 5% saving.

Mr Davies: We are taking the average over the last 10 years; it has averaged 12%. Under the plan that has been put in place, we are expecting the growth to be 7% and those are the numbers we are working from and assuming.

Mr Phillips: Yes, but the OMA in its interpretation of the agreement says it is not a 5% saving, it is 1%.

Mr Davies: I am not sure. I was just asking Tony. I guess we would have to ask the Ontario Medical Association because I do not know how it does its calculations. I know how we have done ours.

Mr Phillips: I have asked the Minister of Health this question in the House. As I said to the Treasurer this morning the determination of that budget will be in the hands of an arbitrator now for the whole budget and I am not sure the government is managing that any longer. I think it is the arbitrator who will make that decision, is it not?

Mr Davies: I guess there is always a point of debate as to an arbitrator's role and function, how it will be exercised. You were asking this morning whether there were any particular, I think the term was "fettering clauses" in it.

Mr Phillips: Yes, fettering.

Mr Davies: There was a supplement to the Ontario budget, it looks the same as the budget, about managing health care funding.

Mr Phillips: I have read it very carefully.

Mr Davies: There is a passage in there I would just read for the benefit of the other members.

"In determining any fee increase the board"—this is the arbitration board—"will consider 'fair and reasonable compensation for physicians in light of the prevailing economic conditions in the province and the overall state of the provincial economy.' This would include an examination of the cost of physician practice, the level and method of physician remuneration in other provinces, changes in real per capita income in the province, the Ontario CPI, Ontario GDP and other economic indicators."

Mr Phillips: Again, I am sorry, I have asked some lawyers on this and the OMA's interpretation. This is what we would call completely unfettered arbitration, that the government's ability to pay cannot enter into it, the government's debt cannot enter into it, the government's fiscal problems cannot enter into it. I am just saying there is a fundamental difference of opinion on the interpretation. Maybe only time will tell, but in my opinion, that document you just held up there has a very different interpretation of the agreement. Maybe only time will tell. But I said to the minister, it is in the best interests to clarify earlier rather than later because you would hate for some time to creep in.

Mr Salerno: I would add that we should not underestimate the impact of capping the utilization, which is part of the agreement.

Mr Phillips: But you have not, I am sorry, and that will be determined by the arbitrator.

Mr Sterling: I have to go up to the House to debate another bill and I would like to ask a few questions. You can answer them now or provide me with answers later. Have you broken down your capital expenditures into what is for reconstructing schools and reconstructing sewers and reconstructing roads, and what is brand-new construction? Is there any distinction between the two kinds of capital expenditures?

Mr Salerno: Not with an aggregate in Treasury as we do it, no. Obviously we could. It would be a big job to do it over time, but the ministries would have some breakdown of what is major repair and what is a completely new school.

Mr Sterling: So from now on you are going to depreciate at 5% the capital you put in. You are not going to go back, say, 10 years and depreciate what was put out then at 5%, are you?

Mr Salerno: No.

Mr Sterling: So it is very advantageous, at the front end of the system, to work it this way. Could you provide me with the total amount of foreign debt we have in Ontario, both by yourself, Hydro and any other agencies basically receiving their funding from the government?

Mr Davies: Is that the portion of debt issued by Ontario Hydro, the government of Ontario or any of its subsidiary agencies held in foreign hands?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

Mr Davies: We can attempt to do that. I am not sure we have the full breakout, but I think we can undertake to get that.

Mr Sterling: Okay, I would appreciate that very much and I want to know what effect it would have if the dollar fell in value.

Mr Davies: Remember, our borrowings are in Canadian dollars. That is why I wanted to distinguish.

Mr Sterling: They are always in Canadian dollars?

Mr Davies: I guess 1974 was the last time we borrowed and did not convert. Ontario Hydro has a certain exposure to US dollars. For the first time periods, we will borrow in foreign currency and then convert when the time is opportune to Canadian dollars. Overall, at least right now, the composition of our borrowing is essentially in Canadian dollars, and I would have to ask how much of Ontario Hydro's is in non-Canadian. It is a relatively small percentage.

Interjection: I think it is about 25%.

Mr Davies: It is 25%? It is higher than I thought. That would be in US dollars.

Mr Sterling: I would like to know the total amount. It sounds like a good move by a former government.

The Chair: We move to the next section, then.

Mr Davies: Certainly. I will ask yet another member of the Treasury staff, Don Black, who is assistant director in the taxation policy branch, to highlight the tax initiatives in the budget. I would observe that there is a summary of revenue changes and then we have added a couple of slides on personal income tax moves, because they were among the moves of some interest in the budget, but obviously we are here to attempt to answer questions on any of the revenue charges.

Mr Black: I would point out before I begin that I have a more complete package which expands on that table on page 7. It gives a little more detail, as I go through the two areas I picked out to describe briefly, so I will hand those out as soon as I am finished.

On page 7, the summary of the revenue changes table is exactly as you would expect. It goes through the dozen or so tax changes that were in the budget. The difference between the 1991-92 total number and the full year number is quite simple. In 1991-92, some of the tax changes do not start until later in the year and there are a couple of tax changes phased in. For instance, the gas tax has two tax increases, one in April and one next January, so that is the difference between those two.

I would also point out that when I make this more complete package available, there is also an interprovincial comparison table at the very end which might be helpful in figuring out where Ontario stands in terms of its tax rates compared to the other provinces.

Flipping to page 8, I picked just a couple to talk briefly about, the personal income tax and the gasoline taxes, primarily because those are the ones that seem to have caught attention thus far.

On the personal income tax, I will briefly describe the two changes the budget contained. The first is a surtax rate increase change. The change is from 10% to 14%. Simply put, that means that for anybody with Ontario income tax payable over $10,000, what used to be a surtax rate of 10% becomes 14%. It affects roughly 165,000 people in the province and it only affects people who make over $84,000, so it is confined to the upper end of the income scale. To give an example of the impact of these changes, for this year the effect of the surtax change on somebody making $100,000 is about $50. For somebody making $200,000, the effect of the change is about $355. On a full-year basis you would double those amounts. So it is not a dramatic change. Although the rate looks like a fairly large increase, the relative amounts are small.

After this change, and this will be pointed out on the interprovincial table, I would note that the Ontario effective tax rate on income is still the third-lowest in Canada. This surtax change nets $60 million this year and $90 million on a full-year basis.

Flipping to page 9, the second change I would briefly touch on is the change to the Ontario tax reduction program. That is a tax cut program that has two elements involved. One is a basic amount and it is confined to the low end of the income scale. There is a basic tax cut and there is an additional tax cut for families with children or disabled dependents.

It is the second component, the tax cut for disabled dependents and children, that has been enriched in this budget. Until this year, it was $200 per child or per dependent disabled person; it is now $350. As pointed out in the middle of the slide, that benefits about 115,000 people and represents about 240,000 children and disabled dependents. The cost to the province is only $5 million this year, but on a full-year basis, in the amount people will receive when they fill out their tax returns, it is $50 million.

In total, this tax reduction program benefits about 700,000 people.

On page 10, the next tax change, and the one that seems to have generated the most calls post-budget and the most correspondence post-budget thus far, is the change to gasoline and diesel fuel tax rates as announced in the budget. For all of those rates appearing on the top half of the page—the gasoline tax by 3.4 cents, aviation fuel, diesel fuel and railway diesel fuel—the number at the end of each line, for instance, the 14.7 cents for gasoline, represents the fully phased-in tax change as of 1 January 1991. There will be two increases in each of those; for instance, on the gasoline, 1.7 cents on 30 April and 1.7 cents again 1 January. It is the same for each of those, so the final number there represents the fully phased-in amount.

I would point out, as again will be shown on the interprovincial table, that Ontario is towards the upper end of gasoline taxes with this most recent change but still well below Quebec and Newfoundland. Quebec, for instance, has a tax rate of almost 16.5 cents on gasoline. So it is towards the upper end. The other significant feature of this tax change is that in terms of the full-year tax increase, this gasoline tax change represents almost half of the total. On a full year it is about $500 million.

I see Bryan is handing out the more complete packages, if anybody wishes to flip through them. That completes that part of the presentation. I do not know if you want to spend any more time on any of the other tax changes, but we would welcome questions.

Mr Sutherland: You will have to excuse me; I do not have that much understanding of the personal income tax system. The increase in the surtax rate—that is after any other deductions they made, and the final amount of taxable income is the $84,000; is that correct?

Mr Black: That is the gross income amount. That is the minimum amount of gross income a person would have.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, so not net.

Mr Davies: Before any deductions.

Mr Black: The minimum amount a person would have before going into the surtax range is $84,000 in gross income.

The Chair: On that, if he has a $15,000 RRSP, is that before or after? With the federal RRSP, would that effectively mean he would have to make $100,000 a year before he would pay the surtax?

Mr Davies: Yes, $99,000, to be right to the dollar.

Mr Phillips: I am not sure whether this is the right place to ask this, but the Treasurer has made quite a bit of comment about the federal government cutting back dramatically on transfer payments and what not. What percentage of our revenue do we get from the federal government in transfer payments, and has there been any quid pro quo in terms of the federal government giving up directly tax points on the personal income tax in return for any reduction in transfer payments? Is there anything that happened there that we should be aware of?

Mr Davies: To address your first question, there is a pie diagram on page 74 of the budget that attempts to show the budget revenue for 1991-92. You will see that federal government payments show up as a grand total of about 12%.

Mr Phillips: About 12% comes from the federal government?

Mr Davies: I ask Harriet De Koven, who understands these matters in detail, to clarify that answer. But on a cash basis, it would be 12 cents.

Ms De Koven: Yes, it is 12 cents or 12% on a cash basis, but we also receive from the federal government tax points under the established programs financing, which would be an addition of approximately 6%. They appear as part of our tax revenue under personal and corporate income tax.

Mr Phillips: I know it is fashionable to blame the feds for all our problems, but what is the best way to look at what we have been getting from the federal government? 12% in direct grants and then another 6% in tax points. Has directed we receive that revenue on?

Ms De Koven: In 1977, when the established program financing came into being, the federal government ceded the tax room to the provinces. The perspective of the provinces is that that tax room now belongs to the provinces and does not represent a federal contribution any longer. It also does not appear on the federal books as an expenditure. It is revenue forgone to them.

Mr Davies: Essentially what happened is they just carved up the tax territory.

Mr Phillips: This is personal income tax, is it?

Mr Davies: Personal income tax.

Mr Phillips: That is the one that has been growing dramatically, is it not? Is that not the one where the money seems to keep flowing in?

Ms De Koven: They ceded 13.5 personal income tax points and one corporate income tax point. You are correct that the value of the tax points has been growing relatively more quickly than the established programs financing entitlement. EPF is the program in respect of post-secondary education and health care. Particularly now that EPF has been frozen by the federal government, the tax portion makes up a greater proportion. The cash portion, which is the residual, gets smaller and smaller and in fact will disappear, we estimate, some time after the year 2000.

Mr Phillips: I just seem to remember last year $1 billion, $900 million, of personal income tax coming in at the end of the year. Was that sort of a surprise?

Mr Davies: Yes, a lot of that was in respect of prior years.

Mr Phillips: What is that worth to the province in terms of revenue, six points?

Ms De Koven: Six per cent.

Mr Phillips: So we pick up six percentage points—or that 6% of our total revenue?

Ms De Koven: It is about 6%. We cannot calculate it on the same basis because it is a share of basic federal tax and we do not know until some time after the year in which we are entitled to it exactly how much we have. But it should be about 6% of our total revenue.

Mr Phillips: How much do we blame the feds? Can they say to us, "Well, wait a minute, don't get too angry because transfer payments are only 12% and we gave you these tax points where you are picking up all this money on the personal tax side?"

Mr Davies: That would be an interesting characterization on their part, because I think if one went back to 1976 when the negotiations were going on—I was not there so I could be wrong—as I understand it, the essence of the deal was, "We will start giving you cash payments, and recognizing that those cash payments aren't as big as you want them to be, we are going to get out of a certain amount of income tax room"—which was that many points at that time—"and leave that for you." So that was part of the initial deal, setting relatively low dollars. I do not know if that is a fair characterization.

Mr Salerno: What is relevant here is that what the federal government is doing is reducing the total entitlements. The sum of that money comes from the value of the tax points. Consequently, it is really quite irrelevant because that is the total entitlement that is made up of the value of the tax points. Whatever those tax points might be, they deduct that and then they give you the balance in the form of cash.

You pointed to a prior-year adjustment in respect to the personal income tax. Let's say they pay us more in respect to that prior year. The value of those tax points increases. Consequently, they take some cash back in respect to that same year. I know it sounds a little complex, but what really happens, and what they have done over the last two years, has been, in the case of the EPF, they essentially flat-lined the entitlement. Because the personal income tax points in respect to that entitlement keep growing, the cash transfer will diminish. What is important is the latest action they have done in terms of freezing or reducing the growth in that entitlement. So the tax points are really not an issue. They are not important; they are only important in determining the residual.

Ms De Koven: If I could just add to that, under the original arrangement our payments for health care and post-secondary education were to have grown at the same rate as growth in gross national product. What has happened now is that there is to be no growth at all; the formula has been successively altered over the years from the original arrangement. So what Tony has said is exactly right. Under the entitlement that we now get, which is completely flat-lined, the value of the tax keeps going up, and because the total is being held constant, the cash keeps going down.

Mr Phillips: I am not advocating this but just asking what the facts are. What is in the Ontario taxpayers' best interest? Is it that the national cash payments to all provinces be restored, or are we better to just raise the money ourselves locally?

My point is that we will argue with the federal government that it should reinstate some substantial growth in health and education. I gather Ontario is a fairly significant contributor to that fund for other provinces. I am not advocating this, I am just interested in the answer, but which is in the Ontario taxpayers' best interest?

Mr Davies: I am not sure how one defines their best interest. What would cost the least amount of tax dollars? If one looks at it from that perspective, historically Ontario taxpayers have been a net contributor to Confederation. Money from Ontario gets redistributed to other provinces. If there were not other provinces to whom moneys flowed from Ontario through the federal government, obviously there would be less taxes drawn out of Ontario.

Mr Christopherson: I am pleased and interested that Mr Phillips would raise this particular issue because I had discussions recently with a local Hamilton MP, who happens to be a good Liberal, who was concerned about the fact that this was the answer he was getting constantly from the federal government when he asked about the issue of transfer payments, because that is an important issue to our community as it is to every other one. So I found it very enlightening to listen to the questions and the answers.

I would like to pursue one answer I heard. There was a statement that the federal government does not show the tax-point transfers as a tax expenditure.

Ms De Koven: It does not appear as a program expenditure. It has no bearing on their deficit except to the extent that it is a forgone revenue.

Mr Christopherson: Is there anything else that is similar, other than the tax points that have been given, in terms of the relationship between the feds and the provinces? Is there any other kind of arrangement that has been set in place and does not show as a tax expenditure or as a net gain for the province?

Ms De Koven: I am not aware of anything in the case of Ontario. But in the case of Quebec, there are a number of additional tax points. Under the established programs financing, they have an additional, I think, eight tax points. They have an additional five tax points under the Canada assistance plan that the other provinces have not and an additional, I think, three tax points for a youth allowance program that is now defunct in other provinces. There is nothing in Ontario that I am aware of. Tony?

Mr Salerno: No.

Mr Christopherson: What I would like to do is just ask the question straightforwardly from a little different perspective. How correct is it, in your opinion, to say the provinces do not have the right to squawk about the reduction in transfer payments because these point transfers took place?

Ms De Koven: I was going to reiterate what Tony had said previously, that the tax transfer is only part of what we get under the entitlement. As the tax transfer increases, it displaces the cash portion. What is really relevant is that they have held down the total amount of money being provided in respect of health care and post-secondary education. Whether we are getting it in tax or cash is not that pertinent. It is the total that has now been flat-lined. On a cash basis—by that I mean cash flow—we got approximately $70 million additional this year over last year under the established programs financing. I think our expenditures for health and post-secondary education went up about $1.6 billion more. I would have to check the numbers, but the amount we got from the federal government in addition to what we had last year was about $70 million. Our expenditures for those purposes went up about $1.6 billion.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you. I think that adequately expands on the issue for the purposes needed.

Mr Kwinter: Briefly, without getting involved in the politics, Bryan, I would like you to respond to this. The gas guzzler tax: Last year it was $45 million, this year it is $90 million, so the revenues have doubled. And when I and others in the House questioned the Treasurer he maintained that it was environment driven, it had nothing to do really with revenues. It was a byproduct of the environmental initiative.

I am a little concerned about some of the statements he made yesterday. I was not in the House but I read some of the reports and he is indicating that, yes, we are re-examining our position on the gas guzzler tax, but we have to make sure that whatever adjustments we make, the revenue remains the same. Which leads me to believe that in fact it is revenue driven and they are using the environment as an excuse to get that revenue. Do you have any comments? Without getting political, obviously.

Mr Davies: I read some press reports this morning, too, and I guess the press reports I read emphasize the commitment to ensuring that their environmental objectives were still being met. Quite frankly, in any tax move there is a combination of features that are desirable. One is to achieve public policy objectives and one is to raise revenue. I cannot comment on whether the Treasurer of Ontario said he wanted to ensure that revenues were the same, because I did not read that and I was not watching the House or in the House to hear him yesterday.

I did want to pick up on one of the numbers you cited though, of the gas tax proceeds in prior years, because it did not ring true in my memory. Don, maybe you could just clarify that?

Mr Black: The numbers we have in our hands suggest that up until the budget change, the tax on fuel-inefficient vehicles would raise about $7 million.

Mr Kwinter: On page 28 of the budget it shows revenue on fuel-inefficient vehicles in 1991-92 $30 million on a full year $45 million.

Mr Black: Yes. Those are the increments over the $7 million. So for this year it would be $7 million plus the $30 million and on a full-year basis it would be $7 million plus the $45 million.

Mr Kwinter: But on page 4 of this document, the bottom line, it says 1991-92 $45 million, full year $90 million.

Mr Black: That could be a typo and if it is, I apologize.

Mr Kwinter: Page 4 of this one. There are two documents.

Mr Black: That is the fuel taxes. That is the diesel tax fuel.

Mr Davies: That is not the so-called gas guzzler.

Mr Black: Yes, that is the diesel fuel. The relevant page for the tax on fuel-inefficient vehicles is under the retail sales tax on page 6.

The Chair: Should we move on to the next section?

Mr Davies: Fine. The final section in the overview presentation is the section on financing or how the borrowing requirements are being covered off. I would ask Sandra Tychsen, director of the finance policy branch in Treasury, to guide you through those pages, which are 11, 12 and 13.

Mrs Tychsen: To discuss the borrowing requirements, I will first describe the composition of the borrowing requirements, then the sources of funds we have available to fund the borrowing requirements, then the decisions we have made to date in funding the requirements, and finally discuss the credit rating and its relationship to Ontario's borrowing costs.

For the 1991-92 budget year, that is the year ending 31 March 1992, our total financing requirements or borrowing requirements for the province are composed of the deficit at $9.7 billion, maturing debt for the year of $639 million giving us total borrowing requirements of $10.365 billion. Of that financing requirement for this budget year, we have borrowed up until this point $4.169 billion. That leaves us with $6.196 billion to finance over the remainder of this budget year.

To finance the budget requirements we have available to us a variety of sources of funds. First, the public bond market, in addition the short-term floating rate Treasury bill market. The bonds and T-bill market constitute the public sources of funds. In addition to that, we have non-public sources of finance, which include Canada pension plan; the Province of Ontario Savings Office funds, which we are required to borrow by legislation; some other small deposit and trust accounts, which include some small peron, which I believe includes the legislative pension fund; liquid reserves, the reserve funds we have for meeting cash requirements of the province.

I will describe now, given that sort of menu of choice for financing the deficit, what choices we have made to date for this budget year. This is page 12, which is the funding decisions for this budget year to date. Again, this begins for the 1991-92 budget year.

Our borrowing to date for funding the budget requirements consists of $2.6 billion. In your handout it says $575 million in public market bonds. These have included issues in our Canadian bond market, in the Euro-Canadian market, which of course is also in Canadian dollars, and in the US market, called the Yankee bond market. The average term to maturity of our bond financings is 5.6 years and the weighted average yield, or our average borrowing cost for all of those issues, is 10.14%.

In addition to public bond issues, we have borrowed $800 million through the provincial Treasury bill market. I could note that most of those Treasury bills, which are short-term borrowing, have been converted, via a financial technique called an interest rate swap, into fixed-rate or longer-term bonds of 5, 7 and 10 years. In addition, we have borrowed approximately $800 million from the CPP and have borrowed a small amount—it is a little too early to say exactly how much, but it is done on a sort of month-to-month basis—from non-public sources of funds, including the Province of Ontario Savings Office, other deposit funds, pensions and trust accounts and also our liquid reserves.

We began our borrowing at the beginning of the fiscal year; the funding decisions I have just described include those borrowings for this 1991-92 fiscal year. I would also note that since the budget itself has come out, we have completed two bond issues: a $500-million Canadian bond issue on 11 June and a $500-million Euro-Canadian issue on 17 June.

Mr Kwinter: Are they both in Canadian dollars?

Mr Davies: They are both denominated in Canadian dollars.

Mr Kwinter: I remembered I saw some press reports that they were going to be a little slower than normal. I just wondered. They are all subscribed, though, are they?

Mr Davies: Yes. This is Leslie Thompson, who is the director of the capital markets branch.

Ms Thompson: Yes, indeed, they have been. They are fully sold.

Mr Stockwell: I read the same press report. They did go slower than expected?

Ms Thompson: No, not at all. I do not think you can say that when the Canadian domestic issue traded at a premium within 15 minutes of launch that is a slow issue. That is pretty fast, and the Euro-Canadian broke syndicate within an hour and a half of launch. Two to three days is normal in Europe, so I think those were exaggerated reports.

Mr B. Ward: Fifteen minutes, is that—

Ms Thompson: Within 15 minutes of when it started to trade, the bidding was at a premium on it. We had not broken syndicate yet and it was already at a premium in domestic.

Mrs Tychsen: I turn now to page 13, Ontario's credit rating. Following our regular annual meetings with the credit rating agencies, the credit rating agencies reported and have changed Ontario's credit rating. I should note there are four different rating agencies. In our handout we have provided you with the ratings that are most significant in terms of financial markets. These are first the AA2 rating given to us by Moody's and the AA-plus rating by Standard and Poor's. In addition to that, we are rated by the two Canadian bond rating agencies, Canadian Bond Rating Service, which has given us a AA-plus rating and Dominion Bond Rating Service, which is AA-low. With these current credit ratings, Ontario has the highest rating among the provinces. We share that with British Columbia.

I would like to note that it is important, in understanding the borrowing cost Ontario faces, that they are determined principally by the overall level of interest rates. In Canada we would look at the interest rates or what we call the yield curve set by Canada's bonds. These interest rates, as my colleague Qaid Silk has described, as you are well aware, are a federal policy of monetary policy and of general economic forces.

So the main determinant of our borrowing is the overall Canadian level of interest rates. In addition to that, another component of our borrowing cost is the spread, the additional amount anybody besides the federal government pays to borrow in the bond market, and we call that Ontario's spread or the spread over Canada. The overall level of interest rates plus the premium any borrower who is not a sovereign borrower would pay—the spread—is our borrowing cost. It is interest rates plus spread that give us our total borrowing cost.

I note that our borrowing costs, like any bond issue, would change minute to minute. My colleague Leslie Thompson is in constant and direct contact with financial markets. To tell you exactly what our borrowing costs would be at this minute would require assessing what is happening to interest rates at the federal level, understanding the various different spreads we would face for bond issues of different terms all the way from one year up to 40 years, as well as variations among different markets, what it would cost us to borrow in the Yankee or US market, what it would cost us to borrow in the Euro-Canadian market, the Canadian dollar, what it would cost in a domestic market; the complications go on from there.

While credit ratings are certainly a factor in determining borrowing costs, they are not among the major factors determining borrowing costs. In addition to that, there is a fairly uncertain and complex relationship between ratings and borrowing costs. Therefore, while there are general relationships, it is very difficult to match up any particular rating with a particular borrowing cost.

Lenders and financial markets do look at a variety of factors in addition to credit ratings and they also try to anticipate when rating changes will occur. You could have a change in your borrowing costs anticipating a change that does not come. You could have a rating change or a change in your borrowing cost anticipating some other factor. At any one point in time it would be very hard for us to say our spread narrowed because we were expecting a positive rating change; our spread narrowed because they look at the Canadian currency positively. There are very many factors.

I note that rating changes are a factor, that prior to the rating changes our spread, its component of our borrowing costs, did increase somewhat. It would be very hard to say exactly by how much.

Mrs Tychsen: We were saying five basis points, or 0.05%. That may be a bit high. Rating agencies made their decision and the rating changes were publicly announced. Our borrowing costs have stabilized. Again, it would be difficult to give a precise answer to what exact impact ratings have had on the borrowing costs. I just wanted to set out the requirements, the choices we have in meeting those requirements, the decisions we have made to date and the determinants of our borrowing costs. That completes my presentation.

Mr Sutherland: I was just wondering if you could provide us with some sense of how much importance you put on the credit rating. Different people think the credit rating is the be-all and end-all of your financial shape and your ability versus other factors. I guess I also want some sense of what our surrounding neighbours have. What is the credit rating for the American government? Is it a triple A1? What about the surrounding states like New York and Michigan?

Mrs Tychsen: Most sovereign governments—the US, Canada, the UK, France—have triple A ratings by both of the majors, Standard and Poor's and Moody's. There are a very few exceptions. Italy has a slightly lower one.

We keep track of the credit ratings of all the other Canadian provinces and US jurisdictions as well as some other entities. There are some triple A states but very few of those. I could give you a sheet we have which sets out the ratings of the American states if you are interested.

Mr Stockwell: You are saying five basis points? How much premium would, say, Massachusetts have to pay on its borrowing in basis points?

Mrs Tychsen: As a result of a ratings change?

Mr Stockwell: With their rating right now being as lousy as it is, how much does it affect their borrowing percentage-wise?

Mrs Tychsen: Again, because so many different factors affect borrowing costs, they would have the same difficulty we have in attributing any particular amount to that ratings change. We could go out and ask some point estimate but it would be fairly rough.

I should note that we are in the very top ratings tier. For the change from a triple A to a triple A-plus it is very hard to find an effect.

Mr Stockwell: That is why I asked.

Mrs Tychsen: Once you get down to a lower rating, to a situation where you might actually be at a rating where for example a large pension fund might have difficulty buying your bonds because it might be considered slightly risky proposition, there could probably be large impacts. We can investigate what information there is in terms of Massachusetts.

Mr Davies: Just to elaborate on that, undoubtedly the higher the credit rating the easier it is to market your bonds, and usually the easier it is to market your bonds the lower the cost to your market. It becomes very difficult to market bonds when your rating goes very low. It is the availability issue that becomes the driving force to the cost.

Mr Stockwell: I was going to make the very point you just made. It is sounding as if you are downplaying the credit rating drop and I think that is a mistake. Clearly a credit rating drop is not a healthy situation. We would be like Massachusetts if we really did not care. But to measure in a sense you really cannot tell something like a full point more or anything like that.

Mrs Tychsen: I would note the access. Certainly in terms of access to different markets, in terms of the particular rating change we have just experienced, it would not be significant. It would be very difficult to list exactly what—

Mr Stockwell: The question asked is what it is costing us, how much more it is costing us with the drop in our credit rating. You are saying, "We cannot answer that." Or are you saying nothing?

Mrs Tychsen: We cannot be specific. It is very difficult to be specific. We have given some rough estimates, for example, but I would note that when we looked and when we tried to track several years ago—and there we had a longer period to track, the ratings change in 1985—after we tried to isolate the impact of the ratings change, unfortunately overall interest rates were dropping at the same time, just as they are now, which makes it difficult to isolate.

Mr Stockwell: I understand. It is very difficult, I agree. So I cannot be sure of any numbers that I hear thrown out by the government?

Mrs Tychsen: We gave our best estimate and used, I believe, a study that had been done in the US a number of years ago; but most analysts will tell you that it is difficult.

Mr Stockwell: I appreciate that. On page 13 I went down to the third bullet, "Changes in borrowing costs generally do not follow immediately on any rating change and already have been factored into Ontario's borrowing costs." How did you do that?

Mr Davies: I think that is referring to the fact that the market had already discounted our fiscal situation. It had already been pricing our bonds as if we had a rating lower than—

Mr Stockwell: So the market did it, rather than you people? I assume you are saying that was before the budget came about or before you went out looking for money.

Mr Davies: Yes.

Mrs Tychsen: You might have to distinguish a couple of different factors at play there. One is that the rating is the result of a determination by the rating agencies that takes into account many different factors and different weightings by the different agencies. For example, the different rating agencies obviously have assessed Ontario credit rating slightly differently. We have a slightly different rating in terms of levels from Moody's and Standard and Poor's. One is AA-plus, which is slightly above the Moody's AA2. Therefore the financial markets, even in anticipation, have to decide an outcome which would not be clear.

Mr Stockwell: I understand. So it was not your department that said: "Gee, Floyd's coming with a budget. We're going to have higher costs incurred due to interest rates because we're going to have a higher deficit, so we'd better assume that we're going to have a drop in our credit rating." You did not assume that?

Mr Davies: You mean in terms of figuring out what the estimated borrowing costs were?

Mr Stockwell: Yes.

Mr Davies: No. Again, the big factor affecting our borrowing cost is interest rate and our interest rate forecasts. That is the real driver.

The Chair: On the issue of floating bonds in the marketplace, is not the bottom line really whether people are going to buy our bonds and at what rate of interest they are going to do it? For me anyway the bottom-line question is, are our bonds going into the market and being purchased at a lower interest rate than some other bonds because they see our market as a safer market for buying bonds?

Mrs Tychsen: When you say "other bonds" could you clarify what you mean?

The Chair: Other provinces, other states, other countries put bonds into the market; they are obviously all out there at the same time. If people are purchasing Ontario bonds at, say, 9.96% interest and they are passing up 10.5% on some other country's bonds, obviously there is a reason for that.

Mrs Tychsen: There is a weighing between risk and return. Most portfolios would buy certain amounts of bonds that would be AA and above. That is usually where the cutoff is.

The Chair: So the question is, how are our bonds going in that market? If they are being sold in 15 minutes, it seems rather quick.

Mr Davies: Yes. If one uses the benchmark of how much more that is than the government of Canada has to pay for a bond of comparable term, a five-year bond. I do not know how high Newfoundland would be now, but it would be 90 or something like that?

Mrs Tychsen: No, probably over 100.

Mr Davies: They would have to pay over one percentage point more than the government of Canada would for a similar bond. Our five-year bonds are trading over Canada's now about—

Mrs Tychsen: Sixty-two in the domestic market today.

Mr Davies: —about 62 and Quebec would be about 85. I do not know if that helps you. You can see that the lesser one's credit, the higher interest rate is demanded.

Mrs Tychsen: There are other factors that weigh in there too, in that they want some kind of diversification of a portfolio. In other words, nobody would load up entirely with one particular bond. They want to diversify.

The Chair: Thank you. Are there any other questions for the Deputy Treasurer and staff?

Mr Christopherson: Other than to thank them for their sterling performance, once again.

The Chair: I was just about to do that. I would like to thank you, on behalf of the committee, for spending this afternoon with us. I guess the projection that we could do it in an hour was just a little out; it always takes a little longer when people start to ask questions. Thank you for coming, and if in the future you have any further information along the lines of the questions that have been asked here, if you could pass that along to the committee, we would be appreciative of it.

Mr Davies: We will certainly do that. We will try to keep track of a series of outstanding issues and we will get back through the committee to the members.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Our last order of business is to firm up a subcommittee meeting for Monday. At what time and place?

Mr Kwinter: I do not know the time because I do not know what commitments I have, but generally Monday is fine. Todd, maybe you can call my office and find a time that is convenient to everybody.

Mr Sutherland: Ten or 12 is good for me.

The Chair: This committee is adjourned until 10 o'clock next Thursday.

The committee adjourned at 1742.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming this morning. The format is for you to do your presentation and then whatever time is left between now and approximately 1 o'clock will be divided equally among the three parties. I have my stopwatch available to make sure everything is done equitably and fairly, so if you could begin please.

Mr Whitestone: Sure. Thank you very much for asking me to be here today. It was a hot walk up but I am glad to be here and, without going into a long autobiographical comment about myself, I have in the past worked for both Conservative and Liberal Prime Ministers in Ottawa and I think I do my very best to be objective and work by what I learned in a textbook. I am a professional economist, and I repeat I am doing my very best to be objective and without any prejudices. I have my own partisan biases.

My comments will be divided into three sections: general observations and the philosophy expounded by the budget, a very brief analysis of parts of this budget, and finally, recommended alternatives.

The budget's underlying philosophy: A common supposition inspired by John Maynard Keynes is that the government can reduce the severity of or perhaps eliminate economic cycles. Stressed is the importance of taxes and government spending, as governments have the power to stimulate or suppress economic activity as the need arises. Specifically, this theory urges that government spending be stepped up during recessions, even if an appreciable budget deficit happens to be among the consequences of such stimulative measures. A corollary to this notion is the danger of the so-called liquidity trap, which may develop when money is pumped into public hands but is saved and not spent. If savings pile up, the economy noses down on account of lacklustre spending.

The Keynesian solution, as it has often been applied in postwar recessions, is to spend until business recovers. In this view, therefore, budgets do not always need to be near a balanced position. Deficits achieved through higher spending and, it should be noted, tax reductions—which of course this budget does not really bring except in a minor way—are seen as highly beneficial at times, usually during recessions or in the early stages of business recoveries.

Conversely, budget deficits are inappropriate when the economy is running close to flat out. No matter what the Globe and Mail said, I fail to understand how anybody can read this particular budget. I read very briefly the Conference Board of Canada comment, and it has lauded the budget deficit here for helping the recession, yet there is no comment about what happens in the out years. I fail to understand how anybody can not take that into consideration, which ought to be key no matter how much of a Keynesian you are.

The intended result of such a policy is an economy that expands rather steadily, minimizing the economic cycle. Remember, 20 years ago they thought they could eliminate the economic cycle—so be it. In practice, this idea of how the economy ought to work has failed. There are many explanations of why this theory has not worked. The essential difficulty is that today's economy has become so out of kilter that it is not able to readily set things right. Debts—federal, provincial and even private debts—are so great that they have swamped our credit markets. When interest payments on the debt become an ever-mounting item of expense in budgets—federal, provincial and private—any plan for a sharp rise in spending to spur economic growth may deter rather than encourage business activity.

Let me briefly mention something here that I think ought to be key for anybody. When the gap widens between total debt and nominal GNP—how much GNP is rising—the financial sector absorbs so much cash flow from the economy that it incapacitates the system from creating the means to meet the interest payments. In other words, when the debt rises so much—and right now the debt in North America is roughly 2.9 times GNP, right about the 1929 peak—it incapacitates the system, because the need to meet interest payments is so onerous that the economy cannot expand enough even to meet the interest payments. That is why, even though it is hard to understand, deficits and debt really are in the long run deflationary, unless it goes through a wild Weimar Germany type of inflation, because the need to meet the interest payments cripples the economy. That is where we are now. So I cannot understand, when the problem is too much debt, why the solution is to create more debt. I think that is the problem.

It is rather obvious that deficit spending ultimately entails inflation—or as I pointed out, deflation—unless you do something about it. Credit creation takes place, or if that does not occur, then the money demanded by the government sector takes away money or credit from the private sector. Furthermore, to the extent the resources utilized by government are less productive than resources utilized by the private sector—and I think everybody would acknowledge without any bias that government spending really is less productive and efficient than in the private sector as a generalization, and we all know that government spending is much less efficient generally—then a shift towards a larger public sector reduces the overall productivity of the economy. Now I recognize that there is the odd case where government spending can be efficient and private sector spending can be inefficient, but as a generalization I think nobody will deny what I have just mentioned.

An increasingly disproportionate public sector, quite apart from its inflationary and non-productive consequences, carries with it the familiar but always important implications for individual liberty. The governmental bureaucracy—and I used to be part of it, incidentally—comes to have a momentum and power of its own.

An increase in overall budget size is reflected in particular spending programs, each of which will quickly come to develop its own beneficiary constituency. To justify its continued existence, the particular bureaucracy of each spending program must increase the apparent need for its services. I used to be in the federal Privy Council Office 25 years ago, which you perhaps know is the apex of the federal government. When I was there, about 28 years ago, there were 65 people. There are now 1,000.

Furthermore, some politicians enjoy spending public moneys that yield some demonstrable benefits to their constituents, but they do not enjoy imposing taxes on these same constituents. Perhaps a larger question is the failure of the average voter to condemn the politicians who behave irresponsibly. I think we are all derelict in not explaining this to the public. I think the duty of a politician—I am a failed politician, so maybe I do not know—is to use his or her platform to explain things that the average person can understand. Any politician is derelict who does not explain exactly the consequences of what he or she is doing.

The philosophy supporting deficits is founded on the belief that economic growth is retarded by inadequate purchasing power and that consumer spending ought to be augmented by government spending. However, the historical record suggests, particularly in the last decade, that capital formation rather than consumption is a primary determinant of economic growth. Japan invests between 25% and 30% of its GNP in capital spending; we spend roughly 10% and the US less than that. What has lagged in recent years is not personal consumption or government spending but profits and investment.

Second, sharply enlarged public works can be self-defeating in their effort to stimulate the economy. Public works usually are concentrated in capital projects: bridges, roads and things like that. Capital spending is like putting a half frozen man next to a red hot stove. Construction prices and wages—and I repeat, public spending is usually focused on construction—climb too fast, and that drives prices there beyond the capacity of additional potential buyers. All this has in the long run a depressing influence on economic activity.

Ontario's 1991 budget: The rationalization for the $9.7-billion budget deficit, the jobs it will create, is covered by the above comments. I am going to come back to one phrase I repeated later on.

Other aspects of Ontario's spending priorities are disturbing. The great bulk of new spending is for such things as pay equity and job equity, for improving the lot of those already employed. I do not quarrel with that as an objective. I think I try to have Christian compassion. Aside from the fact that these programs have a proven record of failure, it is unfortunate that outlays on social assistance exceed spending for schools, colleges and universities.

I think anybody would agree that the key to our ultimate success in the 21st century is education. Enhancing job protection is a worthwhile objective, but for the long term, if we are going to compete in the global economy of the 21st century, we must have an educational system at least equal to the best anywhere else in the world. By that way, Ontario's decision to opt out of a national standard test implies that we have given up on that effort. Almost everywhere I have gone in the past month or so, people complain about that. I think the copout is very significant. I was at the Toronto Symphony last night and bumped into a teacher I know from Elora. He mentioned again how unfortunate he thought that was and what the implications of it were.

Second, if we try to be the one jurisdiction that has more rigorous standards than our trading partners, how on earth are we going to compete, either in costs or attracting investments in entrepreneurial activity? Capital will simply flow to other areas that are more hospitable. I read the rather scathing comment of Conrad Black in the Financial Post a couple of days ago, but I think the point is that if we have standards that are much higher than anywhere else in the world, why would a person build a plant here rather than in Buffalo? The answer is clearly that he or she would not.

The proposed manufacturing recovery program will provide grants to small and medium-sized manufacturers that are suffering from the business recession. The record of governments in picking winners has been abysmal. We all know what happened in Nova Scotia with Bricklin. Everywhere the record has been poor. Even with the best of intentions—and the best of intentions do not always occur, because governments are subject to all kinds of pressure—governments cannot substitute for the marketplace. Ask anyone in eastern Europe or the Soviet Union for confirmation of that.

Longer term, one must be concerned with some of the arithmetic inherent in the budget. The budget suggests that growth plus inflation to the years 1994-95 will add up about 7% annually. Ontario estimates its tax take grows about 90% of the nominal rate of the growth of the provincial economy—90% of 7%, which is roughly 6%. If that ratio continues, our tax revenues will fall short of the projected 10% spending increases. So our revenue will be rising at roughly 6.3% and our spending is rising at 10%. That means roughly we are going to have to find 4%. We are implicitly being told that taxes will have to be raised by about 4% of spending for the next several years—that arithmetic says that—a frightening thought and one that will further deter investment here.

In this connection, the plan for imposing a minimum tax on corporations was reasserted. It was not imposed, but the suggestion was made. It is well known that corporations themselves do not pay taxes. It is wonderful that people say, "We should increase corporation taxes," but who ultimately pays corporation taxes? The answer is you and I, of course. Corporations simply pass on tax, like all per cost, to the consumer. Furthermore, the threat of such tax or additional other levies, which is obviously implicit in that number, such as those suggested at one time or another by the Treasurer, such as a wealth tax, a speculative tax or inheritance taxes, obviously will ensure that entrepreneurs do not locate in Ontario.

I work for a firm in downtown Toronto. I am not exaggerating to say that we average at least one call a day from people who want to move their funds out of Ontario. The same thing happened in Quebec, where actually I used to work, where the government thought it could act with impunity and it drove out entrepreneurial activity. The result of course is that Quebec has the highest unemployment, aside from Newfoundland, in the country.

One may sympathize with the idea of a gas guzzler tax, even modified, on automobiles. However, by imposing that levy now, what will be the effect on car sales, which are now in such a deep slump? Will the major automobile companies, almost all of which are international in their operations, be likely to locate in the one province that sells larger cars? The answer is obvious.

All of us decry separatism and deplore the fractured state of our country. When Quebec goes it alone in its language law, we regret that move. Now, Ontario apart is pursuing economic policies that diverge from those in every other province and from the direction of the federal government as well. There was a graph that appeared recently in the Globe and Mail depicting the fiscal steps of the provinces of Canada. Every province except Ontario is straining employment in the public sector and trying to trench in order to achieve a better fiscal balance.

The Bank of Canada has been compelled to tighten monetary policy in an effort to combat inflation. Also, in order to right the wrongs of the previous decades of profligacy, taxes have been raised, notably the GST. Now Ontario is moving in the opposite direction. In the long run, this will undermine the efforts of the other governments, both provincial ones and the federal government too.

In the budget there is a table that reveals that a $670-million tax increase will result in the loss of only 4,000 jobs, a calculation that seems impossible to make. I do not know how you can figure that out. The same document states that $670 million in higher anti-recession spending will create 18,200 jobs, described as person-years of employment, a rather interesting bureaucratic term, or an average of $36,000 a job. In other words, the spending only cost $36,000 a job; the taxes presumably involved 167,000 a job.

As a non-smoker, I am in agreement with the additional $210 million to be collected from cigarette smokers. This should be accompanied by a more determined effort to reduce cigarette smuggling, which according to the press is soaring. If you watch the news, apparently people are doing this all the time, waylaying trucks, breaking into stores and things like that.

It is very disturbing that the Ontario Treasurer projects continuing deficits of about $7 billion to $8 billion at least until 1995. I find that, no matter what your objective point of view is, the hardest thing to understand. The rationalization of such big deficits in the out years simply does not exist, and from the very cursory examination I read in that Globe article today by the conference board, even it fails to understand that. I cannot understand any rationalization for it. I am going to come back to one thing at the end too.

Recommended alternatives: It seems to be forgotten that governments do not create jobs. If so, it would be marvellous. You look at other countries throughout the world, leaving off eastern Europe, but in countries like Argentina, which used to have a somewhat democratic tradition, they have tried that and all it does eventually is lead to a falling GNP. It would be wonderful if governments could create jobs, but they cannot because all they are doing is using the resources that are there; they cannot create resources out of nothing.

There are no incentives to invest in this budget. There is nothing in this budget that will stimulate profits. The word profits hardly ever appears in our lexicon of words and papers any more. First, there should be an ethic of restraint. Cutting back on excessive wage increases in the public sector should set a good example. I know Gordon Wilson of the Ontario Federation of Labour rather well, and he and I have talked a bit about what has happened to Algoma. And you can mention another example too which occurs to me. In the United States in the 1930s the coal miners numbered 670,000. John L. Lewis, who was head of the United Mine Workers for a long period of time, kept on demanding and getting excessive wage increases. What happens? There are now 67,000 coal miners, one tenth of what there were 50 years ago, because automation was more profitable. So excessive wage increases do not work.

I am not a person who objects to higher minimum wages. I know the rationalization for it and I do not wring my hands about that because I know there is a reason for it. But excessive wage increases are counterproductive. Cutting back on excessive wage increases in the public sector would set a good example. In fact, let me mention something. Does anybody here know what the average wage is in Ontario Hydro, the average wage for everybody there? Anyway, it is $45,000 a year—the average, which includes people who just do the most menial jobs to the people who are the engineers.

Also, to finance a projected short-term job creation, we will need bigger deficits and therefore higher interest payments. That will add to the burdens on Ontario's budget and eventually increase taxes, which destroy jobs.

I am going to repeat the same phrase I used before. When the gap widens between total debt and nominal GNP, the financial sector absorbs more cash flow from the economy, so much cash flow from the economy that it can no longer meet the interest payments or of course create jobs to keep the economy afloat. That is the key thing there. In the later years, therefore, obviously the budget deficit should be cut back. As a suggestion to help the north, the creation of an economic free zone should be considered.

Rather than a subsidy, by that all taxes and regulations except those that affect the environment, health and safety, could be abolished. You know they have tried this even in places like China and it works like mad. If such a policy were pursued in, say, Elliot Lake, does anyone doubt that the local economy would pick up? The manufacturing sector could be given a limited tax holiday, with perhaps some forgiveness for Ontario's share of the capital gains tax it collects. I have thought about this for a while and people say, "You would have a fractured tax system in Canada." But for many years, as you probably know, every province did not have an inheritance tax, so there is no reason why Ontario could not forgive capital gains tax on, for example, people who start a manufacturing enterprise. It would lead to job creation here.

The automobile industry could be given some sales relief if the tax on smaller cars were reduced. We had a similar plan on all cars in the 1970s in Ontario. Remember, I think for half a year they eliminated the sales tax on all cars, and it stimulated car sales a lot.

Finally the health care budget needs to be placed under strict controls. Anybody who looks at the projections will know it is totally out of control. In fact, by the year 2000 it will absorb the entire current budget, so you have to do something about that. The way we pay doctors on a fee-for-service basis should be modified. Doctors should receive half their remuneration, as an idea, on the usual basis but the other half on a capitation basis for those enrolled. That would cut costs, provide an incentive for doctors to keep us well, provide better service and save money. Also we should change the use of hospitals. No longer should they be used for chronic care. Hospitals consume half our health budget, yet they should be used only for emergencies. Anyway, thank you very much for your attention. If I can answer any questions, I would be very pleased to do so.

The Chair: There are 30 minutes left. We will divide it into three and there will be ten minutes each, beginning with the Conservatives.

Mr Stockwell: Well, Mr Chairman, considering that Mr Whitestone is the person we brought in, I would be prepared to give up our time for the two other parties.

The Chair: Beginning with the Liberals, then.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Whitestone, I would like to just pursue a couple of your premises. When you talk about the Keynesian philosophy about going into a deficit position in recession and then paying it down in the out years, have you taken a look at where you think the economy is going, let's say over the next four years, and what the effect of this additional deficit of $7 billion to $8 billion—which is just a projection, and my feeling is that it is going to be higher than that anyway—have you given any thought to what that is going to do to the economy?

Mr Whitestone: One says sort of humorously that one should never make a forecast, particularly about the future. I usually treat long-term forecasting with a great deal of skepticism. I am not going to repeat for the third time the phrase I mentioned about the effect of debt, but I think we are going to have a very limited recovery at best. I do not see the legs on which an economic recovery can be sustained or very buoyant. Money supply growth has been very limited in both countries.

Governments are limited, certainly in the US, which has the biggest effect on our economy. Both federal and state governments in the US are under a tremendous burden of huge deficits. Next year, 31 states are going to have a budget deficit of $32 billion. Most state constitutions require a balanced budget, so they are limited both fiscally and monetarily. Capital spending is going to lag because utilization rates are so low and it no longer pays, for a kinds of reasons, which I can go into at some other point to expand a plant. Exports are diminishing because many countries are experiencing slower growth, so I think you are going to have, at best, a very sluggish growth.

If the problem really has been—and I have mentioned this repeatedly—too much debt, adding to the debt here certainly is not going to alleviate the situation, I do not think, and I am not anti-Keynesian at all. I think that at certain points it has been all right. I think part of the problem—and I was a Liberal, Mr Kwinter—was that when the Liberals were in power, they did not do what Keynes suggested, which is to reduce taxes and curb spending. I was very much taken aback by it because it was really what was called for.

Mr Kwinter: Could I just make another comment? In your remarks you also referred to the fact that corporate taxes are not really a tax on the corporation; they are a tax on the consumer. I just want to share with committee members a remark that David McCamus, president of Xerox Canada, said to me one time when he came to visit me as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology. He was being critical not just of you—you were not even in power at the time—he was being critical of government, and he said, "One of the things that government has to learn is that we do not pay tax; we collect tax." He said: "You put a tax on us, we charge it to our customers. Not only do we charge it to them, but we mark it up. We put it into our cost component as a tax and then we add our profit, and the only impact it has on us is that if it is so high that the export price makes us non-competitive, then we go somewhere else. But that is what you do to us. It isn't a hardship on us per se. It isn't as if you are saying to us, 'We're taking the money out of our pocket and paying the tax.' We just pay it along."

I think that is a very significant statement that all of us should consider because I had never really thought of that way myself. I have to admit that. But when you think about it, that is what happens.

Mr Phillips: I would not mind having your comment on the capital fund proposal in the budget. The government's plan is to set up the fund and just pay the interest on the fund as, I personally think, a kind of a new way of taking the deficit down. Have you examined the capital fund and do you have any thoughts on it?

Mr Whitestone: I write a newspaper column, Mr Phillips. John White was the Treasurer here, I guess, about 15 or 18 years ago, and he said he always liked that idea. I think the trouble with the idea is you really cannot delineate what is capital spending and what is ordinary spending. I mean, school spending; what is school? Is that capital investment? Is hiring more teachers a capital investment? The problem is the whole line becomes so fuzzy that you really cannot do it.

The overall objection to it is that whether it is capital spending or ordinary spending, the net result is the deficits are higher and interest payments on the debt have to be met, so even if it is really for something you and I might consider beneficial, the old idea of a road so the farmer can bring his or her product to market more easily, in the long run the cost of that, the interest payments, have to be sustained. Even if you call it justified, and a lot of capital spending is, the problem right now is too much debt, so no matter what the reason for it is, having added to the debt burden is not a solution.

I like the idea because it would mean we could forget it but you cannot, for the reasons I mentioned.

Mr Phillips: Do we keep going for our 15 minutes? Is that it, or do you want to skip around?

The Chair: If you have no questions, I will move to the next and give you time at the end.

Mr Phillips: I have a question, but I prefer to keep the one.

Mr B. Ward: It is easier to keep tabs.

Mr Phillips: I would prefer not to set a precedent where the NDP goes last every time throughout the hearings.

Mr Sutherland: It will rotate, will it not, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Okay. If that is the case, then I will go to Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: Your presentation was interesting, although your comments about the coal miners did not seem to make a lot of sense to me. The fact that people just do not use as much coal is also one of the reasons. They have gone to more environmentally friendly methods, or what has appeared to be that. More effective and efficient methods are also one of the reasons we have such fewer numbers.

Nowhere in your presentation did you say where you thought the budget should be. Should it be a balanced budget? Should there be a deficit? What level should that be at? You mentioned freezing civil servants' wage increases. I think the Treasurer said last week when he was here that if they had been frozen, that still would not have made a significant dent. We still would have been left with a deficit of probably $7.5 billion or $8 billion by doing that, so I would be interested in knowing where those cuts should come from besides that and where you think the deficit should be.

Mr Whitestone: Well, let's go back. I do not want to linger on the coal miners thing. I do not know the numbers, and I would not try bluffing, but I would think coal consumption is not down 90% in the last 50 years. The reason we have more efficient production is that it became more profitable to invest in machinery than in workers. For example, let's just mention something. I am old enough to remember when there used to be elevator operators. I do not think a new building built today has an elevator operator, because wage increases have been such that it pays to have automated elevators. So excessive wage increases in the long run entail the need for a more efficient means to utilize dollars.

Where should the budget deficit be? I have no idea. All I know is that you have one that is higher than it has been, even adjusting for inflation, in any other recession. It is roughly triple what it was in the previous recession. I guess the recession is a little bit higher. The cost of living is up maybe 30% or 40% since 1982, so if you take $3 billion and add roughly even 50%, it would make it around $4.5 billion; I do not know, just as a rough rule of thumb.

How would you cut back? Well, I could keep you here for ever. As you may know, I was economic adviser to Bob Nixon. The question always came up, and Bob and I talked about it. Where do you begin? You begin with government activities it should not be performing at all. Have any gone through Terminal 3? Terminal 3 is large and privately owned. There are all kinds of activities government should not be doing and it is involved in them.

A very simple one, which I hope will be non-partisan: What does it cost to feed and keep an inmate in a prison today? I do not know, $40,000 or $50,000 a year? Does anybody doubt the private sector could not do that more efficiently? That should be an objective. Why could it not be done more efficiently?

Road construction should be handled differently than it is today. There should be tenders for all kinds of things.

The health care budget is totally out of control. I think we have a marvellous health care system. My eldest son is a surgeon. I am very aware of it, but I think you have to change the way you spend money on health care. About four years ago I brought in somebody to Murray Elston, who was the Minister of Health in the early part of the government. Dorothy Hall and I had all kinds of proposals to Mr Elston on how the health care budget should be cut back, not that you want to reduce services, because nobody wants to do that, but the program is totally out of control.

School budgets: When I was a candidate, I went around everywhere and pointed out how school spending is totally out of control. School buildings are not utilized all year round. You have too many administrators in the system. I could go on for ever, but I want to share roughly what I had in mind. I do not want to take too long to answer your question.

Mr Sutherland: I do not think anyone disagrees with you about the health care system. It has been clearly mentioned in the budget that the system has not been managed and that we all have a responsibility. I think all parties agree we have a responsibility to start managing the system.

I want also just to ask you another question in terms of the generalization you made about the private sector being able to do things more efficiently in targeting resources. I guess my sense, though, is that in a recession the private sector has said it is not going to do it. So if the government does not do it, who is going to do it? In other words, the sense is that in this time the government can target the specific areas to jump-start certain parts of the economy to get it going. For example, the anti-recession spending in the infrastructure for capital will get the construction industry going, because that is the one that has been hardest hit; that type of thing, the ripple impact of doing that. Someone has to kick-start it. The private sector is not; so are you saying if it is not going to, government should not either?

Mr Whitestone: I mentioned the analogy of the half-frozen man, that public spending usually goes on the construction industry and it is like putting a half-frozen man in front of a red-hot stove. What you are really doing—and I recognize the need for infrastructure, and this is rather textbook—is letting wages in that particular sector get out of line. There is so much activity channelled there that if you and I want to build a house, we find that wages are out of line, and in the long run it is not productive.

What should the government be doing? I do not think the answer has to be that. I am not anti-Keynesian at all, but the approach should be to encourage profits, to encourage people to move here. Look at what Hong Kong has done. If you had lower taxes here, if, for example, you reduced the capital gains tax on manufacturing activity—let's say you and I started a manufacturing company, and this was the one province in Canada that did not have a capital gains tax on a manufacturing enterprise. Does anyone doubt that this would not encourage people to start here? I think it would.

So rather than kick-start capital spending, which often, frankly, occurs at the wrong time—it takes so long to get a project going, by the time you have it going, you are usually out of the recession. You know, you have to get an engineer, an architect and a planner to build a bridge, and all that does not happen by tomorrow. By the time you get it under way in a year and half, it usually, almost always, occurs after the recession is over.

Mr Sutherland: If I may just follow up, in this case, since you said recovery is going to be that much slower, then the $700-million anti-recession spending which is to be spent before the end of this capital year is a good way of doing it because it is being done while things are still going, or while the recession is still having a major impact.

Mr Whitestone: Yes. That part I would not object to, except the overall comment which I made. The problem is the overall size of the debt and the fact the debt is taking so much out of the economy that the economy cannot survive. Normally I would agree with you, but I think with the problem being debt, it is counterproductive right now.

Mr B. Ward: I do not think you answered Kimble's question, though, on where you feel the budget should be. During these tough times, should it have been a balanced budget?

Mr Whitestone: No, I thought I did indicate it.

Mr B. Ward: I did not quite hear you.

Mr B. Ward: I thought I said, just as a rough rule of thumb, adjusted for inflation, maybe $4.5 billion, I do not know.

Mr B. Ward: A $4.5 billion deficit.

Mr Whitestone: Yes. I think we made a mistake in the 1980s in not having surpluses built up which would have reduced the deficit. Then you could have more easily survived a budget deficit. I would not like a balanced budget right now. I think it would have been very difficult to achieve.

Mr B. Ward: You are an economist and I am assuming you have studied other countries' economies. Which one do you feel is the best role model at this time, recognizing Canada as a basket case because of the federal policies?

Mr Whitestone: I think we are a unique country therefore I am not going to follow the scare tactics.

Mr B. Ward: Which one would you say?

Mr Whitestone: I would like to borrow from various countries. I know you would like me to say Sweden, but Sweden has become a basket case itself. I would like to borrow from a lot of countries. I like what Hong Kong and Singapore have done and, to some extent, Japan, which somehow has a directed economy. I think we are a unique country, therefore I would like to borrow from various countries.

Mr B. Ward: What about the American economy?

Mr Whitestone: No. I think the American economy is guilty of the same kind of surfeit of debt that we have had and there are other things about the American economy I do not like—its health care system, which is even more outrageous than ours. No, I think government spending is a much lower percentage of gross national product than ours, but I think there are other things which are missing there, their infrastructure—

Mr B. Ward: So you do not really have a favourite? You would rather take a look at the benefits of a number of economies.

Mr Whitestone: I like Switzerland and what it has done with education. It has done a marvellous job with education, but I think we are a unique country. Do you want to follow one country versus another? No. I like a lot of things about Switzerland, for example, which has such a unique educational system. I would like to borrow their educational system. I would like to borrow other countries' work ethic.

Mr B. Ward: Turning to education, as you mentioned, I think that is an important issue, and it seems to be with you because you have stressed a need for an educated workforce here in Ontario, and in Canada for that matter. There is no denying that. In Ontario, do you feel there should be cutbacks in education, there should be expenditures or there should be greater usage of existing resources? Somehow I think you will say the third one.

Mr Whitestone: No, not at all. For example, I recall that in Wellington county they are building a new $5-million headquarters building. I would like somebody to get rid of those kinds of outlays, which I think are unnecessary with new kinds of telephones and communication. I think the dollar should be used much more efficiently.

Mr B. Ward: Greater use of the physical structure out there.

Mr Whitestone: Yes. That should be used more efficiently. I have talked to teachers—and you can too; I am sure you have—and you find that the administrative overhead is excessive. I think school boards really have not utilized personnel efficiently. I would like facilities to be used year-round. After all, the long summer holiday is a legacy of when we were an agricultural economy. Why on earth in a child not be going to school for 11 months of the year? Now teachers maybe need relief. For heaven's sake, I think I would eliminate some of the paperwork teachers are burdened by. I know they are, because I have talked to them, and I think we are not utilizing resources efficiently at all.

Other countries spend less of the GNP than Canada does on education and have a better educational system. George Bush, who is not my favourite person by a long way, mentions that point and I think it is a valid point. We spend a bigger share of GNP on education than a lot of other countries, but we do not utilize the resources efficiently. Look at what Switzerland does, and if you want, some day I will tell you about it. They spend much less and they have a much better educational system.

The Chair: Mr Ward, you have about three minutes left and then Ms Ward would like to have a question, and Mr Christopherson as well.

Mr B. Ward: Are we using up all our time? I will pass, then. I was going to talk about wages.

The Chair: There are about three minutes left.

Ms M. Ward: I thought we were rotating. No?

Mr Kwinter: We are rotating on how you are going to use up all the time. If you use up all the time, there is nothing to rotate.

Mr B. Ward: I will pass, then.

Ms M. Ward: I wanted to ask you about inflation and the GST. First, a quick question about inflation. Do you think it has really been a serious problem in the last couple of years?

1050

Mr Whitestone: I am a bit sceptical on the actual numbers—and I think anybody who goes shopping knows that numbers really do not totally reflect inflation—because there are property taxes, school taxes. I think the basket of goods is not misrepresentative but I think inflation is more of a deep-seated problem than we recognize. When you have inflation with the kind of numbers we have today—goodness gracious, in the 1970s Richard Nixon imposed wage and price controls when we were having 4% inflation, and we have more than that now—I think it is a problem.

Ms M. Ward: You do think it is a problem and has been for a few years.

Mr Whitestone: Yes.

Ms M. Ward: The other question is basically about the GST and taxes in general. I gather from your comments you felt the GST was a good type of tax. Is that the right interpretation? I cannot recall exactly what you said.

Mr Whitestone: I do not think I said that.

Ms M. Ward: What is your feeling on the GST, and what type of tax do you feel is the most efficient and most fair?

Mr Whitestone: I do not like the GST as a tax right now because I think it is giving the federal government more resources, which it should not be having. Generally, I do not like regressive taxes.

Ms M. Ward: Do you not think the GST is a regressive tax?

Mr Whitestone: Yes. I do not like regressive taxes and I think the GST is that kind of tax. On the other hand, I like to stimulate capital investment and cut back a little bit on consumption, so I have a mixed opinion on it. I think the best solution—if you are asking me my ideal solution, and if I were dictator of Ontario, which you are probably glad I am not—the solution I would propose right now, if you did it selectively, would be to cut back on manufacturing, capital gains, taxes like that. That is what I would like to do. I have a mixed opinion on it. I would not have imposed the GST when they did.

Ms M. Ward: Is it simply a question of timing, though? Do you think it was the wrong time?

Mr Whitestone: It was the wrong time. I think it was a complicated tax that could have been simplified and I think the federal government reneged on its promise to cut back other taxes, which other countries have done when they imposed that kind of tax. If they had cut back on other taxes such as personal taxes when they imposed the GST I would have been much more willing to accept it. That was the original premise on which it was presented.

Ms M. Ward: Actually, in the paper this week it said that, for the mythical family of four, I think the increase in taxes since 1984 was about $1,500.

Mr Whitestone: Originally, Michael Wilson promised he would cut back on personal taxes. He did not even reduce the surtax on it. I find that part objectionable.

Mr Phillips: I think the government would say: "Well, you are overly worried about the deficit and the debt. The debt, as a percentage of revenue, never gets below 150%. The public debt interest as a percentage of revenue just creeps up slowly to 12.5%. Why be overly worried about that?" As you look at those numbers, what is your feeling on that?

Mr Whitestone: My own feeling is that the marketplace has a reaction, that no matter what you say, compared to historical record the cumulative effect of the debt we have now means that interest rates here—I mean real interest rates—are unbelievably high. If we have inflation at roughly 4% or 5% and you look at long-term rates—what are mortgage rates now, 11% or 11.25%—you have real interest rates around 5% or 6% compared to the average we used to have, the historical average interest rate of 3%.

The market is saying, "The cumulative effect of all the debt we have built up for the past 40 or 50 years is so worrisome that people want double the real rate of return that historically we have had." It is twice what it should be because the cumulative effect is so bad.

Mr Stockwell: I would like a little more discussion on the out years. The government has held up this Keynesian theory that deficit financing is the best way to fight a recession. You could almost buy the argument that you could run a $10-billion deficit in the first year if you were talking about a recession that is supposed to end in the next 12 months, which I think the government has said. In fact, I think we were supposed to be spinning out of the recession right now. I do not see it happening, but that is what their people said, that in the summer we would be spinning out.

How then can the justification be made that we would have to run horrendous deficits—and I classify them as horrendous deficits—in the following three years? If we were really dealing with this theory that the government has put forward on Keynesian economics, should we not be looking at surpluses to pay down the deficit that we absorbed in the first year of their four-year plan?

Mr Whitestone: I looked it up quickly while you were talking. I said here on page 4: "It is very disturbing that the Ontario Treasurer projects continued deficits of about $7 billion to $8 billion at least until 1995. The rationalization for such big deficits in the out years simply does not exist." I think that is the thing to which I take the biggest exception. Your comment is one for which I find the least justification. There is none that I can find. If the economy expands, as the Treasurer implies, roughly 3% in a year or two from now, I cannot understand that and I think that is a part which I find indefensible.

Mr Stockwell: The other point I would like to examine is this: In the five years the Liberals were in power, they assumed $10 billion of new debt. It seems unbelievable to me that during that period of time the government could absorb $10 billion, and the government today has said that is one of the main reasons we are in this particular situation. They have often said, "If you people had managed the province better, more wisely, we would not have to absorb some $10 billion in deficit this year alone." What are your thoughts on that?

Mr Whitestone: Without being embarrassed, I think that in the five years of the Liberal government, they did things which may have been justified for social reasons, like eliminating OHIP premiums, but the lag effect is that, in part, it led to our problem. I think governments have always made mistakes. You can go back for 20 or 30 years federally too. I think it would have been better if we had had a balanced budget for some of the years when Ontario had the most prosperous interlude in its history. That would have been a far more appropriate economic policy. To some extent, that is the cause of the particular budget deficit we have today.

Mr Stockwell: Lastly, there has been some talk the government suggested that during the early 1980s when the Conservatives were in power it ran a deficit itself in fact. I believe there is a great difference between the early 1980s deficit the Conservatives ran and the early 1990s deficit the NDP is running. The difference I have pointed out was that in certain circumstances there were tax holidays offered—in essence, incentives—which caused the deficit, or helped cause some of the deficit in the early 1980s, as opposed to spending increases that have caused the deficit now in the early 1990s.

Do you have any comment on how the two deficits were arrived at? If you were going to run a deficit, which would be more preferable in your opinion?

Mr Whitestone: I cannot remember the breakdown of the 1970s deficits, which were really basically more a percentage of Ontario gross national product, but I think I would much rather have one based on incentives. I mentioned briefly that Ontario removed the sales tax on cars in the 1970s for half a year; I think that is by far the preferable way of doing it than spending.

The trouble with spending is that even with the best intentions, it really is so diffuse and so often inappropriate that it does not work. It leads to log rolling and things like that. To answer your question, yes, I would much prefer incentives to spending because those incentives provide more opportunity for the marketplace to function.

Mr Stockwell: I put a lot of stock in the percentage of tax as a proportion of the GDP for the province in the number because I believe that is how much money you are sucking out of the economy, that you are not leaving in the economy to be reinvested or create wealth, jobs, etc.

I have examined past budgets and the numbers, and in the early 1980s to mid-1980s, we were taking about 14%. We are now in excess of 16%. It seems to me that is going to be very telling for the private sector or for anyone who is interested in investing, knowing full well that you are taking literally billions of dollars more out of the economy some 10 years later in the projected budget they are talking about.

It still leaves them with a reasonable amount of money spent on servicing the debt, or servicing the deficit. They are saying 18 cents or 14 cents as opposed to 11, etc. It does not seem that onerous, but when you examine how much more money they are sucking out of the economy, that is what I think the important number is. Could there be any credence given to that?

Mr Whitestone: I think that is right, Mr Stockwell. I think the other point, which I mentioned in my presentation too, is that if you look at what they talk about, spending increases and tax revenues, they are implying very strongly, are almost saying that they are going to have to increase taxes by 4% because if spending increases are 10%, revenue increases are going to increase 90% of 7% which is 6.3%, so they are saying they are going to increase taxes 3.7% a year anyway on top of all that. I think that is worrisome. The thing has a snowball effect. Interest payments are added to the budget deficit, so year after year you are compounding the problem.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Whitestone, for your presentation this morning.

MICHAEL McCracken

The Chair: Our next presentation is by Michael McCracken, the president of Informetrica. Welcome back to the finance and economic affairs committee, Mr McCracken.

Mr McCracken: I was not going to say anything, but I guess I have to start. Given the challenge that has been set for you to explain to the public what is happening out there, it perhaps behooves you to have at least a starting point, some clarification of what economists think is happening, because presumably you are going to be trying to do that, so I may pick up on a few of the points of Mr Whitestone just to provide some clarification.

Very quickly, though, just as a backdrop, let us see if we can accept a few facts. I will put them forward as facts and then you can query them.

First, Ontario has been in a deep recession, one in which the unemployment rate has risen from an average of 6.1% in 1989 to 6.3% in 1990 and now appears headed towards 10% for this year.

Real economic growth in the province has probably declined, both in 1990 and again in 1991, welfare rolls are up and bankruptcies are up. There is also some evidence at least that Ontario entered early and was in this recession, certainly in the manufacturing sector and perhaps in other parts of the economy, from September 1989 on with the rising unemployment rate starting at that time.

The second thing we can perhaps agree on is what was done in the budget. Again, I am just trying to make sure we start with a base. The way I read the budget, there were a series of tax moves on the indirect tax side and personal income tax side, raising some $1 billion in additional revenue on a full year basis, some $670 million over the fiscal year at hand, perhaps offset, depending on how you do your arithmetic, with the parallel application of the provincial sales tax not taxing the goods and services tax, an amount estimated to have provided an implicit tax cut of some $470 million.

There were also expenditure increases in a number of sectors: in particular, some $2 billion in discretionary actions, a number of those aimed at capital formation both in the highways area and special infrastructure areas.

One can dispute the numbers, although I suspect you are talking about the numbers to the right of the decimal rather than the left, making up some gap that was created in part by federal government cutbacks on established programs financing of some $1.6 billion in 1990-91, and of course dealing with the earlier cutbacks of some $1.9 billion in earlier years. If you take this view, then you are left with a rough assessment of about $6.5 billion as a deficit that would have been there, let us say, for cyclical reasons, deteriorating from about $3 billion in the previous period.

What could have been done? One option obviously—one always considered, at least for a moment—is to do nothing. That leaves you with roughly an $8-billion deficit. That leaves you with no momentum or optimism injected into the system and no increments or changes on the infrastructure side.

You could take the levers and push them back in the other direction—cutbacks to the deficit by tax increases, expenditure cuts, etc—either to maintain the 1990-91 level, the roughly $3-billion deficit, or to take it back to zero or whatever numbers one wants to conjecture. The costs would be increased job loss and deeper recession.

You could have done a third thing, which was to stimulate, and stimulate more than has been done, 2% to 3% of GDP, a real kickstart to the system rather than the modest stimulus that was put into the system. Again, one looks for the opportunities to do that. One looks also at the absorptive capacity of the system on infrastructure and makes a judgement. What you saw in the budget presumably was the net effect of all that.

As we discuss this, I think it would be useful, when you are talking about the deficit or thinking about it, to put it in a slightly different way, which would be to presume for the moment that we have had one of these efficiency gains that are alleged to be out there in the operations of government, whether that be school boards somehow working better or doctors working harder or discovering or stumbling across that alleged roomful of civil servants who are doing nothing. Let's say that as a result of that you found $1 billion. You have discovered $1 billion of requirements you no longer have or, if you really want to play the mental game, the federal government relents and gives you back $1 billion on EPF or Canada Assistance plan. Now the question mark is what to do with that.

Is the best thing you can think of at this point in time, with the economy in the state it is at, to reduce the deficit? Is that what you would do, essentially say: "We are not going to borrow $10 billion. We are going to borrow $9 billion"? Or would you say, "No, what I am going to do is cut taxes by $1 billion at this juncture, leaving the deficit unchanged"? Or would you raise expenditures by $1 billion and, if so, on what—infrastructure, human capital formation or on other needs?

In some sense, that might be a useful exercise to go through, because in fact that is the exercise you are doing at the margin each time. When you have a change in a revenue forecast, a new requirement that comes up, you ask the question, "Should I fund this new requirement immediately by taxes? Should I do so by debt?" and so on.

Just as quick—I would not call them corrections—amplifications or redirections or additional observations on some of Mr Whitestone's points, he put forward a view that the Keynesian view of how the world works has failed. I suggest to you that is not true. It has been amply demonstrated, as recently as the oil price shock we all received in August and September, that if you take money out of people's pockets you do cause an economic slowdown which in the case of the United States tips it into a recession and in the case of Canada pushes us from a mild made-in-Canada recession to a rip-roaring recession where the betting now is on whether this will last as long and be as deep as the 1981-82 recession.

I think if you want to look for failure, it would be the failure of some levels of government, under some circumstances, to use what they know appropriately; in other words, a failure to act, allowing unemployment rates to continue to rise to levels which were unheard of a decade ago, for reasons which still I find difficult to understand politically.

The second point is that there is much concern and hand-wringing about debt and debt ratios, usually with the federal debt ratio roughly 50% or some 40%, not the 15% or so of provincial GDP represented by the Ontario ratio, but nevertheless hand-wringing over that.

Let me suggest to you that what you are observing with the high debt ratio is not the problem but rather a symptom of a difficulty and a symptom of the kind of policy setting you are operating under. It is arithmetic to show that changes in debt ratios essentially are dictated by two things: first, what kind of primary deficit you are running—that is, what you are doing on your program of spending versus your revenues—and, second, the difference between interest rates and the growth in the economy you are operating in. You can do that in terms of nominal interest rates and nominal growth or real interest rates and real growth—it is the same thing.

If real interest rates exceed real growth you have a problem. This applies not just to provincial governments, not just to federal governments, but to any debtor. The flip side of that is any asset holder who is getting a return in excess of the growth of the pie will find itself getting a larger and larger share of the asset side. The problem, then, must have something to do with the relationship between real interest rates and real growth.

If you examine Canada's history—in fact, for that matter, the history of most of the developed countries—you come back with a variety of signals. One, though, in the postwar period is a period, from the mid-1940s to 1979-80, in which real interest rates were less than real growth. In that environment debt was not a problem in any jurisdiction, nor was it for corporations, nor was it for individuals. The reason for that is that you could grow your way out of a situation in which you had liabilities because your growth exceeded the servicing costs, if you will, on the debt.

Since 1980, particularly in Canada, we have chosen a monetary policy that says: "No, we're going to run under a different set of rules. This set of rules is going to penalize the buildup of debt," and we have done so. Debt ratios have risen, starting in 1975 to 1980 because of a weak economy but post-1980 because of the debt ratio. That has got particularly bad in the last couple of years with the very high interest rates that are in place.

The question mark is, what do you do down at this level where you do not control interest rates in this kind of environment? It boils down to where you think the world is going. The federal government, in its budget, is telling you real interest rates are coming down and debt ratios are stabilizing, certainly way below the levels in the 1990-91 period. It suggests, at least in this environment, that you may well be, with some caution obviously, less likely to be entering an explosive situation than you might have been a year or two ago in running up an increased debt; ie, your debt stability should not be jeopardized by the fact that you are running a deficit.

I will not say any more on the inefficient government side, other than to simply point out in passing that presumably all of us in this room, regardless of political connection, are always interested in more efficient government. That we should take as a given. We should work always to improve it, but it seems to me to be a major red herring in discussions associated with the deficit or with the budget, unless one can point out particular or obvious items.

On the public works side, in terms of infrastructure bidding up prices, you might want to check the facts on that, check with your public works department. Ask them what has been happening to bid prices on highway construction that they have been putting forward in the last several months. My information suggests that they are coming in below their budget, that they are able to do more real construction than they had anticipated and that there is no evidence of this great overheating of construction out there. In fact, it demonstrates that this may be a particularly opportune time to get more miles of highway for your dollar than is typically the case, which would suggest the timing on the additional highway construction may be particularly good.

I will make very little comment about the notion that somehow our standards on things like pay equity or other issues should be dictated by the lowest of our trading partners. I note in the morning paper that Conrad Black wanted to buy some assets in Australia. I say fine.

Also, let me make one or two quick observations with regard to this notion that somehow we are concerned about these out-year budget numbers and beating our chest about it. It seems to me the Treasurer could have avoided causing you that upset by simply not publishing them. Would you have felt better? My response would be perhaps not. Alternatively, he could have put out some numbers that had some arbitrary tax increases built in. We could have assumed, for example, a retail tax increase of 1% or 2% per year in each of the next four years and that would have made the numbers look "better." Obviously, as the time rolled around for the next budgets, little matter could have been reconsidered and adjusted as necessary.

You might laugh at that, but do not forget that is precisely what the federal government did with some of its increases in the federal sales tax. The Conservatives found after castigating the Liberals in 1984 for the increase in the manufacturers' sales tax that was scheduled in October 1984, that when they came in it was sitting there like a little time bomb. Having criticized it substantially, they found it convenient to go ahead and continue with it at that juncture. But that was purposefully there to make the numbers different in the future.

It would have been possible, through economic assumptions, to also make the numbers look a lot better than you see. That, it seems to me, is a third possibility. I suggest to you, at least from our analysis of the provincial economy, that this option was not taken either. If anything I find the growth forecasts low for 1992, 1993 and 1994 on the presumption that we get some sort of an economic recovery under way. I think what you saw there was the best shot at the time. Yes, sure enough, with no policy change and with an economy that is moving back toward potential but making slow progress in getting back to where you were in 1988-89, there may well be some continued deficits as are portrayed there. Again, I am not clear that one should panic or, as some apparently are doing, leave Ontario as a result.

In terms of this notion of a half-frozen man in front of a stove, I do not fully understand the analogy, but I guess what we are hearing is that rather than try to warm the person up we should just put him back in the deep freezer and leave him there.

Those complete my formal, and perhaps informal, observations. Let me throw it open and try to answer any questions you wish to put to me.

Mr Christopherson: I want to thank Mike for his presentation. Even when he is not agreeing with us, I always enjoy his presentations and the way he puts things and the frankness he has.

I would very much like to hear your thoughts, Mike, on something Mr Whitestone touched on, the separation of the capital and the operating budgets, which has had some attention, but probably not as much as it deserves. Mr Whitestone pointed out some of the difficulties he has with it. I would appreciate your point of view on that, please.

Mr McCracken: Businesses run on a capital budget. They do capitalize expenditures on things which last more than a year. There is a notion that somehow you cannot figure out what is capital and what is operating. This should not be a challenge for anyone. It is done every day by millions of people in business. It is arbitrary, and there is an incentive to do it in particular ways, given tax laws, but it can be done.

What do you get for it? You get a somewhat different appreciation. You get an appreciation that these things you spend on today have a value that lasts longer than a year. How much longer? That depends on how long the thing you spent on lasts.

That brings up the problem with this for government, that you cannot do capital budgeting without also doing depreciation accounting. If you do depreciation accounting, what you will observe—at least at the federal level where we in fact do capital budgeting in the national accounts, and for that matter, at the provincial level, where it is done—is that the depreciation allowance is about as much as the capital spending currently going on. So when you get it all done and you look at it, you kind of scratch your head and say, “Why did I do this?” It has not helped your presentation in the sense of what is going on all that much at the macro level.

It does help you, though, in understanding, and saying, “Look, this dollar we are spending today has a different value than this dollar on current expenses today, because we will be getting some ongoing benefit from this capital item.” I do not discourage you from doing it, but do not expect it to be any kind of panacea, or to provide you any fundamental change in the way the world works.

If it makes it look more businesslike, if you can compare your investment, and if you can make some allowance in your mind for the need to keep investment and upgrade it, great, because we ought to be doing capital budgeting thinking about our infrastructure so we do not run it up and down like a yo-yo and say, “This year we will not spend anything on roads because we need to save and make it look better,” or, “Maybe we can spend it all on roads this year.” Having some capital plan in that area could be very useful.

One final quick comment is that an additional thing you want to do—and you can do this whether you do the accounting this way or not; it behooves governments, I think, and to some extent they do this—to always think of having on the shelf capital plans you are able to do, and where you then make a judgement about whether to speed up or slow down these capital plans, based on the economic conditions. It is very good contra-cyclical policy to have a shelf on which you have some projects—well thought through, designed, planning, costed out, benefit costs of these done on them, so you are doing them efficiently, ready to go. When you run into cyclical downturns your reaction time can be shortened in terms of when you do it, or if you are heading into an overheated economy where you will keep putting them on the shelf, but not try to build at the peak period of economic activity, exacerbating the difficulties.

I am sorry to make that so long, but there were two or three different concepts there I wanted to get across.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate that; thank you.

Mr Phillips: I was interested in your comment on the depreciation, because you probably do not agree with the capital fund as they plan to set it up, which is to just pay the interest and put everything off for years. You would argue then in favour—because they say they need at least $5 billion a year to just keep the infrastructure rolling—of some sort of accounting that showed that as a depreciation expense or something.

Mr McCracken: You would show your new capital investment as an increase in assets. You would then be making a judgement about the rate at which that depreciates, and that depreciation would be a current expenditure. If you are trying to see if you are in some sense balancing your operations at a corporate view, you would be looking for your operating expenses plus your depreciation to be in some sense covered by your revenue. But that does allow you in some periods to be increasing your capital more rapidly than your depreciation allowances, and in other periods you perhaps would be doing it less.

The big advantage of the capital budgeting is that you simply recognize it as a multi-year exercise, and you also have people in government recognizing that, yes, this kind of an expenditure is multi-year and has some value over a number of years and is different than spending that dollar on a one-year basis. You do not have people doing silly things like leasing cars rather than buying them, because it has less effect on their budget.

Mr Phillips: You have looked at the capital fund, then?

Mr McCracken: I have not looked at the particular one in this program in detail, but in the national accounts of Canada, we essentially do separate current and capital and put in a depreciation allowance for the federal and provincial governments.

Mr Phillips: I would appreciate your comments on it.

Mr McCracken: Sure, I will be happy to take a look at it and respond.

Mr Kwinter: Mr McCracken, I would like to pursue the concept of the true Keynesian policy that in the downturn you prime the pump by providing capital projects on the assumption that when the economy rebounds, you can then pay down whatever deficits you have incurred in the recession years.

In theory that seems to make sense, and for a while it was quite accepted as a basic economic concept that this is something you should do. How does that react when you have a situation where there is a basic restructuring going on? We have a situation with the systemic problems built in with globalization of trade, with the fact that companies that would normally be laying off people in recessions and hiring them back when the economy rebounds, are now saying: "We are shutting down. We are not coming back." How does that impact on the whole concept?

Mr McCracken: I think they are two separable issues. Let us look at the kind of investments you might want to make at the present time in a world that is restructuring. I think governments are certainly challenged to say, "Hey, in this kind of world, do we really want to do things the way we did in the past, or is there some spending we should be doing that will make us better able to cope with this restructured world?"

One obvious area that comes up quite often is both education and training, that focusing in that area may have a payoff in one form or the other. Other comments come up sometimes in certain kinds of infrastructure that we may have, or need, that we have not developed adequately as in the past.

The second question would then come up at this particular point in the cycle: Should we finance these additional expenditures by parallel tax increases, by cutting expenditure in other areas, or should we be prepared to postpone that financing or redirection of expenditures to a later date and, in a sense, deficit finance during the period? In some sense, that is the Keynesian issue of willingness to run a deficit. So that model or mental framework would apply, regardless of what the target was for your expenditures you were undertaking in the same way that you could say, "I have a set of expenditures I want to do over here for social equity."

Again, the issue might well be one of, do I deficit finance those, do I put in place charges that will cover those today, or do I build up a fund before the fact and then trigger the spending later, which is what has been done on occasions in other countries in a sort of foreview of a Keynesian framework? Sweden, for example, for years had an investment fund which was built up in hot times and was, in a sense, disgorged during weak times, the purpose being in some sense to provide contra-cyclical policy.

You can separate that from the quality or the kinds of expenditures that might be needed. There is nothing in the Keynesian world that says you can only raise welfare payments and in some other world over here you are spending on research and development. That is just not necessarily the case. There are sometimes differences in terms of the speed with which you can get something off the mark, and there is also a question of whether you can start and stop something.

For example, in a restructuring program you may well not be making a commitment for one year but a long-term commitment if you are talking about doubling certain kinds of education or making a major commitment on training. You can still come back and say, "Okay, I am going to fund that eventually," or "I am going to fund now." That is in some sense the question you are going to be making on your choice of deficit financing at this particular juncture, and presumably that is going to be done on the basis of some view of the macro economy or, in this case, the overall provincial economy and what you think you can do to help that along.

Mr Kwinter: In your remarks you felt there was probably a discretionary amount of about $2 billion in the budget. Everything else was in there because of the system.

Mr McCracken: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: In other remarks you made right after the budget was announced you felt that maybe they had not had a big enough deficit and should probably be spending more money. Where would you see those more eyes being spent and at what level?

Mr McCracken: I appreciate the problem and how much more is always an issue. Certainly some more on the infrastructure side is warranted. One certainly comes away with a sense that the roads and bridges are ongoing requirements. There have been some identified shortfalls in the roads and highways system of Canada and a good number of that is in Ontario. A number of studies have been made identifying specific improvements that in fact could be made there. Those are the kinds of things where you have done some thinking ahead, you have the opportunity to move, and whether you build Highway 416 in 2000 versus 1995 or 1993 or 1992 seems to me an element of flexibility. That would certainly be an area where more could be done.

In terms of pump priming, I guess a signal which might have been a useful one—and again this was a bit contentious, no doubt, but it would not have disturbed me—is to see a 1%-2% reduction in the retail sales tax put in place for a year, or for the balance of the year, as a message to have some confidence, get out there and spend. We both know, of course, that others had thought of the idea earlier and had suggested it and perhaps poisoned the well for a time, although perhaps there will be an opportunity—let's hope not—to do that later. That would have been a pure Keynesian stimulus to the system. It would have been a straightforward move but it would certainly have helped the sector which is under a lot of strain and would have gone some distance—although it would have been better if the timing had been 1 January—to sterilize the inflationary impact of the GST, a one-time inflationary shock by offsetting it with a one-time deflationary shock. Perhaps it would have kept the kind of damage that appears to have been done to consumer confidence in the first few months of 1991 from occurring, at least in Ontario. Again, even Ontario being large enough, it would have softened the blow for all of Canada and been a plus in that regard.

There are a couple of areas where I think we could have spent another $1 billion at the margin that would have had some appropriate shocks and had the advantage of either bringing forward in time expenditures that will be required in any case, fitting the notion then that if you build the roads today you will not build them again tomorrow, or in the case of the retail sales tax change being reversible at some future date when the economic situation has changed; that would again fit with the notion of not making these things long-term, everlasting commitments.

Mr Kwinter: How much time do I have?

The Chair: You have about one minute.

Mr McCracken: I will be very brief on my response as well.

Mr Kwinter: I do not know if I can be very brief on my question; that is the problem. The concern I have is that I got the feeling the people at Treasury felt they were playing politician, or maybe the politicians were telling them to play politician. I got the feeling that as bad as the budget was going to be perceived, $10 billion was the magic number, that you did not dare go over 10 and kept it just under 10. It seems to me it was sort of artificially contrived, that if they truly wanted to deal with the problem they could have really expanded that number, and if they were not going to deal with it then they could have put it back. It was just a matter of coming up with a number that they felt, as bad as it was going to be, would be a number they could live with. Do you have any comment on that?

Mr McCracken: We sometimes get hung up on numbers and put magic numbers—$30 billion as the federal number at one stage; 66% approval rating in another environment; 10% unemployment rates—as being the triggers. There is not a lot of difference, in fact there is exactly $1 billion difference, between $9 billion and $10 billion and $10 billion and $11 billion, but there may have been some desire on that. You will have to explore with them in greater depth. Certainly I think the Bay Street signal was that $10 billion was a tolerable number. I guess they later reversed themselves, although perhaps it is just the fact that somehow they thought you could have $10 billion in one year and nothing in the out years that created their desire to march on the hill here.

I think, if anything, we are going to see those out years come down a bit and I think this year $9.7 billion may prove to have been a bit of a high estimate. It is still too early to tell, but there are at least finally a couple of little signals out there that suggest the US may be beginning to turn around and that we here may be starting to turn around. If that is the case, then I think the 3% decline that is projected in Ontario's gross domestic product for 1991, with a little luck, could be a little less than that. That will show up right on the revenue side and with some cuts on the expenditure side. We will see how it works out.

But $10 billion is a good starting point. If it had been $11 billion or $12 billion, maybe they would have been more tolerant of my suggestions to go to hell and go to $14 billion once you have got into double digits, and maybe I would not have been so critical of them for not doing enough.

Mr Stockwell: A question from your beginning statement: You said the GDP in Ontario declined in 1990.

Mr McCracken: In real terms it is my suspicion that it has. This is not a fact we can check because real GDP for Ontario, the way I read it, GDP at factored cost, is not officially published. We get some other rough numbers about two or three years behind the times, but our estimate is minus one and I think the Treasurer's was about zero.

Mr Stockwell: This fact that you put out is really a suspicion.

Mr McCracken: It is our estimate based on what historical information is available. It is certainly confirmed by the growth of the unemployment rate, which is a measured number.

Mr Stockwell: You made a number of comments regarding the out years. You still did not tell me exactly how you are going to pay back this $35-billion debt that has been incurred. In your case it would have been considerably higher if they had done what you suggested. Clearly you cannot keep absorbing deficit after deficit after deficit and not feel it.

Constantly, when I hear comments such as the ones you have been making, they totally avoid the payback periods. When is the payback period and how do you pay it back when you have all these needs you have begun servicing?

Mr McCracken: Most businesses and certainly many individuals find that they are never out of debt in their lifetime. They can pick up a mortgage at a young age on a house. They live in it for five years, move to another house and roll that mortgage over. They probably have a larger mortgage on the new house. This process continues in many cases for their entire lifetime, or at least up until some point when they retire, sell the house and walk away, paying down the debt at that stage.

Mr Stockwell: Do you believe that happens to most people?

Mr McCracken: I would say that would not be an unusual characteristic, that in a life cycle of an individual, debt would rise up through their 40s and 50s and they may begin to pay it down subsequently. If you look at that, the key issue a banker asks is not just what that debt is, but what is that debt relative to their capacity to service it? What does their income look like?

I think it is at that stage one begins to look at debt-income ratios and for items with perpetual life, where the life cycle model does not follow, ie, governments, or corporations for that matter, one looks at what is that situation, what is that debt ratio? On that basis, the province did make a lot of progress in the last 10 years. The debt ratio, at least as in the budget, was some 17% or 18% back in 1982-83. It was down to 14.4% in 1989-90. That period of prosperity did lead to a lowering of the debt ratio. In this particular budget the plan, in the middle of a deep recession, is that it goes up to something like 18.3% as a percentage of GDP.

Mr Stockwell: You are just simply sucking more taxes out of the system to get your debt ratio down, because your debt is continuing to rise. Under your scenario it is going to more than double in four years. Therefore, you have to suck more money out of—

Mr McCracken: We will see, because I think GDP will in fact start rising rather than declining.

Mr Stockwell: You think the GDP is going to rise greater than what they have suggested, inflation and GDP, nearly 7%?

Mr McCracken: Oh, yes.

Mr Stockwell: But they are still 4% short every year, so they have to increase taxes by at least another four points every single year.

Mr McCracken: Not increase tax rates; what you have to have is your revenue go up. Certainly in a period in which the economy is growing, you will have a revenue improvement.

Mr Stockwell: You are wrong. That is assumed in the nearly 7% they have built into their budget. Assuming economic growth and inflation, they are still 4% short or they need $8 billion in new dollars in taxes over the next four years to maintain a $35-billion debt.

Mr McCracken: A $35-billion debt, but not a debt ratio of 18%. The denominator will be growing in current dollars on the order of, I would say, something in the 6%, 7%, 8% or 9% range, so if you did nothing and kept your deficit constant, then your deficit as a share of GDP would be falling. If you kept your debt growing by roughly 15% of the GDP, you would again find your debt ratio not changing.

Mr Stockwell: But according to their numbers, their ratio of debt, or the amount of money they are going to take out of the system to service their expenditures and deficit, is going to be over 16%. Accordingly, back in the early 1980s, it was 14%. So they are sucking more money out of the system. They are increasing their deficit, doubling their debt in four years—

Mr McCracken: Their deficit is down, I think, in the out years, at least in the forecasts I have seen here.

Mr Stockwell: Okay, $1 billion less, but—

Mr McCracken: That is, at least in my view, a fairly low growth rate in real terms for the Ontario economy.

Mr Stockwell: So you think the growth rate is going to be greater than 3.7%?

Mr McCracken: I think in the recovery period, if this recovery is—

Mr B. Ward: On a point of order, Mr Chair: I do not mean to interrupt, but should the discussion not go through the Chair?

Mr Stockwell: Through you, Mr Chairman, do you think it is going to be greater than 3.7%?

Mr McCracken: Yes, I think so.

Mr Stockwell: How much?

Mr McCracken: It depends which year you are interested in.

Mr Stockwell: Any year.

Mr McCracken: Any recovery, I would say, 5% per year in 1992, 1993, 1994 would not be outlandish. That would not be atypical. In the last economic cycle, real economic activity grew much more rapidly than that in the first three years after the recession.

Mr Stockwell: The most prosperous times this province has ever known.

Mr McCracken: Why should you not have it again?

Mr Stockwell: You cannot see any reason why you would not have those kinds of prosperous times again? You cannot see anything?

Mr McCracken: We still have an auto industry. We have one with 50% more capacity than we had then. We still have the smarts.

Mr Stockwell: You do not see the exodus of business?

Mr McCracken: No.

Mr Stockwell: You do not?

Mr McCracken: I think no. I think if he is getting one call a day—

Mr Stockwell: That is one business. That is one company.

Mr McCracken: No, I think that is not your problem. The problem is that we have about 15,000 businesses going under in this country. About 5,000 of those will be in Ontario this year because of bankruptcy, because of poor economic conditions. I would be much more concerned about that number than I would be by those who are making noises about moving.

Mr Stockwell: The other point I would like to ask that you do not really think it is that important then to worry about retiring the deficit that you have incurred.

Mr McCracken: No, I do not think so. I think you can grow out of it.

Mr Stockwell: Do you not think you eventually end up like the federal government, having so much debt, $400 billion, that you cannot manage it?

Mr McCracken: They are managing it. What is the problem from their viewpoint?

Mr Stockwell: You think they are an economically—

Mr McCracken: They are running a $30-billion deficit and you are worried about $10 billion.

Mr Stockwell: It is $400 billion in debt; $30-billion deficit. You think that is being managed today? You think that is a healthy—

Mr McCracken: I do not think it is healthy, but I think the efforts to—

Mr Stockwell: If it is not healthy, why—

Mr McCracken: I would not pay it down by $5 billion at this juncture.

Mr Stockwell: If it is not healthy, then why would you recommend we follow that model?

Mr McCracken: I am not recommending you follow that model. You are not in the same situation they are. The health of their particular deficit, or the debt if you will, is a symptom of the situation we are in.

Mr Stockwell: But by incurring more debt, to the tune that you are suggesting, would only lead to a situation where you would be in the same position of deficit financing and having so much debt and spending so much to service it that you would not have money to spend on the ngs government should be spending it on. In fact, by commending your approach, it seems the only end to it would be to be in the exact same position the federal government is in.

Mr McCracken: Let me suggest the alternative to you. The alternative at this particular point to the federal government, and for that matter the provincial government, increasing its debt is to impose, through higher taxes and lower expenditures, burdens on corporations, unincorporated businesses and individuals in this country. They will discharge that additional burden you place on them now? They will in many cases do so by themselves picking up additional debt.

If you think it is better to push the burden on to people and on to corporations in a period of economic conditions like this, I do not. I think in terms of capacity to take on debt at this particular juncture, the federal and provincial governments are relatively well-suited. We would all love to have a situation where that was not necessary, but debt ratios, you heard earlier, are high and have been growing. In Canada at the moment they are very high for the corporate sector and they are very high for the individual sector. So we really want to go in and raise those and cut their incomes and make their debt ratios go up so that we can look a little better at this juncture? I do not think so.

Mr Stockwell: The question, though, is the out years. Maybe you can make that argument during the recessionary times, and some people would buy into it. I do not buy into $10 billion, but some people may buy into it. But the question was the out years. Obviously there is not a recession. You have to retire the deficit. If you do not retire the deficit in those out years, when do you retire the deficit?

Mr McCracken: I think there may well be opportunities to do something in the out years. Understand that the forecast, at least as I read it, in this particular document is that we would call—this is the implications of current policies continued out over the next four years with a view of how the economy is going to unfold. That does not mean that in subsequent budgets, if the conditions are different than they have indicated here, they cannot move to reduce deficits or to make other adjustments to policy.

Mr Stockwell: With all due respect, you have reduced the deficit position of this government, or recommended here, by roughly $1 billion dollars over the next four years. They are going to incur $35 billion of new debt. You are suggesting—and those are not recessionary times—through economic reconfiguration, or reforecasting, they can go from an $8-billion deficit to some surplus position so they can retire the debt that they incurred this year.

Mr McCracken: I did not say they would be in a surplus position at the end of the four years, nor did I say they would necessarily make that choice. Keep in mind that you have trashed the economy, or it has been trashed, in 1990 and 1991. The gap has opened up between where we want to be and where we are today by a fairly large magnitude. If you take 3% as an approximate number for what the economy should do in terms of growth to stand still, in 1990, whether it be minus one, zero or 0.5, you essentially opened up a 3% gap. This year it looks like you will open up a 6% gap. That is roughly a 9% or 10% gap that we have in output from where we should be.

If we close that gap over the next four years, then we may well be in a position to run a surplus. That would imply a growth of about 2.5 points above 3%, or roughly 5.5% real growth per year for four years in a row. If the gap were closed at the end of that four years, I suggest to you that the revenue position of this government and the expenditure reductions possible in that environment would give it much more flexibility on its deficits than what you see in these forecasts.

I think, on the other hand, that they are not inappropriate in saying: "We don't know if that's going to happen. Here is a shot at what they may be." I would rather have them be, in that sense, balanced rather than coming with a hard program of a recovery twofold potential over the next four years, particularly in an environment where they do not control the pace of that entirely. This is not just a provincial government challenge to get the economy back to full employment.

Mr Stockwell: Just a quick comment. With all due respect, unless there are major changes to this budget policy this government has put forward, if you honestly believe it is going to be in a surplus position in four years that is nothing but a pipe dream.

Mr Hansen: I have to say, Mr McCracken, I viewed your comments before in February in the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, and a lot of your predictions are coming that way. If Mr Stockwell does not agree, I think I still have to sort of—

Mr Stockwell: Like no tax increase, eh, Ronnie?

Mr Hansen: There is one thing I like, a very simple one, and I think we have not got the message out or we have not asked the right question. How did this particular budget influence you personally this year and the next four years, plus how did it influence your business this year and the next four years, taking that I know your company does not smoke and your company does not drink? Personally you could possibly do that, but maybe the 1.7 cents gas tax would affect you personally and would affect your business also. Could you comment on how you take a look at it personally and company-wise in the next four years?

Mr McCracken: I must say that as a company operating in Ontario we have not seen many measures in this particular budget that influence us one way or the other. By and large it has left us unaffected. We already feel we operate under the principles of pay and employment equity, so we did not see any new incursions in our management requirements in that area.

We were somewhat concerned about the impacts that may be there from additional requirements imposed on boards of directors, but many of these obligations, of course, exist today on boards of directors. It is not clear to us that that is the end of the world. Of course, again there have been some changes in that area that certainly seem not unreasonable, as well as some changes at the federal level.

By and large we see little effect on our operating. What positive effect there may be is simply going to be one in which there is a little bit more optimism. If we were in the consumer business in Ontario I think we would be very pleased to see something that might get the consumer moving in this province relative to some of the others.

In our rack-up of the provincial budgets, certainly one signal that comes through is that in Ontario there is at least a move towards stimulus, which is unusual among the other regions. The only regions we found that did not move to impose additional restraint on the economy were the Yukon and Northwest Territories, quasi-federal jurisdictions. So in that sense we were positive and happy to see it at this particular juncture.

Mr Hansen: I have another question. Mr Whitestone had stated that with the increase in wages we have seen the elevator operator disappear. I, at a point, say that this has to do with research and development the government has put into companies to come up with more efficient equipment and ways of operating. So sometimes when we wind up as a government putting money into research and development what we do is find out that some of the lower-paid jobs disappear and become technical jobs where it takes someone from Otis to come in and repair this elevator where you just press the button.

I worked in the auto industry, and I believe in 1950 it cost $400 to assemble a car. In 1966 it came down to $159 but wages increased all the way along so the technical part changed. It became more automated.

My feeling is that we talk about wages and that to become more competitive we keep cutting wages, but I think we do put money into research and development and that we actually expand in Canada with a more high-technology workforce. Do you agree on that?

Mr McCracken: Certainly our objective in Canada is not to employ more people at low wages. I am not interested in being part of a country that feels it should aspire to become Mexico, Taiwan or China. If we, however, want to have high incomes and high wages, the key to that is high productivity, and the key to high productivity is working smarter with a good education, good human capital, and modern equipment. That is what we look for in our employment. The notion that somehow someone machiavellian is looking around trying to figure out how to get rid of elevator operators is a bit strange.

I still recall the story of Bell in the United States in the 1940s and early 1950s. Recognizing that with the growth that was occurring already in the phone system they would within about a 10-year period have to employ every woman between the ages of 16 and 65 as a telephone operator, they concluded it might not be the best strategy. It certainly caused them to put lots of investment into finding things like a dial telephone. It also, of course, meant that the growth was much more rapid than they anticipated because that technology allowed the price of it to decline both in absolute and relative terms.

Are we better or worse off as a result of that? I would suggest to you that we are a lot better off. We have not required a less productive way of communicating. We have substituted a more productive way. We have freed resources that can be employed in a better fashion in other parts of our system.

So that is what it is all about. It is not that we should be sorry to see the elevator operators go. We ought to take some joy in that. The only job left, I guess, with its ups and downs is politics.

Mr Hansen: It depends on what floor you are getting off at.

Mr Sutherland: We have heard a lot about a lack of business confidence in the economy and the budget as a signal of giving less confidence for them to remain here, and as a result of free trade and other things their ability to move funds and assets a little more easily to other locations. I would like to know what your opinion is about large business and small business in terms of having confidence in the economy and how you would advise the government to (a) either counter that lack of confidence or (b) instill the confidence.

Mr McCracken: Business confidence is fairly ephemeral. It is also poorly measured, incidentally. The numbers came out in early May, but they were indicated for late March and early April of two surveys on business confidence, one by the Conference Board of Canada and one by Statistics Canada, done within a few weeks of each other.

One came out and said, "Business confidence is still bad, worse, declining." The other one said, "Business confidence up; things are rosy." These happened to hit my desk roughly the same day, so I tried to figure it out. I said, "What's going on here?" It turns out that the one that was up and rosy tended to be of some larger companies, a fairly small number of them—about 100. They were given a rather general question like, "Do you think things will be better in the next six months than in the last six months?" The one that was down was over 1,000 firms that had been sampled, and the issue was, were they going to be producing more in the next three months than in the last three months. They were pessimistic on that, particularly when you adjusted for the seasonal patterns that exist, which was done in that second case.

The signals are mixed. But even if we had a consistent signal, there is a question mark about one's capacity to manipulate business confidence by government action, and in particular whether one can go out and say nice things or do nice things in a way that will result in some surge in confidence.

In both the consumer and business case we have found a fairly high correlation between the economic performance that is actually taking place out there and confidence. To the extent that the budget results in the Ontario economy doing better than it otherwise would, you will see some effect on business confidence in a positive way and on consumer confidence. If, on the other hand, other governments or world circumstances continue to push us down, then, hey, business confidence is not going to respond.

Just a final comment. The business confidence is not a hard number. It is not like the bottom line in the corporate profits sense. What you are interested in is what they do the investment side in particular. We are going to get a reading of that which is taking place right now. It will be reported probably in July. That will be our first reading in last December on investment intentions.

I would look to that to get a guide at least for what business is thinking. It will give you some sense of what they were saying they were going to do in 1991, and now there is a second kick at the can they are given. Let's keep our eye on that. That is really what matters in some sense.

The Chair: I am afraid we will have to draw this to a conclusion because the bells are ringing and I know some members would like to go to the House to vote.

Mr McCracken: Do you have Ron Hawkins out front as well, Jim, or is that over now?

The Chair: I would like to thank you again for coming and sharing with us your experiences and your knowledge. I guess we will probably see you in the future as well.

Mr McCracken: My pleasure.

The Chair: This committee is adjourned until 3:45 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1203.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1637.

The Chair: I am at the will of the committee as to whether to begin or not, although we do not yet have a quorum. As we all know, the proceedings in the House are rather unusual this afternoon and all the members of the committee are not yet present.

Mr B. Ward: Why don't we get started and perhaps more committee members will attend.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR POLICY ALTERNATIVES

The Chair: Perhaps we can start with Mr Cameron rather than delay him any further. Mr Cameron, will you be brief or will you be quite lengthy in your presentation?

Mr Cameron: I can be either brief or lengthy, depending upon your desire.

The Chair: I think we should hear from Mr Cameron, and if we find it necessary, then perhaps he could attend again on another date to give his presentation to the full committee.

Mr Cameron: My name is Duncan Cameron and I am the president of the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives, which is based in Ottawa. I am proud to say we are the only economic research group in Canada that does not receive its core funding from either business or government. We are very clearly in a sector which we call the popular sector. We work largely with volunteers and have a budget of about $200,000 a year.

I am also a professor of political science at the University of Ottawa, an institution which I think the people of Ontario can be justly proud of for its bilingual character. Of course, I would be pleased to answer any questions in French.

It is always an honour to appear before a parliamentary or a legislative committee. This is the first time I have had the honour of appearing in Ontario and I would just like to say that for me there is no greater honour, really, than being asked to give my views to the elected representatives.

I want to make some brief comments which would touch on three subjects: the budget process, which I think is a very important one; the economic impact of the budget; and the financial impact of the budget. I have a few provocative comments to make in conclusion.

I began my career in the Department of Finance in Ottawa. It occurred to me when I arrived, and there were only about 90 officials, that the people who prepared the budget had a very great responsibility. They had to, in a sense, decide on the level of taxation and decide on the level of spending. It seemed like it was much more responsibility than I, for instance, would have wanted to assume. But as I gained a bit of experience, it became clear to me that in fact there was a set of tax laws in place and that money did go in and continue to come in, regardless of what you said in the budget, and that money did continue to go out under statutory regulations, regardless of what the spending intentions of the government were.

I think there is a sense in which what we are seeing in the budget process in Ontario is that the automatic stabilizers put in place by previous governments have kicked in, the Ontario government is facing the recession of the Ontario economy and that as a result of that the welfare expenditures have gone up and the unemployment insurance expenditures have gone up and all of the automatic stabilizers at the federal and provincial levels have begun to increase. The decision the Treasurer made in his budget was simply one to allow that process to occur; in other words, to not attempt to reduce expenditures, to lay off people, to cut back on programs.

The budget process in this case I would describe largely as one that is passive. That is to say, it is going with the natural trend of the economy, which is down, and allowing the programs that have been built in to compensate for that to go up. I simply say I applaud the Treasurer for keeping his sang-froid, not panicking in the face of the deficit number. This is a time for moderation and this is a moderate budget and I think the Treasurer acted moderately.

In that process, there was either—I suppose there are two ways of interpreting it—$1.5 billion or $670 million in additional spending, which I think was certainly called for at this time, given the extent of the recession. I think many people who look at this budget would in fact argue that if the government has erred in one direction, it is not spending more, it is in not going beyond the $10-billion mark. Economically, any additional expenditure would have been welcome in the economy.

With respect to the budget process, I certainly want to applaud the distinction that is now being made between capital expenditures and operating expenditures. I think this is an incredibly important distinction and I think the media should begin to talk about a $5-billion deficit in terms of the operating deficit of the government.

When economists measure deficits and surpluses they have a number of different measures they can use. We have what we call the primary balance, the basic balance. If you look at the federal government, for instance, it has a primary balance of about $13 billion in surplus. That is to say, it is taking in, in revenues $13 billion more than it is spending. In Ontario we have a primary deficit because the amount of interest charges is less than the overall deficit of $10 billion. But there are a number of different ways of calculating the deficit. You can look at the national accounts basis. It is another way of getting the economic impact of the deficit.

So when people begin to fix on the figure of $9 billion and play with this and start to describe this as being the state of the finances of Ontario, they are really simplifying what is a much more complicated matter than people are often led to believe. The distinction between operating expenditures and capital expenditures is crucial and this is something I certainly welcome in the process.

I would like now to turn to the economic impact of the budget itself. The Treasurer of Ontario, the Prime Minister and the Finance Minister of Canada, anybody looking at the economic situation in our province or in the country really has one call to make: Is the economy going up or there strength in the economy or is the economy going down and is there weakness in the economy? The Treasurer made a call that the economy had suffered greatly and was likely to continue to suffer. I do not think there is any other call that could be made.

The depth and extent of the recession is perhaps simply not widely appreciated outside Ontario. To me the significant figure is that between February 1990 and February 1991 there were job losses of about 264,000 in Ontario. That is a tremendous amount of waste. I think when you look at the economic impact of this budget you are going to say the economic impact is probably positive in the sense that it is going to maintain existing jobs and perhaps create additional jobs; the Treasurer is talking about 7,000. It would be absolutely foolish to think that anything other than expansion was the way to go. Only economic illiterates would argue the contrary.

To argue that the government should have been attempting to reduce its expenditures and reduce its stimulus to the economy is really to argue that at time of great need the government should immobilize resources when there are already many resources immobile in the economy. If you think of the rule of thumb that when the unemployment rate is reduced by 1% you get anywhere between 2% to 4% economic growth, to argue that the government should have reduced employment, as other provinces have done, by laying off and firing civil servants is to argue that you want the Ontario economy to contract further, you want its revenues to fall further and you want its automatic stabilizer expenditures on welfare and so on to go up. There is simply no economic argument for anything but stimulus in the current situation. It is very important that this message be well understood.

With regard to the economic impact, if we look at the economy and we ask what can we expect from the economy as a result of this budget, what we have to say to ourselves is that there are only a certain number of limited sources of economic growth.

The first is exports. I have been to the United States recently. I met with some of the leading American economists and none of them I spoke to believed there is going to be an upsurge in demand in the United States for steel or for automobiles from Ontario. The people with whom I spoke believe the American recovery will occur, and it may in fact be already occurring at 1 July, but it will be very weak and very transitory. So for Ontario to wait for exports, particularly with the dollar where it is, would have been a big mistake.

The second source of economic growth is of course consumer spending. While we have had a decline in interest rates of about five percentage points in nominal terms and there has been some return of consumers to the housing market and indeed to the automobile market, in times of falling interest rates consumers tend to attempt to pay down debt. They do not necessarily go out and begin to spend. I have not seen any indication that there is a surge of consumer spending, so I think it would have been a mistake for the Ontario government to try to rely on consumer spending.

What about business investment? It is a very clear rule of thumb that if consumers are not spending, businesses do not invest. If you look at the capacity utilization rates in the various industrial sectors which are important to Ontario, you do not see high levels of capacity utilization, so most businesses can produce more without investing more. I do not think we could have relied on private investment, which leaves us with only really two sources of economic growth—government spending and government investment.

I have been dismayed by the federal government policy of privatizing crown corporations and taking away major instruments of capital investment and control over capital investment. I argue strongly that there should be a much greater emphasis made on capital investment in Canada as a whole. Ontario, as one of the wealthier provinces—the wealthiest province—with the strongest credit rating should of course take the lead in that. I am pleased to see there is significant capital investment planned.

By and large, without the economic impact of the Ontario budget, not only would the Ontario economy be much worse off in six months or a year, but indeed the entire Canadian economy would be worse off. The economic impact of this cannot be anything but positive. Let's hope the economic outlook in six months is better than it is now.

I would like to talk about what has really been the focus of much of the opposition to this budget, which is of course its financial impact.

Ontario has an important debt load if you consider the debt structure of Ontario Hydro to be part of government finances, which I do not. I take Ontario Hydro to be a stand-alone operation, with an autonomous board of directors, which borrows for capital investment but in fact is able to retire that through its operations, largely through its commercial market practices.

If you consider only the debt of the government of Ontario, it is virtually debt free. This is an incredible situation. Think for a minute of the assets of the government of Ontario. If we began to list the value of all the provincial parks, all the roads, all the schools, all the hospitals, all the items the Ontario government has in fact created and which are there and from which we benefit every day—if we listed those assets and then we put against it the debts, the Ontario taxpayers would be a net owner of a tremendous amount of assets.

I suggest to this committee it might be useful to attempt to establish a list of assets of the government of Ontario against which it undertakes future borrowings.

The significant figure for financial markets when they assess the debt of a government is what is the percentage of current expenditures which is going to retire existing debt. The forecast in Ontario is that Ontario would be paying 11 cents to 13 cents on every dollar in debt serving costs which, as was pointed out by no less an authority than the C. D. Howe Institute this week, is the lowest of any of the provinces in Canada. So Ontario is best placed of any of the provinces to undertake to do debt financing.

The interesting thing I find is that if you were to read the Globe and Mail or the Financial Post, or listen to the CBC national news or read any of the major media, you would hear there has been tremendous opposition on Bay Street to the NDP budget because it is a deficit budget. I bet if you were to go into the offices of Wood Gundy, ScotiaMcLeod Inc or any of the major investment dealers, they would be sitting around figuring out how they can get their hands on some of this Ontario government debt so they can sell it to their customers.

If we think of public debt issues in Ontario as a result of this budget to be in the $5-billion to $6-billion range going into private hands, and we think of the average charge or service fee charged by the investment bank community, they are looking at 0.5% of that in new business. So I think the biggest winner out of this budget is probably the Bay Street financial community.

The other winners are going to be the people who buy this debt and hold it because it is very solid, it is very secure, it is going to be easily marketable and it is going to bear a reasonable rate of return. So from the point of view of financial instruments, the government of Ontario bonds are going to be very attractive. They are very easy to sell and they will stimulate activity on Bay Street to a great degree.

I have heard it said that the real problem with the Ontario budget is not so much that there is a deficit; it is that the deficit is going to further contract the short supply of available funds out there and this will inevitably push up interest rates. Because of higher interest rates, this is going to either push up inflation or it is going to further impede our economic recovery.

I would just like to state on the record that this is total nonsense. The level of interest rates in this country are primarily set by the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada acting at its treasury auction on Thursdays, where it sends a signal to the market, and through its practice of moving deposits in and out of the banking system.

Any money market trader knows the Bank of Canada is the price leader in an oligopoly pricing system. It sets the interest rates. If you believe in the demand-and-supply theory of credit, as opposed to the price leader theory of credit, I think you just have to look at the fact that credit has been contracting so fast that the money supply in Canada was in negative growth last year. There is a lot of ability to raise money without having any impact at all on interest rates. This argument is simply a spurious argument.

What I conclude, then, is that the Ontario budget will have no impact on existing interest rates; it will provide some stimulus to the financial sector of the economy, and it will provide a safe haven for the savings of Ontario citizens by providing them with a fair rate of return on financial resources. The deficit figure being bandied about is some kind of notion of debt which we are carrying around on our shoulders, and is simply misplaced unless it is set against the assets that exist in Ontario which are, in a virtually debt-free province, a major benefit.

In conclusion, I would like to deal with some of the criticisms that have been made of the budget and to try to deal with the question why we have had so much opposition to this budget. To a certain extent, of course, opposition to any government policy is part of our political process. This room is structured to allow for debate between the government and opposition so that the issues are aired, the people hear both sides of the story and they are allowed, in a democracy, to make up their own minds. So there is much criticism that is naturally of a partisan nature.

There is a more severe issue at play here. It really has two parts. I do not believe there is a general view in the business community in Ontario as to how to deal with the NDP government. There is not a single voice of business in Ontario as there is, for instance, in Canada in the Business Council on National Issues. There is a sense in which the business community has decided to attempt to limit the activities of the NDP government by a campaign of intimidation. That is something the government will have to deal with as part of our political life. I suppose, to some extent, it is fair ball, and people just have to deal with it.

But there is another type of opposition that has emerged, which has been generated from Ottawa, where it lives, by the federal government and which, I think, is more dangerous and deserves more public airing than it has received at present. There is a view put out that the government of Canada's attempts to manage the economy have been thwarted not just by the NDP budget this time, but by the Peterson government that preceded it, and that the people of southern Ontario, in some sense, have been working against the interests of the rest of the nation by the government's refusing to go along with the direction that was set by the federal government.

I think we saw in the last election an attempt to discredit the government of Ontario around the free trade issue. We are seeing, in this period, an attempt by the Prime Minister himself to discredit the Premier of Ontario in the context of the constitutional negotiations. It is very clear to me that if there is to be a constitutional settlement, Ontario has to be a part of it and Ontario, in some sense, has a veto over those constitutional negotiations. I think there is a general attempt fostered in Ottawa to try to discredit the NDP government so that it will not act independently in the constitutional negotiations, so that it will feel it is beleaguered, under attack and cannot take a position of strength within those negotiations.

I just throw that out for your consideration, because when we look at economics and we look at the Ontario economy and the misery and hardship that has been created by the policies of the federal government through misguided monetary policy: interest rates 5% to 6% short-term above the United States because of manipulation by the Bank of Canada; through the introduction of a regressive sales tax, the goods and services tax, at a time when we were going into a recession, against the advice and counsel of the majority of Canadians to proceed with the tax; through the decision to proceed with the free trade agreement, which has produced an even greater calamity than those of us who anticipated calamity would have expected. To be in this situation by putting forward a series of economic policies which have not only created a recession in Canada but have made it more difficult to get out of a recession, to do this in the face of all good economic soning, to me says that the government can only do this because of widespread economic illiteracy.

The real task facing the government on budgetary matters is to be able to explain to people, without having to go through the intermediaries of the press, who are likely to be hostile, and the media, who are likely to be unsympathetic, to be able to explain directly to the population what the issues at stake are.

In the 1930s we tried the policies of restraint in the midst of economic decline and they did not work. Something was adapted which was called in the United States the Roosevelt revolution. The Roosevelt revolution was followed in the United States by something called the Reagan revolution, and the Reagan revolution is neo-conservative policies. They have been tried in Canada and they failed, and they should be rejected. I guess what I and other citizens are looking for is something we might call the Rae renewal.

I would hope that this budget would lead to economic renewal by its major stimulus, but I would also hope that the Ontario government would be working to put in place economic levers which would allow it, first of all, to deal with the economic restructuring that is taking place.

This province desperately needs an industrial renewal board which hears a public statement from every company that wishes to close down about why it is doing so, which does an audit of the environmental damage that company may or may not have done, and which allows for other interested parties to comment on the reasons why the company is closing down.

I think as well that the Ontario government needs a public sector investment bank so that it can go into towns. We see in our economy today—and the Canadian economy is basically 600 single-industry communities or towns—situations all too frequently, in southern Ontario particularly but also in northern Ontario, where a single employer closes down. In order to protect the interests of the private shareholders in that company, a financial decision is made to close it down, and the consequences are that the roads, the hospitals, the schools, and the personal property of all the people who live in that community are adversely affected. The social costs far outweigh any of the financial benefits to the shareholders of that company.

Without some kind of public-sector investment banking facility which is publicly owned and can go in and make deals to renew economic activity, to bring together municipalities, unions, the provincial government and the Ontario Development Corp, to make interest-free loans of an equity nature to new ventures, it is going to be very difficult to deal with this kind of economic situation.

Finally I would just like to say that if this renewal is going to happen we need the type of fiscal policies that we have seen in this budget. We are going to need an economic lever like a public-sector investment bank and we are going to need a public debate about plant closures, but we are also going to need an overall look at the pension funds and the whole range of social investments that have been made in the province.

This committee in particular will certainly have its hands full in investigating this sort of question, but there are a number of different financial instruments which are in the public sector and in Ontario. In the past the government has benefited, for instance, from being able to borrow directly from the Ontario teachers' pension funds. I understand changes to the legislation have been made so that it can no longer do that.

The issues of pension fund investments and protecting the interests of those who will eventually benefit from those pensions, but also protecting the interests of the entire province of Ontario, are going to be important issues in the next two or three years. I thank you very much for an opportunity to make my comments.

The Chair: Should we proceed with some questions from the government or—

Mr Christopherson: I would rather do the questions at the same time as the opposition so that it is all being dealt with at one shot, since I understand Mr Cameron has been good enough to try to make himself available when we are in Ottawa.

The Chair: All right. That sounds fair enough. Thank you for your comments, Mr Cameron.

Mr Cameron: It is a pleasure. I am also in Toronto on a regular basis so I would be pleased to appear in Toronto on another occasion as well. Thank you.

The Chair: Thanks very much. Perhaps we should also hear from Mr de Bever under the same set of circumstances. What is the will of the committee?

Mr Sutherland: I am a little more reluctant to do that since it was the official opposition party that had put forward this witness. I think I would be a little more hesitant in terms of how we should approach this one. I do understand that Mr de Bever lives here in Toronto and therefore his accessibility to the committee may be a little easier than Mr Cameron's, although we now find out he does come here on a regular basis. I would be reluctant to move forward, on the basis that he is their presenter.

The Chair: Perhaps I should explain, Mr de Bever, what is happening here. We have an unusual set of circumstances taking place in the House which has caused the three members of the Liberal Party to be present in the House for what will unfold in the next little while. They have chosen to be there as opposed to being here.

The debate is really over whether we should go ahead and hear your presentation now with just the members of the government party being present or whether we should extend our apologies to you and invite you to come back at a future date. If you have any preferences on that, I think we would like to hear those.

Mr de Bever: I will be unavailable between the 7th and the 21st.

The Chair: Our first day of hearings will be 29 July. Perhaps we could put you on the list for that day. Is that the will of the committee members present?

Mr Christopherson: No problem.

The Chair: Again, I would like to apologize on behalf of the committee and do extend an invitation for you to return on the 29th. We have your written brief that I trust we can keep and peruse.

Mr de Bever: Sure.

The Chair: Okay. Thank you very much.

This last item of business is about the Ontario budget hearings advertisement. We have to send out some advertisements.

Interjections.

The Chair: We do not have a schedule.

Mr Sutherland: We do not have a finalized schedule because we are still finalizing a couple of locations for meeting, which I would like to have the subcommittee do very quickly.

Mr Jamison: What do you need for the advertising?

The Chair: Just a motion. There are two suggestions possibilities.

Mr Jamison: Why do we not empower the subcommittee to do that?

The Chair: All right.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, will you ensure that as soon as the schedule is locked in it is sent out to all offices, preferably our constituency offices?

The Chair: Yes, as early as we can.

The committee adjourned at 1709.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 29 July 1991

The committee met at 1006 in room 230.

1991-92 BUDGET

Consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR POLICY ALTERNATIVES

The Chair: I see a quorum here this morning and I would like to begin this morning's session. I would like to introduce Mr Mel Watkins, professor at the University of Toronto. The agreed-to procedure for this morning is that Mr Watkins will present, and then whatever time is left in the hour will be divided equally among the three parties for questioning. Welcome to the committee, Mr Watkins.

Mr Watkins: I am delighted to be able to accept the invitation to appear. Let me extend apologies from Duncan Cameron, who is not here with me this morning. He is unable to be here, but I am sure he can appear before your committee and would be delighted to do so when it comes to Ottawa.

I would like, if I might, to give you a statement this morning on the 1991-92 Ontario budget that has been designed by 59 economists from across Canada. It is being issued under the auspices of the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives. With your permission, I would just like to read this into the record, and then we would be delighted to try to answer any questions you might have.

As economists, we support the major elements of the recent Ontario budget and reject the view that the degree of fiscal stimulus is excessive or likely to create significant long-term economic problems.

Ontario Treasurer Floyd Laughren has rightly noted that he had a choice, to fight the deficit or to fight the recession. He made the correct choice.

It is difficult to exaggerate the scale and seriousness of the current Ontario recession. Driven by plant closures and major layoffs in the manufacturing sector and by a sharp downturn in the construction sector, total employment fell by 260,000 between February 1990 and February 1991, and the unemployment rate increased from 5.3% to 9.5% over that same period. We should just note that the present unemployment rate is 10.2%. By both measures, this recession is comparable to that of 1981-82. Output losses are expected to be only slightly less than those of 1981-82, even if the Ontario economy begins to grow from midyear.

I should again just add here that the forecast at best will be a weak recovery in the economy. There is even a front-page story in the weekend Financial Post, which on these matters must be believed, saying that economists now fear that this recovery is hollow and that there will be another downturn before we are into a stable recovery. That is based basically on what American economists are saying is possible in the US case. That could then affect us in Canada, obviously.

As a direct result of very significant job losses combined with recent changes to the federal unemployment insurance program, tens of thousands of Ontario residents have been forced to turn to social assistance programs. Case loads have approximately doubled in most major urban centres, including Metropolitan Toronto. Almost one quarter of the total budget expenditure increase for 1991-92 is for social assistance. The recession has had a more indirect impact in other areas of spending.

The recession has also seriously depressed budgetary revenues. Indeed, even after the modest tax increases imposed in the budget, total tax revenues will decline for the first time in the modern fiscal history of the province. That is a sign of how serious the downturn is.

The third major factor in the fiscal equation has been reduced growth of transfers from the federal government for established programs and Canada assistance plan payments. Federal transfers to Ontario in 1991-92 will be $1.6 billion lower than previously committed. In effect, the federal government has shifted an important part of its deficit problem on to the provinces, with Ontario being forced to bear a particularly large share of the burden, despite being the province hardest hit by the current downturn.

Over half, some $5 billion, of the $9.7-billion Ontario deficit is due to these factors, namely, recession-driven changes in revenues and spending and reductions in federal transfers. Another $3 billion of the deficit is due to increased spending to maintain the level of existing services, primarily health and education.

The truly discretionary expenditure increase in the Ontario budget is a modest $1.5 billion. It is directed towards social assistance reform, a wage protection fund, pay equity adjustments, increased support for research and development and technological innovation, and other areas where commitments were made by the present government.

Those who insist that the Ontario government should have a much smaller deficit are calling for cuts in services, most importantly, health, education and social assistance programs, or for sharp increases in personal or corporate taxes. Most economists accept that significant tax increases in a recession and in the wake of major federal tax increases, particularly the GST, would have been counter-productive. The debate then is one over the desirability of spending cuts.

As individuals, we believe the Ontario government was right to maintain and even make modest improvements in services to people. We place value upon provision for the victims of recession and upon the maintenance of an adequate level of public services for our fellow citizens.

As economists, we note that the proposed alternative of spending cuts would have significantly cut employment and output at a time when the private sector is in a steep decline. Some macroeconomic models suggest that measures to restrain the increase in the deficit to $3 billion, that being where it was for the last fiscal year, would have cost the economy in excess of 70,000 jobs. All of the major models of the Canadian economy, including those of the Conference Board of Canada and Informetrica, show that restraint by the federal and most provincial governments will slow economic recovery. Spending cuts in areas such as education and public infrastructure would also have come at the cost of reduced potential for future growth. Public investment is one important element in productivity growth in the private sector.

In our view, the increase in the Ontario deficit is quite manageable. The deficit for 1991-92 is 3.4% of provincial gross domestic product or GDP, considerably smaller than recent federal government deficits, smaller than a recent Alberta government deficit in 1987, and smaller than a Conservative Saskatchewan government deficit in 1986. The deficit will decline in Ontario in absolute terms and even more as a share of provincial GDP after 1991-92. Most important, Ontario has a small accumulated public debt, so the cost of debt servicing is not expected to rise above 12% of revenues. Despite the recent downgrading, Ontario is able to borrow from capital markets on excellent terms and there is no good economic reason not to borrow to maintain important services under current conditions.

It has been argued by some economists that it is unwise to borrow since debt servicing costs will ultimately reduce the fiscal flexibility of the government, as has happened at the federal level. There is, to be sure, a limit to the extent to which debt should be assumed, but there is no reason to believe that the fiscal projections in the Ontario budget are seriously flawed. As growth resumes, revenues will increase and some elements of spending will fall, moving provincial finances gradually closer to balance.

It has also been argued that the increased government borrowing will delay private sector recovery by forcing up or slowing the fall of interest rates. Such concerns are unfounded, even for those who hold to the view that Canadian interest rates are determined by balances in domestic as opposed to international financial markets. Demands on credit markets by Canadian private borrowers—households and businesses—are currently low and personal saving rates are on the increase. Short-term interest rates have continued to decline since the Ontario budget was released, and it is in the capacity of the Bank of Canada to permit further declines, given the current level of US interest rates. These would allow the value of the Canadian dollar to fall, thus promoting the recovery of export industries.

It is important that the real issues at stake in the economic debate over the Ontario budget be clarified. In essence, the federal government has determined that the macroeconomic priority of the country should be to achieve a zero inflation objective through tight monetary and fiscal policy. The result has been an unnecessarily severe recession—the Conference Board of Canada, not a radical group, itself calls it a made-in-Canada recession—double-digit unemployment and the destruction of a significant part of our national productive capacity. We do not believe that the future benefits of these policies will outweigh the high current costs.

The Ontario government has effectively determined, in part, to partially offset federal fiscal and monetary restraint through a looser fiscal policy than might otherwise have been contemplated. They have also embraced a view of the so-called competitiveness issue which stresses the importance of public investment and the need to maintain and improve social standards.

In this context, it is scarcely surprising that the federal government should have chosen to launch an almost unprecedented attack upon the budgetary policies of Ontario. But this attack, and the support for it voiced by some economists, should not be taken by the public as evidence that the Ontario budget is misguided in terms of economic principles. To the contrary, the Ontario approach is much to be preferred, and is the one that should be pursued in concert by both levels of government.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Watkins. We have approximately 45 minutes left, which will allow each party 15 minutes for questioning.

Mr Jamison: I would like to thank you for your presentation. We have heard from various people that the recession basically is over. I would like your view on that and in what term you see the recovery, if in fact we do not double dip into another recession period.

Mr Watkins: We can hope that the recession is over but it is too soon to say. The data for the second quarter of the year and the whole suggest that we may have moved into a recovery phase. As I said already, there is now some concern being expressed by some economists that we may have had a kind of false start here. Certainly if we are in a recovery phase, it is a very weak recovery we are looking at. Much of the increase in employment that has been created in absolute terms, not in relative terms, is in fact in part-time jobs, and indeed a number of these jobs were actually created by the federal government for census-taking purposes, and that is a one-shot event. So we are not at all certain. In terms of unemployment, there is no reason to believe we are in anything but continuing serious trouble.

The recession we have here in Canada is unusual in the sense that it is one of the very few times we have had a recession start in Canada before it started in the United States. This is not something we should feel happy about. It means the federal government had such horrible macroeconomic policies that it actually managed to push our economy into a recession before the American economy was pushed into a recession. But the reason why this is such a serious downturn is that once the American economy itself went into a recession—which had nothing to do with us; it would have happened anyway—we were then dragged down further. The debate now about what kind of recovery we are going to have and when is basically that we are not yet certain that the American economy, which went into a recession later, has come out of it yet. If it has not come out and does not come out, it is very hard to see the Canadian economy staying out of a recession or having anything like a satisfactory recovery.

I think this point is actually very important in judging the budget, because one of the problems we have as economists is that the information we deal with is often dated before we get around to dealing with it. Even our so-called leading indicators are issued two months late. So one of the problems you have if you are managing fiscal policy is you say we should stimulate the economy, but how do I know by the time I bring these measures in the economy will not already be pulling into a recovery phase? That is a very real issue.

In this case, unfortunately that is not going to be a problem because we are not yet clearly out of this recession, and if we are out of it in a technical sense, we are not out of it in terms of unemployment, and if we are out of it even in a technical sense, it is going to be very slow. The case for fiscal stimulus of the modest nature that is found in this budget is a compelling case, and each day that goes by makes it a more compelling case.

The Chair: I am going to continue with the questioning of the government party, and then we will move to the liberals, who have indicated they would like to be next.

Ms M. Ward: Looking through your summary and listening to your comments, I think I could summarize it by saying it is a good budget for bad times, and that is what we have been hearing from other people also. I was just reading what the clerk gave us here this morning, some independent submissions and persons saying that as much as they do not like deficits, they see that the alternative at this time would have been much more devastating for Ontario. Would you agree with that summary, and would you like to expand on that?

Mr Watkins: I agree certainly in the sense that there is no virtue in deficits and there is no virtue in adding to debt burdens. As citizens or as those of us who are economists, we can all agree on that. The question is, what would the alternative be? What we are saying here, and others have said it, is that this government came into office and discovered there was already a deficit. We were already clearly in a significant recession.

If the government had chosen to just hold the deficit where it then was, which was in the order of $3 billion for the last fiscal year, then the best kind of macroeconomic models available to any of us, including the Treasury, would be that about 70,000 more jobs would have been lost than have actually been lost since that time. There have been about 250,000 jobs lost. If we had held a balance in the budget at the $3-billion deficit, we would have created 70,000 more unemployed people. We are talking now about an unemployment rate in Ontario which is double-digit for the first time in a very long time indeed.

We are looking at an unusual case where Ontario is the hardest hit of any province by this recession, so for any government to have worsened the recession would be unconscionable. This budget is about cushioning the effects and making a modest attempt to aid a recovery, but only a modest attempt. I would agree with you it is a good budget for bad times. It is the best we can do in times that are really quite bad.

Ms M. Ward: There is a further factor aside from the jobs that also would have been lost. If you were looking at cuts in social services, it would have a further impact on reducing benefits and services for people already unemployed.

Mr Watkins: In the short term it would have adversely affected people already being adversely affected and I think we then also have to worry about the long term. It is very hard for me as an economist to imagine cutbacks in health spending or cutbacks in education—perhaps I have a bias in this regard. It is hard for me to believe that those in and of themselves do not have bad long-term effects as well. If the workforce is not healthy and well educated, what are your long-term prospects? I do not mean you cannot deliver public services more efficiently—that is not a valid issue—but just across-the-board cutbacks are likely to have not only bad short-term effects; they are likely to have bad long-term effects.

Mr Sutherland: It was interesting in your presentation that you used the terminology that in effect the federal government has shifted an important part of its deficit problem on to the provinces. I am not sure the people of this province have a full understanding of that in terms of the fact that what we are seeing is that the federal government in some ways, by passing on that deficit problem, is trying to make the other people—in this case I think the provinces—look like the bad people for running up deficits while it is showing restraint.

I just want to expand upon that in terms of the federal government's role in the recession overall. We heard last week, I think very well, actually, the impact of the free trade agreement. We have heard some comments about high interest rates and there seems to be an ongoing debate about where interest rates should be, and particularly the differential with the American one.

Some have said that our rates cannot go down that much more, that we have to keep that high differential. Do you think there is room for some easing, and that in the long term that will probably be the best solution for economic recovery?

Mr Watkins: I think many economists are very unhappy with the macroeconomic policy which the federal government has been pursuing recently where we have had—the whole world has been plagued by very high rates of interest, but in the Canadian case we have actually chosen to create an unprecedented differential between American real rates and Canadian real rates and there is no doubt that is one reason why private sector investment is running relatively low at the present time.

I would have thought the Bank of Canada could afford to ease up a bit on interest rates. We would then expect that the Canadian dollar would go down. Why is the governor of the Bank of Canada so obsessed with the value of the Canadian dollar? Basically, because they have this zero inflation objective in mind and if they let the Canadian dollar go down then the price of imported goods, which is about 30% of what we are consuming, will go up and that will tend to have some inflationary effects. We can all agree on that. The present government is so obsessed with inflation that it will not permit the Canadian dollar to fall at all, even though there are all kinds of activities in Canada which simply cannot be competitive at an 87-cent dollar, which would certainly be competitive at say, an 80-cent dollar. I would say, as many economists have said in the past year or two, let interest rates go down. All that is going to happen is that the Canadian dollar will go down. But since it is a good thing to have the Canadian dollar go down, that should be seen as a benefit rather than a cost of these kinds of policies.

Mr Sutherland: If I may just do a follow-up, in some ways you are suggesting that if interest rates were to go down somewhat, that would lower the Canadian dollar. That in itself would help stimulate economic recovery and I suppose, in the long term, that would reduce the provincial deficit.

Mr Watkins: Yes, that would indeed stimulate recovery because it would make our exports more competitive than they presently are and it would make our domestic production more competitive against imports than it presently is. It is sort of counterproductive to rip the federal government any more, given its present standing in the polls, but it is hard to imagine a set of economic policies worse than the present federal government has chosen to pursue. Even with a wise and sensible federal government, this provincial government would have found it had a problem. There has been a downturn in the United States; there is going to be a downturn in Canada. There would have been a recession, but it would have been nothing like as serious as the present recession is. It is likely, you see, that one of the horrible ironies of this is that provincial government policy is not sufficient actually to negate the bad effects of federal government policy, but I do not see how any Ontario government has any alternative but to do whatever it can to alleviate and cushion the bad effects, even though they are substantially caused by federal government policy itself.

Mr B. Ward: Some people have said these are the worst economic times since the so-called Dirty Thirties. During the 1930s governments attempted to balance their budgets and they failed, as a result we had a 10-year depression. Can you comment on why those policies failed in the 1930s and why it is important for governments during these economic times to stimulate the economy within their ability?

Mr Watkins: We are thinking about the history of economics actually, because there is a kind of real déjà vu involved here, and we went through all of this in the 1930s. There was a great debate among economists as to whether you should balance budgets, whether you should cut government spending, or whether you should increase it. Out of the terrible Depression of the 1930s came the very important economic innovations of Lord John Maynard Keynes and so-called Keynesian economics, and also out of it came the American New Deal, the last progressive government the United States has had, which was committed to trying to bring the economy out of the Great Depression of the 1930s, actually more so than any Canadian government was.

It would be generally agreed by historians, I am sure, that what finally ended that horrible Depression of the 1930s was the Second World War itself, a terrible way to solve a problem. But those governments which had said they could not spend their way out of the Depression promptly proceeded to spend their way out of the Depression by spending on the war. We are not literally in the 1930s yet, but we have governments that are perfectly capable of putting us there and we certainly are having a serious problem of slow growth, of low productivity, growth and so on. These have not been good times and for too many governments have simply regressed to the kinds of Calvin Coolidge-Herbert Hoover types of policies. I think all we can say is they ain't going to work. They are not going to work.

The complaint against Keynesian policy, these stimulative policies, by and large is that they spill out too much into other parts, that if any one government pursues it in any one area, the benefits do not remain sufficiently within that area. That is true. When the Ontario government stimulates, other provinces and American states will benefit from this. We will not get all the benefits here in Ontario.

The answer to that, of course, is that we ought to have national and international co-operation. In my view, Keynesian policies would remain viable if there were international co-operation. When the leaders of the G-7 countries get together, and if they had progressive political leadership rather than what they presently mostly have, it might be possible to talk about international policies which would be of a stimulative nature, and then I think what the Ontario government is doing we could well do more of than is presently being done. But it is hard to do that much when all other governments are failing to do it.

Mr Phillips: On the economic principles you talk about here, I understand your view on this year's budget but down the road what is your feeling in terms of balancing and surpluses? I think the budget calls for fairly good economic growth in the next five years. What should we be looking at in terms of deficits over the next five or six years?

Mr Watkins: On these fiscal matters I would tend to be something of a conservative. This is a rather hypothetical abstract we are putting, but if you can define something called a business cycle of good times and bad times, then policies ought to aim for balanced budgets over the cycle. If there are deeper structural problems, you cannot, in my view, solve them by this kind of fiscal stimulus.

I guess one of the implications of what I am saying is that the previous government should have run surpluses but I admit it was under a lot of pressure, including probably pressure from the opposition, not to do that. I accept that point, but in terms of fiscal balance, we would have been better off if there had been surpluses run by the previous government in the growth period of the late 1980s, and then when this downturn came, we could have afforded more of a deficit than we presently have.

I would think that this government ideally, with a four-five-year mandate, ought to aim to balance its budget over that period.

Mr Phillips: So you would have severe negative comments about this budget then, because I do not think it ever is in the next 10 years within six or seven—

Mr Watkins: What I would look for is policies other than fiscal stimulus to try and get the economy moving. That is what I would look for. In other words, I would argue that the problem with Keynesian policies is not that they are too much, as the conservative mind alleges, but that they are too little.

Mr Phillips: I am surprised your document does not reflect those concerns, because this budget calls for substantial deficits for ever.

Mr Watkins: No, it would not call for them for ever. I would have to check the numbers, but if you got unemployment down to 3% or 4% in this province, I am sure you would have a balanced budget. The problem is that we are looking at continuing high levels of unemployment. That is the problem. All I would say is that I would not deal with those simply by fiscal stimulus.

Mr Phillips: I think I understand what he said and I am surprised your document does not reflect those concerns.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to really follow very closely, Mr Watkins, on the remarks you have just made and made in relation to a previous questioner relating to government investment as a stimulus. You have referred to that on one page, I think page 3.

I noted that in this particular budget the stimulus came mainly through short-term job creation policies, projects that were already on the table at the municipal level for short-term investment in, say, sewerage and capital works programs where the investment and indeed the job creation would be over in a very short period of time. Where we have seen a major change is that the long-term investment, either through the technology fund or through significant longer-term stimulus in the new areas of our economy which have to be developed in order to have a competitive economy has been completely ignored.

As you talk about reducing unemployment over the longer term to the 3% level where deficits will not be a problem, it seems to me that what this budget has failed to do is to create the stimulus over the longer term that is going to be absolutely vital to create that kind of a new competitive economy. I would like you to comment on that.

Mr Watkins: I would certainly agree with the first part of what you are saying. As I understand it, when this government came in it discovered there was an existing shelf of public works projects, and it is to the credit of the Treasurer and the credit of the last government that should be so. It would then make sense for any government to draw from that shelf quickly.

Again, the problem when a recession starts is that you do not know how deep it is going to go. You do not know how long it is going to last. You have to worry. There are lots of cases that economists could tell you about where governments stimulate the economy and by the time the spending actually takes place the economy is no longer in a recession. That is the case with having these projects on the shelf, and starting out with short-term jobs is a compelling case. That is in fact what you should be doing.

On the longer-term problem, I guess I read this budget as being very encouraging in what it says about how to deal with deeper problems about creating a competitive economy here in Ontario.

Mrs Sullivan: But there is no action in it. Where do you see the action?

Mr Watkins: What I would have thought is that you have had a long period of inaction in this province, which you have had, and that it is not going to be easy for a government to come in and quickly deal with long-term solutions.

This government, it seems to me, has a four- to five-year mandate. As to the statements that are included in the budget papers, the appendix on competitiveness, I would say, as an economist, is a very good statement indeed, the best I have seen issued by any government in North America, so I would say, give this government a chance to give effect to these policy statements. I am quite optimistic about what this government will do in the long run, on the basis of that statement, which was tabled as part of the budget statement. I can think of no precedent for any budget document that has included that kind of assertion about the root causes of difficulties in the Canadian economy and how to deal with them over the long term.

Mrs Sullivan: I think it is one thing to have a statement, but it is another thing to have the action within the context of the budget that in fact starts to move on that statement. Indeed, the technological—

Mr Watkins: I would presume the future budgets will help us in this regard. This is only the first budget.

Mrs Sullivan: But you concur that there is nothing in this budget to assist us over the longer term.

Mr Watkins: No, I would not go that far. There is some additional spending on R and D. There are measures in the area of pay equity. There are policies announced and contained in this budget that I think will be helpful in terms of growth.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Watkins, I have a few questions. I notice that in your opening remarks you listed all the economists who were supporting this budget. I also notice with some interest that every single one of them is at a university, which is kind of an insulated environment. You do not list one single economist who is out in the real world. How many would you think would be on the other side and think this budget is a bit of a disaster?

Mr Watkins: Let me just say first that you are substantially right about where we come from. Although you say absolutely none, we list the name of Andrew Jackson, who is the senior economist of the Canadian Labour Congress, and in my view the trade union movement is part of the real world.

I actually have a real problem, frankly, with the view that universities are not part of the real world. I have spent my life there. What is unreal about it? I would have thought that we could build a case, frankly, that those of us who teach at universities and have tenure can afford to be honest and can afford to state what our views are and can afford to put forward objective analysis. So I offer no apologies at all for putting out a statement signed by university professors. I frankly think that we are all experts—we are all economists—and our view should be taken seriously, as seriously as anyone else's views. We are not better than other people, but we are certainly not worse.

Mr Kwinter: I am not suggesting you are worse. I am also not suggesting you are any better.

Let me give you three quotes:

"Ontario is throwing caution to the wind by tripling its debt"—Larry Atkinson, chief economist at the Bank of Montreal.

"I think what worries us is the fact that the deficit is expected to remain high over the next several years. We are already in a province that is widely viewed by members of the business community as a high-cost setting"—Don McIvor, chief economist at Sun Life Assurance.

"We are facing an awful lot of borrowing over the next few years, and this certainly won't help us to get interest rates down very quickly"—Ted Carmichael, senior economist at Burns Fry Ltd.

The point I am making is that in any debate you can rally your supporters, and on the other side they can rally their supporters. My concern is that when looking at this, the uninformed say, "Wow, look at all these university types who think this is a great budget," when out in the real world—and when I say the real world, it includes economists and includes academics or labour economists, whatever it is—there is absolutely a difference of opinion. There is a difference of opinion out there, and there are people who think this budget is a bad budget.

I am not in any way saying you are not entitled to your views. I just feel that to list these people to try to bolster your argument gives a bit of a distorted view. I would have been a little happier if half of them had been academics and half of them had been business people, people who are out in international trade and financial circles, people of that kind.

Mr Watkins: With the greatest of respect, I think you are naïve in imagining that the chief economist of any bank in Canada would sign a statement supporting this kind of budget. That goes back to my point about the freedom that exists for those of us who work at universities. I can assure you that some of the names you have listed were very critical of the last government. I know some of these economists as economists, and they thought the last government was spending too much—I am sure you have all heard that said—and was failing to run surpluses during the good times.

Of course there are different points of view about economics. It is a social science; that is true. So what is logic for putting forward this statement? We are not trying to say we represent the totality of the spectrum of opinion. We do not. I think our concern was that the media was creating an impression, because of the extraordinary power of the business community in that area, that there were really no economists who were in support of this kind of budgetary policy, that somehow this was beyond the realm of the feasible and the sensible. A group of us got together and said: "There are a lot of economists in Canada who think this is, if anything, a modest and a very sensible budget. Why don't we issue a statement that says that?" That is what we are doing and we are not pretending to do anything other than that.

I would not have thought it was worth my while to go to get the chief economist of one of the banks in Canada to sign such a statement. I think that is an unrealistic notion of who pays the salaries of these people and of what a neo-conservative mind is like.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Watkins, I would like to get your comments and your explanation as an economist on something. On page 3 of your presentation, you say: "Short-term interest rates have continued to decline since the Ontario budget was released, and it is in the capacity of the Bank of Canada to permit further declines, given the current level of US interest rates. These would further allow the value of the Canadian dollar to fall, thus promoting the recovery of export industries."

When I read this, I get the impression that you are implying that as interest rates have come down, the value of the Canadian dollar has come down, and that if the Bank of Canada would only accelerate the decrease in interest rates, this would, as you say, "further allow the value of the Canadian dollar to fall." In fact, interest rates have come down and, if anything, the Canadian dollar has gone up. It is at its highest level. This morning it was 87.3. It has certainly not come down one bit other than a very marginal decrease over a flurry about the so-called scandal in Ottawa. There does not seem to be a correlation even though economists have maintained that if the interest rates came down, the value of the dollar would come down. Because of the high interest rates, it is supporting the high value of the dollar. Could you explain that?

Mr Watkins: I think the answer to this puzzle is that what is at issue is relative real rates of interest. Canadian interest rates have fallen, but so have American rates and so have rates in other countries. What is at issue here in terms of determining the effect on the value of the Canadian dollar is the real differential, the differential between Canada and the rest of the world and not simply Canada and the United States. That differential has not narrowed, so as our rates have fallen, American rates have fallen too. There has been no narrowing of the real differential.

I can assure you, if you follow the business press, including the recent issue around the charges laid by Mr Kealey, that the Bank of Canada has moved very briskly to shore up the Canadian dollar by saying it will raise interest rates if the Canadian dollar begins to fall. So the correlation here is compelling and literally perfect, not only in some long-run macro sense, but given the mindset of the current governor of the Bank of Canada.

All we are saying here is, take a chance. Let the interest rate differential narrow. It is at an unprecedented level historically in recent years. We have not traditionally maintained this kind of real differential between American and Canadian rates. What will happen is that the Canadian dollar will begin to fall. Let it fall.

The good effects are that you will get more jobs in the export industries and in import-competing industries. What are the bad effects? It will have an inflationary effect, that is true, but economics being the dismal science it is, you sometimes have to make choices. The present government and the bank are obsessed with this zero inflation view, and the reason they will not let the Canadian dollar fall is because a fall would have some effect on increasing inflation rates. I would disagree with that.

Mrs Cunningham: I apologize, Professor Watkins. I read it but did not hear you deliver it. I have heard your statements in response to the Liberal questions. My colleague Mr Sterling has given me some questions and I have some of my own from listening to you.

First of all, I am interested in your group, the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives. This is a group of professors or university employees from across Canada? Is that the makeup of the group you represent? I am just curious to know what this group is.

Mr Watkins: Yes. Most of the members of the centre would be faculty members at universities.

Mrs Cunningham: And it is based in Ottawa?

Mr Watkins: Yes, it is.

Mrs Cunningham: With the purpose of giving advice to the public sector, or giving advice to private enterprise?

Mr Watkins: Anybody who will listen, I am sure.

Mrs Cunningham: Anybody who listens.

Mr Watkins: It is a research institute. There are many of these now in Canada. I do not wish to deceive you; this research institute tends to consist of people who are more progressive in their politics.

Mrs Cunningham: Like myself—Progressive Conservative.

Mr Watkins: I do not know whether any of our institutional members are in the business community. I certainly know that there are a number of trade unions that are institutional supporters of this group.

Mrs Cunningham: But you are self-employed. You are not paid by the university, or a university.

Mr Watkins: In my case?

Mrs Cunningham: Yes.

Mr Watkins: I am a professor at the University of Toronto.

Mrs Cunningham: Okay. I am sorry; I thought that is what you were. So certain professors are associated with this.

Mr Watkins: Yes. We pay $25 a year. We are members of this centre and we write things and they publish our research and so on.

Mrs Cunningham: So there may be a paid staff.

Mr Watkins: I think there is one person.

Mrs Cunningham: All right. I am associated in some ways with the University of Western Ontario and the business school and I certainly know some economists there who would not share your view, but you are not surprised to hear that.

Mr Watkins: I am not surprised to hear that, no.

Mrs Cunningham: In the public hearings we have already had, certainly our party, and in our travels around the province and in certain other hearings at this Legislative Building, there were a number of representatives from the business community who were very much opposed to the budget. I am wondering how, given what I have heard so far, you could take strong opposition or not support them in some way with your statements—or would you support them in some way? I am talking about their concerns.

Mr Watkins: I think one always takes business concerns seriously because business is very powerful in our society. I do not doubt that business attitudes and business confidence matter, and it is very hard for us as economists to factor into the models we work with.

I guess my own view as an economist is—I do not want to just repeat myself here—that these high interest rates, the differential with the United States, the high Canadian dollar, raising a tax like the GST in the midst of a recession, are the basic determinants of the difficulties we are now having, so I do not necessarily see that I have to give a lot of weight to something called business confidence. I do not deny that in a world where private businesses make decisions and make investment decisions, if they are all unhappy you could have a problem. You have to listen to what is being said. I do not deny that at all.

The other problem I have, though, is that we all, as well as being experts, often grind ideological axes, I am sure. Perhaps I have on occasion, but certainly the business community is very fond of doing that. What is going on here is really a debate about the size of government and about the kinds of spending the government ought to engage in.

Why is the business community so nervous about an NDP government? Well, because they fear that government might actually worry about the fate of a lot of people. If they spend more or do not cut spending, they may have to tax more. I do not want to go too far down this road, but the Ontario tax system is a very unfair system. Once you start talking about reform of the system in any direction that involves fairness, it may well mean that well-to-do people or business people will pay more taxes.

We see that every day in the US. The obsession of the US on the right wing is that under no circumstances will they ever pay another penny of tax. That is the neo-conservative mind. The reason they are so nervous about any kind of deficit is because somebody might actually decide to deal with the deficit by increasing taxes in a way that would require those people to pay some taxes. The notion of a minimum corporate tax truly frightens them.

That is the problem. I think the deficit is a real issue, but it has also become a whole code language for the business community, a whole way in which it pursues other goals. They really want to downscale the size of government in the long run. They are not basically dealing with the short-term problem. They properly sense that NDP governments are not as pro-business as Conservative governments or Liberal governments.

Mrs Cunningham: Let's talk about downsizing government. I myself worked in the government before I let my name stand for election in London, and I also had a private business that did government audits of three of the different ministries. I can assure you that the audit branches of those ministries have advised government of the inefficiencies. A lot of it relates to new programs without changing old programs that may have been relevant at some time and to people not working at the level of expectation some of us would expect. Of course, universities have been criticized for that too—you and I know that—but I will say that they have been given some very specific recommendations in their audit reports as to how they can be more efficient. It does not always mean downsizing and it does not always mean spending more money.

Mr Watkins: No, I can agree.

Mrs Cunningham: I would appreciate your comments on those two straightforward recommendations by government employees as well as private sector people like myself.

Mr Watkins: I have an impression, with the greatest of respect, that this province was governed for 42 years by the Conservative Party.

Mrs Cunningham: You are quite right.

Mr Watkins: How come so much inefficiency exists in the public sector then?

Mrs Cunningham: I would say that the Conservative Party, during its period of time, was guilty of what I am describing. So were the Liberals, and the NDP has not done anything about it. I am not here, certainly as a parent, to talk about the past. I let my name stand because I wanted to do something about the future so that Ontario could remain competitive.

Mr Watkins: Fair enough, although if there are problems—

Mrs Cunningham: I do not like that response. I do not think that is a particularly professional response.

Mr Watkins: If there are problems—

Mrs Cunningham: I am looking for solutions.

Mr Watkins: Well, we cannot find a solution—

Mrs Cunningham: That is why you are here, to help us and this government with solutions.

Mr Watkins: All right. We need a diagnosis too, do we not? I do not go to a doctor and just ask him to tell me what to do without giving me a diagnosis. I am saying, if the public sector is inefficient, how did it get to be inefficient?

Mrs Cunningham: Your response on what we do about it is what I am looking for today.

Mr Watkins: I would have hoped that we now have a government which will try to improve on the efficiency with which public services are delivered. I might say, I dissociate myself from any comment that suggests that universities are somehow being inefficient.

Mrs Cunningham: I did not say that. I said they were being accused of being inefficient, and that is not new. It was sort of an aside remark.

Mr Watkins: I just want to dissociate myself, though.

Mrs Cunningham: It is certainly something that the government is dealing with through its standing committee on public accounts. I had to sit there and listen to it. We are looking for solutions today.

Let me ask you another question. You talked about a 3% unemployment rate. I would like you to describe, since you are an economist, when this province enjoyed a 3% unemployment rate. Do you think that is something we can achieve in the next four or five years, and if so, how?

Mr Watkins: We have had a persistent problem with high levels of unemployment for something like two decades, throughout the 1970s and the 1980s. To go back to a 3% level would be literally to go back to the 1960s. Apparently there is something profoundly malfunctioning in our present economies. I think that is what we know. There are some very serious structural problems. I would not anticipate that we could move easily or quickly to those kinds of low levels of unemployment. I certainly grant that.

I think this is why Keynesian economics of the stimulative type are now in trouble. There are two responses when that happens. One is to say that government should do less—that is the neo-conservative solution—and become more efficient and so on. The other is to say that actually the private sector is the source of the problem and governments are going to have to do more rather than less. That is what this great debate is about.

Basically, the neo-conservatives have been running things now for 10, 15, 20 years, and yet things are not improving. Unless they start to improve soon, I suspect that what the Ontario electorate has done will happen more generally. The public is going to start looking for more activist governments. Perhaps I am just engaging in some wishful thinking here.

My argument would be simply that it is quite a severe crisis. It is not the 1930s, but there has been a persistent crisis of slow growth and inadequate productivity. It is quite complicated. The present Ontario government is the first government in my lifetime which seems to understand that this is a problem, and may therefore try to do something about it.

Mrs Cunningham: I am wondering if you would agree with the observation we have heard many times, and that is the excessive government spending, certainly giving rise to the criticism of the former government during what was described by economists as good economic times. I am now talking about 1985 to 1990. I do not know if you would agree with that, but I would like you to comment on it. That government was certainly viewed by some as being excessive in its spending during the good times. Do you have any comment on that?

Mr Watkins: I think I said already that certainly there would be economists who would have wished that the previous Liberal government had run surpluses.

Mr Phillips: It did. We know that.

Mr Watkins: In economics we are interested in what is true at the margin—larger surpluses then, so that we could have cushioned this. I am not necessarily saying I could press that very hard. I am not convinced myself that the major problem we face is excessive government spending; let's put it that way.

Certainly in some short-run sense to slash government spending, as the federal government is doing, just pushes the problems down on to lower levels of government. It does not solve anything. It is all a kind of scam they are engaged in. The public is not being deceived by it. I would have thought that is one reason the present federal government is so unpopular, that it is seen as avoiding problems rather than solving problems, and worsening economic issues.

I have no problem with someone saying—I would guess no one in this government has—that you should deliver public services as efficiently as you can. I do not have a problem with that.

Mrs Cunningham: I see us moving in the same direction as the federal government found itself in some five or ten years ago, and that was an excessive deficit. Their challenge is, of course, not to increase it. Given the size of it in Canada today, they increase it exactly by the amount of the interest payments they have to pay on that particular debt. I should have used the word "debt" instead of "deficit."

In Ontario, all of us—I believe the government members themselves, in talking individually to them, and certainly the ministers—are very concerned about the direction this province seems to be going in, and yet they have not found a solution. That is why we are having these hearings, to get some solutions.

It is all right to say the federal government is passing the buck down to the provincial government. At the same time, the provincial government has been accused of passing the debt down to the municipalities, and the municipalities therefore to the taxpayers. But we are looking for solutions today. It is fine to say they are slashing spending federally, but they are certainly keeping the—the deficit is growing by interest payments on the debt, almost exactly, which means if they did not have the debt, they would probably be balancing their budget.

What kind of solution should this government be looking for so that it does not become so large in the next five years that we have yet another crisis?

Mr Watkins: I think you are overstating. I do not know what numbers you are relying on to—

Mrs Cunningham: Basically government budget—

Mr Watkins: Let us just look at this for a moment. Probably the best measure for the burden of the debt would be the percentage of government revenues consumed by interest on that debt. The number here at the moment in Ontario is 11.6% or 12%, let us say, rounding. The forecast in the budget documents—I think every economist I know regards those growth forecasts as on the conservative side. Unlike many federal estimates we have had in recent years, these are likely to stand up, and they show that ratio will fall slightly over the next three or four years, let us say to 11%. What is the present federal number, 34%? Now that is a huge difference. I want to underline this point: The present policies of this government will not get us into the fiscal trap that has been created at the federal level. I am appalled at what has happened at the federal level. I agree with you on that—

Mrs Cunningham: It was inherited, of course.

Mr Watkins: —but this is not happening in Ontario. This is not in the cards in Ontario.

Now on the other question, what do I say? I say this is a good budget. It speaks to the short term and it indicates the government, as I read it, is thinking very seriously about long-term matters as well. We have no evidence of any kind of industrial policy at the federal level. You combine the short term and the long term and we have a federal government which is backed up in both areas. This present government here in Ontario, it seems to me, has a good short-term policy and is working towards a good long-term policy.

Mrs Cunningham: And that is why we have the great concern about industry and business leaving Ontario.

Mr Watkins: I hear the grinding of ideological axes.

Mrs Cunningham: We see the numbers. In my own southwest Ontario, unfortunately, I sit here saying that I today represent some 20 more companies which are locating businesses elsewhere, and not in Ontario; not all south of the border, but not in Ontario. It is not a joke when people come into my office and tell me after the fact that they have done it.

Mr Watkins: I agree with you that no job loss—

Mrs Cunningham: These are small business people, and about three or four major companies for Ontario; big tax dollars there.

Mr Watkins: All I can tell you is that if you look at the studies done on competitiveness put out by quite conservative bodies, they show that the Ontario economy is, and remains, highly competitive, and that is a fact.

Mrs Cunningham: I would like you to at least leave them with the clerk, or titles of them that we can read, because unfortunately we are reading the other stuff. The Premier's Council, certainly in the last four years, has made the same recommendations year after year, that we were not competitive, that we are not training our young people for a competitive environment. As an educator, I happen to agree with that.

Mr Watkins: On the training issue, these studies show that Ontario, in terms of public spending—and this then reflects on past government favourably—ranks very well in terms of public sector spending in this area. We rank very well in Ontario and in Canada in public sector spending on research and development. The basic problem is the failure of the private sector. We rank very low in terms of private sector R&D, in part because of high levels of foreign ownership. We rank very low, one of the lowest in the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development countries, in terms of what the private sector does in the training area. The private sector in this province is much more a part of the problem, substantially a part of the problem.

Mrs Cunningham: I would agree with you.

The Chair: Mrs Cunningham, your time is well up.

Mrs Cunningham: Yes, it is up, well up. Sorry; I was not certain of the time frame. Thank you very much. We could pursue this argument elsewhere.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Watkins, for coming this morning. This committee will be adjourned until 2:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1107.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1432.

SOCIAL PLANNING COUNCIL OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

The Chair: I think I would like to begin this afternoon. We are reasonably on time and I see a quorum.

I would like to begin by introducing the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, Fern Stimpson, ward member, and if you could introduce who you have brought along to the committee, we would like to begin. The way we will do this is that we have half an hour. You will make your presentation and whatever time is left over will be evenly divided among the three parties to ask questions for that half-hour.

Mr Phillips: Mr Chairman, I am sorry, before we begin, I do not know whether we have had an opportunity to table a report that our caucus did on the budget. If we have not done that, I would like to do that, just sort of interrupt and take a half a second. I think it may be of interest to the committee members. I am sure they will all get a copy of it. Perhaps I could do that, just to table our report.

The Chair: If you could do it quickly.

Mr Phillips: I have just done it.

The Chair: Thank you. If that is all it entails, then that is wonderful. Now if you could begin, please.

Ms Stimpson: I would like to introduce Tom Baker, who is with me this afternoon. He is a staff member with the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto and is responsible for the research that has gone into our submission.

The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto is extremely pleased to have the opportunity to present our views on the provincial budget. Basically, we believe that the budget was a very positive action by the provincial government.

The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, just to give you a bit of background, has been part of Toronto's social history for more than 50 years. Rather than focusing on narrow, service planning issues, the council's reform and advocacy efforts now emphasize the need for policy which integrates both economic and social issues.

Through collaboration with its various committees, the council is more committed than ever to a social development framework which is based on social and economic equity and community empowerment, the roots of a healthy community. We believe that by choosing to fight the recession rather than the provincial deficit, the provincial government enhanced social and economic equity in the province of Ontario.

The council, in its work within six theme areas, which are housing, employment, income security, social justice, families and neighbourhood and community services, strives to implement its mission through a set of interrelated strategies—the pursuit of access and equity, empowerment and healthy communities—and it uses functions of social research and policy analysis, community education, community advocacy and innovative services development in pursuit of these strategies.

In 1990, there were approximately 397 members of the council. Its membership is composed of 276 individuals and 121 organizations with two delegates each. The council is supported by its two major funders, the United Way of Greater Toronto and the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. We greatly appreciate their commitment.

By refusing to jump on the cutback bandwagon, the provincial government has not shifted its responsibilities to already financially constrained municipalities and federated charities. What the provincial government's budget has done is to seek middle ground. For example, the Treasurer acknowledged the difficulty in Ontario's workforce in giving an immediate $7.50 an hour wage floor, but at the same time, he did not cut back Ontario's social safety net.

The total provincial debt is estimated now at about $58 billion. Let's see what actually erasing this debt would mean.

"The budget was a confidence builder," says chief economist and vice-president of the Conference Board of Canada, James Frank. Reducing the deficit "would have led to a significant delay in the recovery and contributed to further increases in unemployment, bankruptcies and lost output. I believe most people in Ontario, including many business people, have had enough of the recession and the weak housing starts, sluggish automobile sales, dropping employment and increasing bankruptcies."

Spending on new programs only added $640 million to the $9.7-billion deficit. Health, education, social assistance and more capital spending accounts for most of it.

"Had measures been taken to hold the line on operating expenditures, which rose by $5.2 billion, or on capital expenditures, which rose by $1 billion, we could easily have ended up with a much longer recession," says Frank.

"I think it's a move in the right direction to do something for a province that has been particularly hard done by in recent years," says Informetrica president Mike McCracken.

"The government's anti-recession program will create up to 14,000 jobs in 1990 and 1991 through projects to maintain and improve public facilities like schools, hospitals, colleges and universities," says Ontario Treasurer Floyd Laughren. "As a result of additional funding from school boards, hospitals, municipalities who are sharing in the projects, total spending will amount to $940 million, $700 million of which is from the province."

"The 1991 budget reflects a political choice to fight the recession this year and allow the deficit to increase as a result. By choosing not to cut back in funding for schools, colleges and universities, hospitals, municipalities and social services, there are 70,000 more people with jobs in Ontario than there would have been with a zero deficit."

Cuts in spending would only mean less service, more local property taxes and a longer recession. If the government had not increased spending commitments, the deficit would still be more than $7 billion.

"In order to keep the deficit at last year's level, $3 billion, we would have had to cut more than $6 billion in public funding," says Ontario Treasurer Floyd Laughren. "The magnitude of these cuts is staggering. We could have flat-lined the major transfer payments and saved $1.3 billion in the process, but what would that have meant to our major transfer recipients? Enrolment in colleges and universities would have been cut by 25,000. Almost 5,000 or 10% of hospital beds would have been closed. Without additional funds for municipalities and school boards, either property taxes would have increased by about 4.2% over 1990 levels or 6,000 classrooms would have closed and public health operations would have been slashed by 33%. We also could have eliminated all new spending initiatives, discontinued the home care programs for seniors and the disabled, discontinued the legal aid program, eliminated the winter maintenance program for provincial highways, eliminated the technology fund, slashed welfare rates by 10%, dropped the Ontario drug benefit for both seniors and social assistance recipients."

Health care costs make up about 32% of the provincial budget. If 32% of the provincial debt was taken from provincial ridings equally, each riding would have had to absorb a $143-million cut. In the case of Peterborough, for example, that means closing the city's hospital.

What about Metropolitan Toronto? Social service costs make up 19% of the provincial budget. If we took 19% of the provincial debt from provincial ridings equally, Metro ridings would have had to absorb a $2.5-billion cut. That would have meant closing all of the region's homes for the aged and possibly throwing developmentally challenged people out on the streets. Workshops for the disabled might have been shut. It still would not have been enough money to get by. In the midst of Ontario's worst recession since the 1930s, more than half of the new $215 million for social assistance this year will go to maintain the current system and address increased case loads.

The federal government's transfer payment cuts to Ontario of $3.6 billion have left the Treasurer with little room to move. We have been monitoring closely in order to ensure the government's commitment to fairness and to ensure that it is not sacrificed to expediency.

In the spring of 1991, Canada remained mired in a year-long recession, a result of deliberate government policies intended to eradicate inflation. Although current analysis suggests that the recession technically may have ended by May 1991, the high proportion of permanent plant closures make it doubtful that the economy will enjoy a strong recovery. The Toronto region, with its heavier dependence on manufacturing, has suffered more than other parts of the country in this recession, unlike the recession of 1981-82, which was driven more by increased global competition in the resource industries.

Let's compare the last two recessions and how they came about and manifested themselves in the Toronto area and the relative prospects for recovery.

A recession is defined, in narrow economic terms, as two or more successive quarters of economic contraction. In simple terms, it means that the value of what we produce is less, so the economic pie that is shared is getting smaller. Canada entered a recession early in the second quarter of 1990 and by the first quarter of 1991 had suffered a 2.8% decline in the gross domestic product.

However, for most people a recession is best understood in terms of unemployment. From a low of 7.5% in the late 1980s, official unemployment rose to over 8% in the third quarter of 1990, over 9% in the fourth quarter and over 10% in the early part of 1991, a seasonally adjusted number.

This recession follows a prolonged period of growth after the recession of 1981-82, which has been called the worst economic downturn since the Great Depression of the 1930s. It took national unemployment rates eight years to come down to approximately 7.5%, the pre-recession rate, from a peak of nearly 12% in the fall and winter of 1982-83. Official unemployment declined by creating record numbers of part-time jobs, increasing the polarization of earnings and proliferating erratic patterns of working hours. Other indicators, such as the GDP, which fell by 6.6%, and corporate profits, which fell by 40%, were restored by early 1983, in less than 18 months. This shows that there are several definitions of when a recession is over.

The federal government has played a critical role in both recessions. In late 1980 the Bank of Canada began to raise interest rates, reasoning that we needed to match the American interest rate policy to prevent capital flowing to the US. In tandem with an improvement in natural resource commodity exports, the Canadian interest rate differential over the Federal Reserve rate in the US narrowed considerably, thus contributing to the decline in our dollar. A key factor in the sustained period of post-recessionary economic growth enjoyed in central Canada.

By the spring of 1988, the Bank of Canada began to raise interest rates again. This was necessary, according to the minutes of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, to prevent an outbreak of inflation before it began. In fact, inflation had been stable at around 4% since 1982. Particularly worrisome to the bank was evidence of upward pressures on domestic costs of production, especially wages. By mid-1990, our interest rates were continuing to climb but American interest rates were declining, leading to the "made in Canada" label associated with this particular recession. The growing divergence in interest rates resulted in higher exchange rates, making Canadian exports more expensive in our principal export market, the United States.

Rising interest rates also slow the domestic economy by increasing the cost of financing productive investment as compared to investing in financial assets such as bonds. Slowdowns in economic growth created greater tensions over shares of the gross domestic product both in the early and the late 1980s. By the late 1980s, sustained economic growth had led to a relatively tighter labour market, at least in some parts of the country, which in turn led to workers' ability to maintain wage and salary levels. In the context of a shrinking economic pie, this meant that wages took a larger share of the national income. In this regard, the federal budget of February 1990 noted that "rising labour costs and weakening demand are squeezing profit margins."

While the 1981-82 recession had broad national repercussions, both the recovery and the current recession have en highly centralized in southern Ontario. The gap between national unemployment rates and unemployment rates in the Toronto area, the Metro labour market, widened over the course of the 1980s as the recovery was disproportionately centred in the Toronto region. Almost 80% of the new jobs created in Canada between 1983 and 1989 were located in Ontario, with more than 20% created in the Toronto region alone. Unemployment rates in Quebec and Ontario returned to pre-recessionary levels by 1986 and continued to drop, but many parts of the country remained at stubbornly high levels, even in mid-1990 when the national rate began to rise again.

The current recession has been led by the free fall of the manufacturing sector, concentrated primarily in southern Ontario. Recent data show that unemployment has risen much more quickly in the Toronto area than in the rest of the country, with the result that the gap between the Toronto unemployment rate and the national unemployment rate has narrowed considerably. As expected, this recession has been much harder on the local labour market than the last one when, over the course of 18 months, the Toronto census metropolitan area lost 113,000 jobs. Thus far into this recession we have lost 178,000 jobs, with 104,000 lost over the course of the first quarter of 1991 alone. Whereas the continuing erosion of jobs was expected as the manufacturing sector restructures continentally, it is the precipitous nature of this decline which was unexpected. The Ontario government has reported that, among firms with more than 50 employees, "65% of layoffs in 1990 were the result of permanent plant closures, in contrast to the previous recession when 24% of layoffs were permanent."

450 The restrictions on unemployment insurance and Bill C-69, the so-called cap on CAP, the Canada assistance plan, have weakened the programs which automatically sustain people and the economy in an economic downturn. The impact of the recent UI changes has been to push people from the unemployment insurance system on to the local social assistance case load, harkening back to the system of municipal relief which was prevalent at the turn of the century. Federal projections indicate that in Metropolitan Toronto alone 127,000 people will exhaust their UI benefits over the next 12-month period. The municipality has conservatively estimated that 60,000 of these exhaustees will end up on welfare unless massive job creation occurs in the near future.

Bill C-69, although not yet implemented due to a challenge before the Supreme Court of Canada, seeks to restrict the amount of money to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia for social assistance, forcing the provinces to either increasingly fund the program themselves or cut back. Bill C-69, if it becomes law, combined with the $2.5 billion in cuts in federal established programs financing, will cost Ontario approximately $3.6 billion in 1991-92. Because the cost of general welfare assistance is further cost-shared with the municipalities and because the welfare case load is the first to grow in a recession, these budgetary pressures translate to harder times and tougher decisions in all municipalities.

Under general welfare, 20% of costs are paid by Metropolitan Toronto. Family benefits allowances are financed by the province under a cost-sharing agreement with the federal government. The combined costs of general welfare assistance payments by the federal, provincial and the regional governments will be about $830 million for Metro Toronto in 1991. Metro Toronto will spend about $167 million on welfare payments in 1991.

In a recession, a poor-relief welfare policy can mean property tax increases on a comparatively narrow revenue base. It compounds the problem of access by endangering service in other areas like roads, recreation and safety.

Access is the key organizational and client issue in human service planning. Organizational access means the participation of clients in the design, planning, implementation and delivery of services as volunteers, staff or service agency board members. Client access means the securing of needed services, not only their availability.

The political impact of the recession in Metropolitan Toronto can be summarized as a reduction in access to the labour market, to housing, to child care, to transit and to welfare. These are key areas for which Metro Toronto has considerable responsibility.

There are 7,500 people on the waiting list for subsidized child care spaces in Metro. One quarter of the unsubsidized child care centre spaces are vacant due to affordability problems. The SPC has called for a continuum of child care services, including workplace-based and after-school child care programs to provide more flexibility for Metro families.

Only 18% of social assistance recipients have access to assisted housing, but basement apartments, one vehicle for increasing the supply of affordable rental housing, are illegal in Rosedale, Forest Hill, Scarborough, North York and Etobicoke. The waiting list for Metro's subsidized rental units has skyrocketed. For instance, the queue for Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority units has reached a 15-year high of 12,310. While rental vacancies are up, mostly because condominium units are being put up for rent because owners cannot sell them, many condominium units will be taken off the rental market as the home ownership market recovers.

Few areas impact on access more directly than the transit area. Securing work, health and social services is intimately bound up with transportation. "In the absence of major improvements in suburban public transit systems or integration of those systems with the Toronto Transit Commission's (TTC), the number of suburban commuters into Metro will add further to Metro's road congestion," says an SPC Social Infopac. "Metro is increasingly characterized as a transit-efficient and intensified inner city surrounded by a fast-growing and car-dependent suburban ring, what a local transit planner has characterized as Vienna surrounded by Phoenix." The recession has also produced cuts on several public transit routes.

There were more than 134,700 people on general welfare assistance in Metro Toronto in June 1991. Between March 1990 and March 1991 the Metro welfare roll increased 90%, from 68,369 to 129,441. In March 1981 there were 40,599 claimants. This represents a staggering 219% increase in the number of people without access to employment in just a 10-year period.

In March 1991, 113,360 people in Metro received family benefits allowances. In total, in March 1991, 242,801 people were receiving general welfare or family benefits in Metro. Approximately 10% of Metro's population now relies on family benefits or welfare. Children under the age of 18 make up 40% of all social assistance recipients.

When you factor in a further 175,290 regular—that is, not sickness, disability or maternity—UI claimants in the month of March, more than 400,000 people in Metropolitan Toronto—one in five of the entire population—are being marginalized by this period of profound economic restructuring. That is why the provincial budget has to fight the recession and not the deficit.

Given the human costs of recession and the uneven distribution of gains from a market-driven recovery as experienced in the 1980s, it is worth asking how a planned economic recovery program like that in the provincial budget will improve the picture.

Until recently, the accepted vehicles for public policy to offset a recession were countercyclical mechanisms such as government expenditures on direct job creation programs and subsidies for failing private industries. Governments did not intervene strategically to decide what kind of focus the economy would have, so that ultimately the market shaped the direction and the strength of economic recovery. But given the degree of permanent job loss and the related decimation of our productive base during the last 18 months, can this approach be sustained? The evidence suggests not, and that governments are challenged as never before to provide public leadership for the rebuilding of our industrial base.

Let's look at some of the elements of an industrial strategy which are designed to achieve a more balanced recovery in which more people share in the gains. A meaningful industrial strategy must target the manufacturing sector, due to its ability to spin off jobs in other economic sectors when new jobs are created there. Public policy levers available to governments should not be conceived as strictly economic or social, but as a combination of both. For example, public policies on land use, including housing, child care, transit, and job training and adjustment can shape the economic viability of individual communities.

One of the public policy levers available for an industrial strategy is construction intensification. This policy replaces low tax-yield properties within the existing urban envelope with higher density developments. This is done through mainstreaming—mixing retail and residential buildings above stores—and making basement apartments. Such an approach would increase the stock of affordable housing while providing Metro with money to invest in an infrastructural improvement. This would put money in consumers' pockets, create jobs in manufacturing industries and preserve the neighbourhood character of the city.

Spending on infrastructure can also be directed towards hard or soft service investments. For example, there is considerable evidence that there is a direct relationship between productivity growth and public spending. Public spending includes not only expenditures to maintain or build roads and sewers, but also social services such as health, education, research and development programs.

Renewed concerns about competing in a global economy have frequently focused on the need to cut social spending, but we need to have a skilled workforce in order to compete. The role of public policy is to advance a skill development strategy which is co-ordinated with labour adjustment needs in a period of economic restructuring. Furthermore, it is only through the mechanism of public policy that we can integrate training programs with an industrial strategy. This could be both through general upgrading needs as well as specific sectoral needs for a strategically focused economy. In other words, we have to be clear about what kinds of jobs we are training for and what kind of society we are building.

Child care is usually seen strictly as a social policy issue. Yet a child care system designed to be accessible in terms of appropriateness and affordability could play a key role in enhancing the economic wellbeing of families and reducing reliance on social assistance.

Clearly, people policies can make an important contribution to achieving and sustaining economic prosperity. Rather than seeing social policies as the source of labour market rigidities which impede economic adjustments, we maintain that they can play a critical role in enhancing worker security and easing labour market adjustment in periods of rapid economic change. That is why we support the provincial budget.

The political alternative is rapidly emerging in public policy debates at all levels. To the extent the social wage—that portion of income workers forgo in exchange for securing needed human services like transit, child care, waste removal and welfare assistance, is eroded, the more likely it will become that conflict will sharpen in broader areas of economic and social concern, particularly in tax administration, employment and general economic development, as well as national unity.

At the Social Planning Council we have often repeated that access, equity and partnership are the three key strategies for attaining sustainable economic prosperity. I would like to thank you for the opportunity to appear here this afternoon and for your attention. If time permits, we would happily field questions.

The Chair: We have very few minutes. I think we have enough time for one question per party. We can begin with Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Restricting myself to one question is very difficult. I was curious to see that you quoted extensively from James Frank, the chief economist and vice president of the Conference Board of Canada. You started with, "The budget was a confidence-builder," which I assume you endorse and think it is. Having said that, I should tell you that upon hearing that the Conference Board of Canada supported the NDP budget, Brian Gray vice-president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, is quoted as saying: "I don't know where he"

ing. He must be living on Mars if he can say that this budget inspires confidence."

In the next line, it talks about the recovery. Again, I have a quote: "I am rather taken aback by this analysis. I really don't think the Ontario budget has anything to do with the recovery." This is George Savage, chief economist of Montreal Trust.

The reason I am saying that is that the catch phrase being used by the government and the Treasurer is that they chose to fight the recession rather than the deficit, as those are the only two alternatives: You either fight the deficit or you fight the recession.

I submit, and I would like to get your comment, that they chose not to fight the recession; they chose to minimize the impact of the recession by providing money to certain groups. But there is not one single new program that is going to create one new job or do anything to get the economy going. They have put a lot of money into lessening the impact on people who are being impacted by the recession. I would suggest that what it should be saying is, "We chose to relieve some of the problems caused by the recession." But they are not fighting it, because they are not doing anything. If this continues, next year they are going to have to put more money in and more money in, on a declining revenue base, because there is no confidence in what is happening. Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Baker: I think there are a number of areas in which the provincial budget was not simply engaged in a set of countercyclical measures but did begin to introduce elements that a successful industrial strategy would require. Among those would be the impetus the housing industry is receiving. There is a commitment to construct a number of units, which I think will stimulate economic activity in the housing sector, which is a lead sector and provides a lot of backward and forward linkages for other economic sectors in the durable goods manufacturing area.

Mr Sterling: You use a $3.6-billion drop in federal subsidies. Just looking over Floyd's own budget paper, it shows that it goes from $5.8 billion to $5.4 billion. I add that up to be $400,000, not $3.6 billion. But that is not my question, because the $3.6 billion is a never-never figure and does not take into consideration the transfer of tax points which has been in place for about four or five years as well. So it is really dishonest to deal with that in isolation.

Could you explain better for me, "There is considerable evidence that there is a direct relationship between productivity growth and public spending." Is that inversely proportional or proportional?

Mr Baker: As you have asked, I will be glad to tell you that that is a direct proportional relationship that exists between public sector expenditure on infrastructure and productivity growth rates. That evidence has been accumulated from a number of different sources including the United States and members of the European Community as well. I noted that even the Ontario budget paper E cites some of those studies in that direct relationship existing between public sector expenditure increases and productivity growth increases.

Mr Sterling: Do you really believe that?

Mr Baker: I think in fact that a fundamental requirement to developing a sustainable, prosperous economy is to see infrastructural spending more broadly than simply as a Band-Aid on different economic, cyclical items and to look at the positive contribution and the multiplier effect that government spending can have. I will not spend a lot of time on this, but I can recall that the interstate system of the United States, when it declined over a 10-year period in the 1980s, had a significant impact on productivity growth rates in the United States.

The Chair: Sorry, we are really out of time and have to move on.

Mr Sterling: But does increasing provincial civil service salaries by 10% increase productivity?

The Chair: Sorry, I am going to have to move on to the government question.

Ms M. Ward: I would like to thank you for your excellent presentation. I think you gave us a very good background on causes and effects, the implications and the effects we would have seen if we had cut services and so on, and some good recommendations. One thing I would like you to comment on is what the situation is like out there right now in people terms. What are the social costs of this recession?

Mr Baker: We have itemized a number of those, but the human faces on those types of statistics are important to recall too. It means that to the extent we had turned our backs on the disadvantaged in the last budget, we would have been ignoring the crisis that is happening in Ontario in terms of, for example, to take one instance, the homeless that exist in Metro Toronto alone, estimated at anywhere between 10,000 and over 25,000, half of those under the age of 18. There are 4,000 shelter beds available to address that need. If the budget had not instituted a set of measures which were aimed—for example the $215 million in new program spending in Community and Social Services—I think it would have just been a disaster there, and that is just to take one case.

Ms M. Ward: With implications for years to come, possibly.

The Chair: I am sorry, we are out of time. Thank you very much for your presentation this afternoon. If there are other questions, I think the members could get in touch with you privately.

Mr Baker: Please do.

ALLIANCE OF CANADIAN CINEMA, TELEVISION AND RADIO ARTISTS

The Chair: Our next presentation this afternoon is ACTRA, Meg Hogarth, president, and Neil Dainard, Toronto performers branch council. There are more copies of the presentation coming.

Mrs Sullivan: The last presenters gave a very interesting presentation and I think we all would have appreciated a little more time to question them. I wonder if we could ask the presenters if they could attempt to compress the presentation, so that we do have more time for questioning towards the end.

The Chair: I think that would be fair enough.

Ms Hogarth: I appreciate your comments. I think as performers we know exactly what it means: cut time.

Mr Christopherson: If that is done, is there a mechanism whereby the full context of a submission can be included in the Hansard, even if it is not fully read? Is there a mechanism for that?

The Chair: I believe the submission is given to the Hansard reporters and it is included in its entirety, even if it is not spoken? No, only what is spoken is included in Hansard.

Mr Christopherson: So you can lose things you do not say.

Ms Hogarth: Thank you very much. Good afternoon to you, Mr Wiseman, and members of the committee. We are delighted to be here,

I am Meg Hogarth. I am the national president of the Alliance of Canadian Cinema, Television and Radio Artists, ACTRA. I am a Toronto performer. With me today is Neil Dainard. Neil is a member of the Toronto performers branch council, and you probably recognize Neil from the popular CTV series ENG.

ACTRA is an alliance of guilds which represents performers, writers and broadcast journalists working in the English-language recorded media right across Canada. We negotiate agreements. We do this with engagers in broadcasting, in independent production, commercials and film, and these agreements set the minimum rates and basic working conditions for our members. As well, we advocate public policies designed to create strong Canadian broadcasting and film industries. We do so not only to provide work opportunities for our members in Canada, but also to provide Canadians with genuine programming choices.

I understand that you have a very full agenda, so I am going to cut to the chase here and try to be as brief as possible. I have four basic points I would like to make today. First, the film and television industry is a vital part of this province in many ways. Second, like all elements of the cultural industries, that vitality is dependent on public policy and funding at three levels of government. Third, the Ministry of Culture and Communications' contributions to the industry in the 1991-92 budget is in our vision admirable but, fourth, the Ministry of Culture and Communications deserves an even bigger share of the province's expenditures.

The film and television industry is, as I have said, a vital part of this province in more ways than one. Too often the arts are seen as a kind of frill of élites spending enormous sums of money on activities which have a very limited appeal to a small number of people. The arts are characterized as a frill or something that the Legislature has to justify spending money on. Our particular art—film, television and radio—could not be more accessible. Almost everyone in Ontario has a television set and if they cannot find a baby-sitter to manage an outing to the movies, then the local video store will provide them with something they can watch at home. What is more, we could not produce the films and TV programs we do without the support of writers, technicians, costume designers, makeup artists, the whole infrastructure of all the artistic activity.

Mr Dainard: In Canada we talk about culture. South of the border they talk about the business. At ACTRA, we think we are leaders when it comes to the defence of creative expression and its contribution to our sense of nationhood. But we know full well that what we do is a business. Our business is as a producer, employer and significant contributor to the province's economy.

You can probably see that we are not here to preach today. If anything, we would like to leave you with a sense of pride in the film and television activities that are going on in this province, and if we are lucky, we might secure your commitment to further support them in years to come.

A recent study by the Ontario Film Development Corporation, the OFDC, showed that in 1989 the industry employed 35,000 people in Ontario and contributed $5.4 billion to the economy. Those numbers are the reason that 6,500 ACTRA members, or 65% of our national membership, choose to live in this province and work in this province. The benefits to viewers in Canada and abroad are enormous.

We would love to be in a position to say that our industry is self-financing, but it is not. The very proof of the impact of the Ontario industry was determined through a provincially funded study. Another study commissioned by ACTRA but supported by both the federal government and Ontario determined that our industry's profitability and success is dependent on public policy and funding at three levels of government. It is dependent on public policies like Canadian content rules, it is dependent on regulations like increasing the commitments of Canadian broadcasters to Canadian programming and it is dependent on government spending through direct funding, investment and tax incentives, federally through Telefilm Canada and provincially through measures like the OFDC's Ontario film development program. Even the municipal governments are involved through promotional offices like the Toronto film office and liaison with the police to keep traffic flowing around the areas we are shooting our films in.

That brings us to our third point, praise for the Ministry of Culture and Communications' contributions to the industry in the 1991-92 budget. Particular to our interest was the minister's announcement of $31 million for the film and television industry, and within that the $15.4 million this year for the film investment program called OFIP administered by the OFDC.

Without OFIP, the program that I work on, ENG would have had a more difficult time getting off the ground and continuing on into what is now its third year, and so would innumerable other projects, such as a new TV series called Counterstrike which is currently in production, projects like David Cronenberg's new film based on the William Burroughs novel of the same name, Naked Lunch, and projects which have complex financing with both public and private capital.

Ms Hogarth: Finally, we would like to put to you the case for increased funding from MCC for next year. That ministry's share of this province's expenditures dropped between 1989 and 1991 by 0.08%. That does not sound like a whole lot, but it is significant. It amounts to $38 million. We are not alone in suggesting that MCC's share of the provincial pie should be at least 1% of the province's expenditures.

Our industry is vital to the province. It contributes to the financial wellbeing of the economy. But the riches of a society are not calculated or evaluated in its credit rating. The arts of a society are the true reflection, and we at ACTRA work in an area whose product is accessible to everyone. Our business is reliant on a fragile arts infrastructure and on government policies and funding at the three levels of government. Without support from this legislature, our contribution would be a lot less.

Mr Dainard: There are probably many other topics which we could discuss with you. We could explain how attractive our industry is to an increasingly environmentally aware society; we could talk about how the visibility of our industry gives Ontario an international profile; or we could discuss how the products of our business—films, TV, radio, commercials—reflect Ontarians to each other, equally and without prejudice. But perhaps it is time for you to get some air time and we welcome the opportunity to answer your questions.

The Chair: Thank you. We have approximately five minutes for each party and we will begin with the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mrs Cunningham: This is not the first time we have heard from your group. I can remember hearing from your association during the discussions on the lotteries and the lack of direct funding to the arts and to culture, so it is interesting once again to hear from you.

I am wondering if you can give us some idea of this 1%, when you first heard about it or when it was a guideline perhaps for the government of Ontario. Give us a little bit of a history on that one.

Ms Hogarth: The history is Canadian history. It was actually the Liberal government in the province of Quebec that initially made that proposal. It has not been able to completely follow through on it, but that was certainly the goal of that particular government.

You know, when we are talking about television, we are talking about something very germane. We are talking about children who spend more hours in front of a TV set than they spend in school. It is a powerful, powerful social force. It is not just a force for arts. I mean, you have only to sit and watch television with a kid. When the commercials come on, what do they do? They watch. There it is, even the commercials are telling our society what we think about each other and what we think about ourselves as Canadians, and Ontario has the leadership at the moment in film and television production.

Mrs Cunningham: Okay. My second question relates basically to what you have just said. I can remember, as a school board trustee from London many years ago, being part of the commission that looked at the effect of television on children. At that time we encouraged the government of the day to put money into the educational television series, and I am wondering if you have any influence or impact on the programming or any co-ordinated working relationship in the co-ordination of the programming for children that is a part of the education budget of Ontario with the work that you do.

Ms Hogarth: Many of our members are employed as writers and as performers on TVOntario and we negotiate contracts with TVOntario which, frankly, are more favourable contracts than we would negotiate with independent producers, partly because it is an educational medium. It is a medium that provides a good base of work, particularly for new writers and young performers, the Polka Dot Door and those kinds of programs. I think we would like to see a far more actively creative role being played by TVOntario, but that, like everything else, costs bucks.

Mrs Cunningham: I guess the third one has to do with what you said about the advertising. Do you do any consultation with the ministry of consumer affairs?

Ms Hogarth: Yes, we do. We do at different levels. I am talking about we, elected actors, who also have met over the years with various governments. When various governments have been in power, we have met with that ministry to urge various ministries to produce videos that use professional talent. I have also met with them frequently myself on behalf of the women's committees of ACTRA in an effort to improve the presence of women, both in voice-over work and in their representation of women. Of course, we are fighting that battle at the moment at the CRTC over the sexual stereotyping issue.

Mrs Cunningham: I just wanted to conclude by saying I am especially appreciative of your remarks with regard to your role as it affects our nationhood. I congratulate you for the positive influence you have had, not only in young people but I think everyone.

Ms Hogarth: Thank you. Our thanks to those of the rest of you who make the decisions that in part help us do what we do.

Mr Jamison: Thank you for a very good presentation, I think it was very informative. We talked about the benefits of the arts to the economy, for example, the stimulus that can be created there. You also talked about national unity and how our own participation in the arts adds to that. I wonder if you could expand on that.

Mr Dainard: I do not know if I will answer the way you wish perhaps, but I am a bit of an example of an experiment in nationhood in that I was one of the first actors to go and study at the National Theatre School of Canada. That was a great experiment in co-lingualism, and I feel that I am part of the national fabric of this culture in that I have been a pioneer for 30 years trying to get theatre growing, and my roots are as much in Quebec as they are here, because I trained with French actors and actresses. I think there are many of us spread across this country who went to the National Theatre School who feel the same way, and I think everywhere we work we tend to promote co-lingualism and the brotherhood of working in this culture.

Ms Hogarth: Last year in Ontario there were several productions of French plays. I think specifically of Michel Tremblay's La Maison Suspendue. Lilies was another. There were many productions that were mounted in Ontario in English or French-language plays that make, I think, a real statement about Ontario's openness to a multi-cultural environment.

Mr Dainard: I urge you all to see Le Cirque du Soleil as a great example of that—no language necessary.

The Chair: Further questions?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, I wanted to pick up on something said by Mrs Cunningham regarding the nationhood issue and the importance of the OFIP, the Ontario film investment program, and the $15 million. I can remember doing the pre-budget consultation on behalf of the Treasurer and meeting with a group of your representatives talking about that, and the message came through so clearly for us that this was just something at this time in our history we could not afford to be turning our back on. Like you, I am very pleased that both the Treasurer and the minister responsible were able to find the money and ensure that we did not drop this most important ball in the middle of play.

The question I would like to ask you is regarding that part of the arts that you represent. Perhaps you could give us a couple of illustrations of what impact this recession has had on your people and on your industry.

Ms Hogarth: It has had an enormous impact. Most performers, at least a large majority of our membership, certainly in Ontario, earn a base income through doing commercial work, because commercials pay residuals over time, and our commercial income in the past year, which we see as a direct result of free trade, is down $18 million. That translates into a lot of hardship for a lot of actors. As well, production generally is down.

But I would like to refer specifically to OFIP, because many other provinces have a film investment program of one kind or another, but OFIP to me is very distinctively stronger in that it makes a very strong case for Canadian programming. ENG, for instance, would never have got off the ground, and it certainly would not be going into its third year without OFIP, and ENG is a show which is honourably Canadian. It is not trying to disguise itself as coming from another country or being set in another city. This is a real Canadian show that has a tremendous following in the States. When some of our members were down in Los Angeles trying to encourage American producers to come up and use Ontario as a location, everybody wanted to meet anybody who had been in ENG. You know, anybody who was just attending the forum wanted to meet the ENG people.

For instance, if OFIP had not come through when it had, and it was absolutely vital at that time, one of the most reputable Canadian independent producers, Atlantis Films, would have taken a production called Maniac Mansion, which had shot for a year here, to Edmonton. Why? Because he would not have had to pay certain kinds of taxes in order to shoot in Edmonton, and although film and television budgets look as if they are huge, they frequently fly or fail on a very small percentage of the budget. So the fact that OFIP came through when it did meant that Maniac Mansion stayed in Ontario, and that is work for Ontario residents, writers and performers, but it is also for the people who cater the food on the shoot, the makeup artists, the people to drive the trucks and the electricians who change the lights. It is work for many, many thousands of people.

Mrs Sullivan: I have been quite interested in your presentation today, and I think we might ask our researchers to look at some of the studies on the economic impacts of the arts, and there are some very good ones in Ontario that might be of interest. I was quite taken, actually, by the positive approach to this budget because in fact I do not see much positive in this budget for the arts. I see a capital spending which has decreased substantially over the previous years, and I also see operating dollars which as a proportion of the total budget are in fact stable or virtually in decline. Similarly, on the film development projects, program, there is not an increase. You are still working within a stable budget which, given the inflation rate, is a decline. I am quite taken aback by your positive approach to the budget when in fact your industry has been hurt by it.

I know that many people who belong to your organization perform not only in film, television and radio but also in live theatre. We have seen a decision of the current government to decline to participate in the Opera Ball at the House, which would have provided a venue that would have been very useful for a sector of performing artists but also for people who are associated with other sides of performing arts. I am thinking of lighting people, musicians and so on who are also involved in film and television and the kinds of work you two are both involved in. There would also have been a spinoff and in fact new places.

I wonder if you could comment, first of all, on the declining share of proportion of commitment to the arts, and, second, on the opera ballet centre and the impact you think that has had.

Ms Hogarth: I would be glad to. It is true. As I said, it represents a $38-million decrease for us just maintaining where we are at, but the economy as a whole is even more devastating to our industry at the moment. As I tried to explain, to get OFIP at this moment, when literally it was ending and there was no commitment—this was something the Liberal government had put in place. It was a two-year commitment and there was no commitment beyond that, so the fact that this budget has made that commitment for another two years is literally a lifesaver. That is where the enthusiasm comes from. But also in my remarks, which I noted you paid close attention to, I was making the case for an improved commitment come the future, come next year. Yes, sure, thanks very much, that has been great, we do not want to be hopelessly greedy but we do want our share to increase, to improve.

Mr Dainard: As for the Opera Ballet House, some of my colleagues may break my ankles in a couple of weeks but I think that for 30 years this country, provincially and derally, has contributed to the arts in a major way in terms of buildings. They have really outdone themselves in terms of the number of buildings. When I trained in the 1960s there was no theatre for me to go to. By the time I graduated there were dozens of places, and a decade later you cannot count them. I do not think that is wrong. I think it is time now that we turn to looking at people, and in the arts—I am one of the fortunate ones. I am working, and I have always worked, but my colleagues struggle at the poverty line and it is time they got some benefit, so opera ballet people, forgive me.

Mrs Sullivan: Where do you see that coming? How do you see that coming?

Mr Dainard: If you are saving millions of dollars by not pouring concrete, I think you have a few dollars to contribute to productions, and sending yet another flagship production to Europe to brag about culture in this country, which happens a lot, to go into other projects with a few dollars.

Ms Hogarth: There is a project being put together right now on stage. It is called Up Front. It is going to be in the latter part of September. There are going to be 11 productions from across this country, including a production from the Inuit people in the north. They are going to run for a couple of weeks in downtown Toronto.

I do not know what the total budget for this particular venture is, but it is not a huge budget. It is an incredible opportunity for people in Ontario to be able to go and see plays from every region in this country, and they are using a whole bunch of different venues, different theatres. In fact, I gather some of it is actually going to be taking place on the street.

So I am with Neil on the one that puts the money in the people and in the ideas rather than putting the money in the buildings. Money in the buildings is great when you are in times of growth and times of great prosperity. Of course, perhaps our colleagues in the building industry would say to us, "The heck with you, let's start building those buildings." But I do think there are ways.

One of the other reasons I am making a strong case for Up Front is that I have a 20-year-old who has a summer job there. Originally his attitude was, "$5.50 an hour, you have got to be kidding." I mean, this is a boy going into third-year university. He feels he needs to earn more money than that to get himself off the ground for his next year in university. But most of his friends do not have summer jobs and these kids are going to have to go to school and pay their way next year, so it is tough times everywhere.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation. The time is up.

Ms Hogarth: Thank you. We enjoyed meeting you all and we thank you very much for this and we will be back next year for more.

Mr B. Ward: That is a great show, ENG.

Ms Hogarth: Is it not a great show? And all-Canadian, Canadian scripts, Canadian writers, everything.

NOMURA CANADA INC

The Chair: Our next presentation is a return engagement of Mr Leo De Bever from Nomura Canada Inc. Thank you for returning to the committee. The Thursday we had you booked became, as I predicted, a special day for the Liberal Party and we are grateful for your indulgence in returning. So if you could begin, it will be on the same format as the previous two presentations.

Mr De Bever: You asked me here to comment on the first NDP budget. I have some serious reservations about this budget, not so much for what it proposes during the current recession, but because of the deteriorating long-term fiscal position it projects between 1992 and 1995. I think that with the projected expenditure profile it will be very difficult to keep the deficit from rising faster than indicated in the budget without further increasing taxes.

The Treasurer has indicated that he is expecting any criticisms to be accompanied by suggestions on how to do things differently. Given the mood of the province about tax increases, one suggestion might be to see if more cannot be done with the same amount of money. That may seem like a trite suggestion, but I think in many ways it is not clear that money alone is the problem here.

Another suggestion would be that I think there should be more advice not from just economists but also financial analysts about what needs to be done. I understand that some people before this committee have testified in favour of the budget, and I do not expect everyone to agree with me, but generally speaking I find the budget expresses very strong views about what is fair from the standpoint of income distribution, but it pays very little attention to the consequences of specific policies for the viability of the Ontario economy and Ontario enterprises.

There is a strong belief in the business community that this government is hearing but not listening. The budget expresses the need for a partnership between labour, government and business, but the aftermath of the budget shows that this is just not happening.

The people of Ontario elected the NDP government and as such you have the right for four or five years to produce your agenda, but the priorities on that agenda are somewhat different than they would be otherwise and I am not sure that the policies set out in the budget will have the intended results.

The budget's goals of efficiency, prosperity and equity are hard to disagree with in principle but difficult to implement in practice. For instance, the budget makes the point that the business idea of productivity growth is cutting costs and goes on to argue that the focus should instead be on raising productivity. It is really not a point to disagree with, except that there is a problem of timing. Business cannot afford to wait for productivity growth to catch up with wages, payroll taxes, minimum wage laws, plus pay and employment equity provisions.

In that context, I want to draw your attention to the graphs I included with my text that show the development of the distribution of GDP since 1947. These are Canadian numbers. The Ontario numbers would look very similar.

The graphs dispel the notion implicit in parts of the budget that the income distribution in Canada and in Ontario has somehow been shifting away from the ordinary worker towards business interests.

You see the first graph on the first page indicating, in fact, that over time the share of wages and GDP has been rising, and that during the period of the early 1980s when we enjoyed our fastest employment growth the share actually fell, and that over the last few years the share of wages and GDP has again been rising to where now it is close to its historical high. The graph below indicates that the reverse has been happening to profits, and right now the share of the profits and GDP is at its lowest level during the period these numbers have been collected.

The recession has hurt a lot of people, but not all of these people are workers; a lot of these people are small business operators and to a large part they are going to have to give direction to the future creation of income for the whole economy.

In terms of specific comments on the budget, I share the budget's positive assessment of Ontario's economic potential. I do not think anybody disagrees that overall we have a good quality of life and that we have a high level of education for our labour force. If it is true that we are going to have substantive immigration during the 1990s, as I expect, Ontario should get a good share of these additional immigrants and that will boost the local economy.

But my problem is with the course of policy which accentuates some of Ontario's negatives. Ontario's competitive position has deteriorated significantly over the last business cycle. Wage growth has increased 1% to 2% faster for a number of years than in the United States, eroding the wage advantage we enjoyed coming out of the last recession. Excessive public and private growth has driven up operating costs in urban areas, which is the industrial heartland of Ontario. Payroll taxes and property levies have aggravated the competitiveness problem. Finally, Canada's large need for foreign financing has saddled us with high interest rates and a strong currency.

The solution to these problems has to involve reduction in unit labour costs, even if this means lower real wages for a while. It also will require a serious attempt to reduce the impact of government levies on the cost of doing business.

There is no real sense in which business tax can substitute for personal taxes. One often hears the argument that business somehow is not carrying its share. The facts are that business will move to where costs are lowest and individuals will only tolerate high taxes if there are compensating factors. The fact is that Ontario with or without free trade is competing for tax base and talent with other provinces and with a number of US jurisdictions.

Even if all goes well, prospects for manufacturing employment, which tend to be the focus of a lot of discussions in the press, are limited in any case. In 1982, I provided a 10-year forecast indicating that prospects for employment growth in Canada's manufacturing sector would be minimal between 1982 and 1991. It turns out that was a correct assessment, and I believe that it will again be for the next 10 years. The basic reason is that productivity growth in manufacturing is roughly the same as the growth in demand for manufactured products. Hence, output expands but employment does not.

The only way to remain competitive in that environment is to have an enormous machinery and equipment boom to rationalize our industry for a North American market. This will preserve production but not manufacturing jobs. However, such a boom can only materialize if business can be convinced to spend more money here. I am concerned that without stronger signals from government that all will be well, investment may be considerably lower than it would have been.

I am turning to revenue and expenditure projections. It is true, as the budget indicates, that the automatic stabilizers—meaning the income support programs—are a main reason why the budget deficit rises as quickly as it does, it ought to be true as well that the recovery of the economy should reduce the cost of income support programs quickly. That is not happening in the budget. Instead, government current expenditures rise at the rate of nominal gross domestic product during the entire period.

The justification for accelerated capital spending in the budget is in part the need to stimulate an economy in recession, but if that is true, it is not clear why deficit-financed investment continues throughout the recovery. I have some concern—more than some concern—that the impact of anti-recession spending will be largest when the economy is already recovering, which I expect to be happening later on this year.

The budget argues that the treatment of capital spending in previous budgets is inappropriate and that therefore things are not as bad as they look. Now, I agree that we should not treat true capital spending as current cost. However, the new treatment of capital outlays is not correct either. It proposes to write off new capital spending over a 20-year period. There is nothing wrong with that, but it severely understates the social cost of public sector capital already in place. A better solution would be the one used in the national accounts, and that is to calibrate deficit targets by including in current spending estimates of capital consumption allowances on the stock of public sector capital. In other words, you are including only the amount of capital that you consume in projecting your deficit. I suggest this would show a far less flattering picture than is implied in the current budget.

There is a lot of reference to debt-to-GDP ratios and comparisons with other levels of government. I think most economists would agree that over an entire business cycle economic policies should try to keep the debt-to-GDP ratio from rising and, if possible, to reduce it. That may imply rising debt-to-GDP ratios during a downturn, but fiscal prudence demands that the cyclical deterioration be corrected as the economy recovers. The budget, in fact, projects that the debt-to-GDP ratio will rise from 15% to 21% by 1995.

Now, if we assume that the next business downturn will be somewhere around 1996 or 1997 and that it will result in the same kind of cyclical deterioration as in 1990 and if you follow the same kind of philosophy that is implicit in the budget, the ratio of debt to GDP could easily reach 30% by the year 2000, which to me seems ly unattractive. You have to take into account that this is true if interest rates stay as low as projected in the budget—I take it those numbers were taken from federal sources—and those interest rates will only stay as low if the current policy, which is not particularly popular in Ontario, of trying to drive inflation down succeeds.

In a number of places the budget points out that financial ratios, like debt to GDP, compare favourably with the same figures at the federal level. Unfortunately, that is not an appropriate comparison, because federal and provincial governments draw from the same tax base and there is no particular merit in indicating that the province is not doing things as poorly as the feds.

There is also a contention that Ontario will not fall into the federal trap of having to pay 30% of revenues in interest charges, and I agree that the province is not in immediate danger of doing that, but let's just go back and see how the feds got there. They got there because in the 1970s it was decided that we could and should spend more money in a variety of transfer programs to individuals, to businesses and to the provinces, and it turned out that it proved to be very difficult to contain that kind of spending once it was in place, because those who benefit tend to be more organized than those who oppose. Yet at some point we must decide on the level of spending we can afford.

For example, the Ontario budget complains about federal attempts to restrain transfers to the provinces. The facts are that transfers to the provinces make up about one third of the federal deficit and they are a legitimate area of restraint when resources in general are not sufficient to follow through on commitments made in earlier years; commitments, to my way of thinking, made without proper regard for the long-term cost of those promises. That unfortunately is the case not just in the official numbers that are being projected in the budget but in a whole host of other programs that are in the pension sphere, where contingent liabilities, to my way of thinking, are not properly accounted for.

Any attempt to blame federal policy for Ontario's predicament is largely misplaced. Because of our large foreign debt and the need to place a lot more every year over the next few years, Canada has lost control over some aspects of monetary policy. Those who agree that we could devalue the dollar and lower interest rates to get us out of the current problems ignore the reality of international capital markets.

Part of the reason the Canadian dollar has remained high is that foreign borrowers are extremely sensitive to currency fluctuations. I was in Tokyo a few weeks ago. There is a report published by the Canadian embassy indicating that Japanese investors alone hold something like $45 billion of Canadian debt. In my visits to some of those bond holders, I find that the most sensitive variable in their evaluation is the currency. So a response like we saw last week to what initially was a very minor event in the currency market is likely to be repeated, because I do not think the Bank of Canada feels that with the amount of foreign debt we have been floating, particularly fixed-income foreign debt, it really has the ability to gradually move currency in either direction.

Foreigners like Canadian bonds right now because they have a higher yield, they are a close approximation of US dollar debt and they perceive Canada to have a limited currency risk. If any of those factors disappear, we may have a serious problem on our hands. In fact, without a stable currency and yield premium, foreigners have little reason to favour Canada or Ontario over Australia, Denmark or any other part of the world.

The budget makes the point that improving human capital formation and improving government efficiency in delivery of health and education are good long-term objectives, but the strategy for achieving these objectives, I think, needs clarification. It does not explain how the budget aims to achieve its goals with the spending programs that are being proposed and whether all this will occur in time to generate the productivity increases that are going to allow business to pay the wages that are being suggested.

The principal weakness I see in the health and education system is that there are few incentives for superior performance and few ways of measuring whether the resources committed to this function are having the intended effect. There is a study out by the C. D. Howe Institute which I recommend highly. It is called Big Spenders: Provincial Government Finances in Canada, by Irene Ip. It deals in part with this issue and makes a number of recommendations, most of which have to do with putting efficiency and incentives in the right place.

One way to induce efficiency is to have resource allocation respond to scarcity as signalled by prices. I know that is anathema to some members of the NDP government, but I think experience in socialist and capitalist mixed economies has shown that any goods or service that are being offered at below cost are likely to be overconsumed unless there is some incentive provided to prevent that.

The budget argues that workers have seen their standard of living decline, so it is not fair that they be asked to rein in wage demands in the name of productivity. However, there is no guarantee anywhere that says we have a right to a constantly rising standard of living. If there is one message that is coming through in the statistics of the 1980s, it is that growth overall, despite quite strong employment creation, has not been strong enough to provide that constantly increasing standard of living. Real income can only rise when real output per worker increases or when an economy is lucky enough to produce goods and services that rise in price relative to the goods it consumes.

I think Ontario has some problems in that area. We are a small, open economy; our business cycle is driven to a significant extent by international trade, so we do not really control our rate of growth very narrowly, and by accident of geography we are very closely linked economically with one market, the industrial economy of the United States. Whereas many of our industries were geographically isolated until the 1970s, we now face competition from the Far East and even from some developing countries. The blunt fact is that we are just not keeping up in productivity internationally. We are losing on price in industries like auto production.

The final point I would like to raise is, granted that we are in some trouble, is it really ethically justifiable that one of the richest economies in the world should borrow to finance its government over a prolonged period of time?

Again, I want to make some distinction between, say, the last year and maybe the next little while, when we still have repercussions from recession. I think the government should recognize that since we enjoy one of the highest standards of living, there has to be a point where we have to recognize that while one can always wish prosperity to be higher and more evenly shared, that is not in itself justification to go and borrow to make that possible.

It is very hard to make the case that our needs are so pressing that they require us to compete internationally for savings of other countries that could be going instead to finance private and public needs for capital in eastern Europe, Latin America or the less developed countries. I find it ethically objectionable that as a province we are borrowing instead of lending, and I would have thought that such sentiments would be even stronger in the NDP government.

I conclude that once we are on a deficit track of $8 billion to 10 billion, as the budget projects, it may be very difficult to get back quickly to a balanced budget or a surplus, as I think we should, over the next four or five years. I also feel that the repercussions of the deficit projected to 1994-95 are far more serious than is implicit in the budget documents and that the GDP numbers' increase is far more serious than is being indicated.

The budget outlines some goals that we can all agree with, but the strategy to achieve them, to my mind, is not made clear. I think the main point to be made is that in a world of limited resources, this budget does not address tough choices among competing needs and does not confront the question of what is reasonable, not just for wage earners but also for their employers.

I think the first order of business for the Treasurer should be to build some bridges to the business sector. Without that, Ontario's economic recovery could be a lot weaker than it needs to be.

The Chair: Thank you. We have about 12 minutes per party, beginning with the NDP. Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: If I could just go over your graphs here for a minute, I was having a little trouble reading them. The first one, wages to GDP?

Mr De Bever: Right. This is total labour compensation relative to—

Mr Sutherland: Okay. So the squiggly line going up is the wages, and you are running on a base GDP.

Mr De Bever: No, no. This is a proportion: out of every dollar of GDP, what proportion is going to wages. So what you see is, between 1947 and 1976, that proportion rose from 48% to 57%. You see that right after the last recession, in 1983, when the proportion was low, we had very sizeable employment creation, because of that in part—we had a comparative wage advantage—and that advantage has been eroded over the last few years. In part, that is a cyclical phenomenon. Wages tend to be rising as a proportion of GDP during business downturns, but I think it also reflects a reduction in competitiveness.

Mr Sutherland: In your presentation you have talked about different issues. You have talked about some productivity issues, you have talked about their impact, you have talked about the provincial perspective. You point out that we are in an international trade market, but while we are international, we seem heavily influenced by our neighbours to the south. The fact that we are in an international trade market and have to deal with that reality also indicates, though, that we do not have jurisdiction over all the factors influencing Ontario. I did not see much comment in terms of federal policies' impact. You did discuss interest rates and the dollar a little, and they certainly have an impact on manufacturing.

In pre-budget consultation we heard from different people indicating that there was some room to move interest rates, not actual interest rates but differential between ours and the US. I would like you to comment on that and maybe on some of the other federal policies that have had a significant impact in the eroding of our manufacturing base and, for that matter, the provincial government tax base.

Mr De Bever: On your first point about interest rates and the differential with the US, that differential has come down dramatically over the last year. Unfortunately, our economy has the tendency to be inflation-prone. Initially, the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada was instituted because of a perceived problem in Ontario. We do not have that problem any more, at least the problem is not nearly as significant as it used to be, but now we have it elsewhere.

So the problem is that we seem to have a very difficult time keeping inflation under control and, as a result, particularly given the fairly loose fiscal stance at the federal and provincial levels, it has been very difficult to bring interest rates down.

Will they come down further? My sense is that they will. However, I feel, partially because of the large amount of fixed-income debt we have floated over the last few years, that we have lost the ability to bring interest rates down suddenly.

We have had two exchange crises now over the last two or three years, and in each case they were brought about by movements in interest rates that were fairly small. I suggest that the reason for that is that foreign investors, the moment there seems to be any trouble with Canada and its exchange rates, start selling the dollar. That, in turn, makes it very difficult afterwards to keep inflation down in the long run and to keep interest rates down in the long run.

You talked about other policies responsible for Ontario's predicament. I presume you were referring in part to free trade and its impact on employment. When free trade was negotiated, most projections, including some made, felt there was going to be an adjustment period of two or three years during which something like 70,000 to 75,000 jobs would be lost. We have lost many more jobs that over the last year or so. However, if you look at the US, it has lost a very significant part of its industrial base as well and for many of the same reasons. The fact is that North America as a whole, and that includes us, just has not been very competitive internationally. Again, I think the future is not in the industrial base.

Are there any other policies you were referring to?

Mr Sutherland: No, that is fine. I think it is important to note, though, that promises and commitments were made by the federal government in the last election that if it supported free trade, yes, there will be adjustment but adjustment programs will be in place. I think it needs to be noted for the record that many people are still waiting to see where those adjustment programs are coming and where the federal government's commitment is to dealing with the restructuring as a result of the free trade agreement.

Mr De Bever: That may be fair comment, but let me add that whether you like or do not like this particular agreement, I think we had better come to the realization that whether it is with Mexico or the US, free trade is an inescapable fact of life, and the focus ought to shift on how to deal with it rather than on how we oppose it or limit it.

Mr Jamison: Listening to you I heard, of course, the word "productivity." You made special reference to a graph about wages and how wages on that basis had increased. I find that puzzling, but productivity is not just wages. Productivity is, for example, building an infrastructure that will equate and promote business, and I think our government has put forward a multibillion-dollar plan to do that.

Research and innovation: The Ontario technology fund will provide $131 million for research and development and technology diffusion. That also has a great deal to do with productivity and competitiveness. That includes $81 million for programs to support leading-edge research in such areas as robotics and telecommunications via technology. We have also instituted a $57-million program called the manufacturing recovery program to help viable businesses through this short period of time.

Number one, I would like to understand your definition of productivity. Secondary to that, I got the indication that we simply were not doing enough for business, and the question to you is: How much is enough?

Mr De Bever: A lot of businessmen would not say that you have to do more for business in terms of spending money. In fact, a lot would argue that you probably should spend less, pull back from trying to get in business ventures altogether. I think the best strategy for the government to promote business is to facilitate the environment in which business takes place, that is, to keep taxes reasonable, to have delivery of services required for business be reasonable; otherwise, let them make their own mistakes. In fact, it is very easy to come up with 10 projects where the government got involved and got its nose bloodied because it made the wrong decision. It is very much harder to come up with a list of 10 projects where the government did not get involved and we have a stellar project we can refer to and say, "This is what government should be doing."

On the high-tech thing, if you think you are going to promote productivity through high tech, forget it. High-tech basic research is not where you are going to get your productivity. If you are going to put any money in that area, get it into the quick dissemination of the application of high tech. The production of high tech itself is a very minor ingredient both from an employment and an output point of view.

On your first question about what my definition of productivity is, what I was trying to show with this graph is not that this represents productivity but that any perception that somehow labour has not shared or wages have not shared in prosperity in the last 10 years is just misplaced. The true definition of productivity in fact shows that productivity relative to the United States has improved in Ontario relative to the United States over the last five years. I think the gap between us and the United States in real productivity output, real output per worker, is only about 5% versus about 10% or 12% about 10 years ago.

What has not changed and what has changed against us to our detriment is that the wages we pay out, the unit labour cost, has increased faster than the prices we are selling our products at. I think that is a problem, because that implies that declining productivity you see on the second graph on the first page.

Mr Jamison: I would just like to clarify something. Technology that has come in to manufacturers has reduced the labour force very significantly in many cases, but it has also caused a combination of skills within the workplace. The workforce has dropped, yet the wage level has gone up in compensation for the multiskilled or multicrafted kind of work going on within the new technologically advanced plant. Your graph does not take that into consideration specifically and that is why I think it really does not reflect the productivity of those types of plants compared to what they were 10 years ago, making widgets or whatever.

Mr De Bever: Ultimately, you can only pay out in salaries and profits what you earn from your exports or from your production. The plain fact is that we paid out more than we are earning. As a result, you have a 5% share of profits in GDP whereas a more normal level would be double, so I am flagging that as a significant structural problem.

Mr Sutherland: Picking up on that productivity level, I had concerns about what you said, that wages seem to be the only way. For example, one of the manufacturing plants in my riding has made significant productivity gains through several things. It did an environmental analysis on the amount it was putting out, reduced its garbage by 80% and found that in some of its operations, including the painting, by making certain adjustments it cut its costs that way. When we look at energy efficiency, co-generation, another plant is making great strides that way. Also, this plant that has realized savings by cutting down its garbage output by 80%, a unionized plant, has gone from the more traditional assembly line production to a workstation production and found it is producing more units per hour. In other words, there are many ways in which Ontario business can improve productivity without necessarily cutting wages.

Mr De Bever: I have no objection to that. In fact, many economists would suggest that a lot more negotiations should be based not on hourly wages but on a "fair share" of the revenue being generated by production. I have no problem with that. All I am flagging to you is that in the aggregate, that is not happening. Some people may deserve a gargantuan wage increase based on a gargantuan raise in productivity. No economist would quarrel with that. The problem is that in the aggregate, wages have increased faster than the underlying productivity and the prices of the outputs that are being produced.

Mr Sutherland: In some cases, it may be that some of our management techniques and production techniques need to be changed or altered to become more efficient and have better productivity.

Mr De Bever: That is right.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to pursue this productivity. Mr Jamison referred to the fact that productivity is not just labour cost. I will give you an example of something I came up with last week. General Motors has four engine plants in North America. They have one in St Catharines, two in the United States and one in Monterey, Mexico. They are identical plants, identical in the sense that they are clones of each other. They are built and designed exactly the same way, but the most productive plant they have is in Monterey. It has something to do with the labour cost but not all, because there is more to it than just labour. The fact is that at the end of the day, the executives at General Motors look at those four plants and say, "We get all these engines which are identical engines and we get more out of that plant per unit cost than we do anywhere else." That is what they talk about, productivity, and that is where we have to compete.

That is our biggest problem. When someone closes down a plant, and it may be profitable, they are under constraint. They are under pressure because of the global economy, and they say: "This facility is more productive. We are getting more bang for our buck out of this facility than we are out of that facility." Unfortunately, what has been happening too often—I am not blaming anybody; it is just sort of the work environment—is that too many workers think they are entitled to increases just for being alive—"I got an increase last year. How come I didn't get an increase this year?"—and it is not tied to their productivity. That is where we are losing our competitiveness, so we have to decide on two things. Either we have to get better able to produce to warrant greater salaries or we have to cut back. That is the dilemma.

You have made several comments about how you think our initiatives should be placed in different areas. Say you were the Treasurer and you had to give political direction to the people at the Treasury. What would be the number one thing you would recommend?

Mr De Bever: I think our major problem is in southern Ontario, which is a largely urbanized area, where costs have been rising very dramatically over the last 10 years because of the relative increase in prosperity. As a result, you see a lot of comparisons with Buffalo, which is a relatively rural area, on any number of factors: labour cost, land cost, servicing cost, you name it.

Given that such a large component of the engine of Ontario is urbanized, I would focus on how I can streamline the delivery of services and the taxes imposed on an industrial urbanized area of Ontario, because if for a moment instead of thinking Ontario versus the United States you think urban versus rural, you find that we share many of the same problems with urban areas in the United States. I am talking about New York; I am talking about the Midwest.

There is a similar sense that costs in the urban areas have gotten out of line and there has to be some way of defusing pressure from those urban areas to other areas. In other words, do not try and pile everything into the same already clogged channels of service delivery; go to lower cost areas. In fact a lot of companies are already doing that. A lot of companies are considering relocating in areas like, in the insurance industry that I used to be associated with, west to Waterloo and that area or up to Barrie. Those kinds of trends are likely to be there. I think they are beneficial because what they will do is reduce the pressure on land values and servicing cost in the principal drivers of Ontario without negatively affecting productivity. In fact they will probably improve it, make our economy relatively competitive.

This is the amazing thing about what is happening here. In many ways we are our own worst enemy. We have very high labour productivity. We live in a society where increasingly it ought to be true that the specific location where services are produced should not matter because transport and communication costs are very low, yet we find that we tend to concentrate a lot of activity in a very small area at a very high cost. I think the only way to break that cycle is to try and come up with ways that we can encourage people to move out of the central cores of the cities in Ontario. That would be my prime recommendation.

The other one would be, instead of focusing on how we can generate more revenues out of business, to allocate and spend part of the time seeing what the impediments are to undertaking business. I am not convinced we have a strong comparative disadvantage vis-à-vis, say, Buffalo as we are made out to have. Some surveys by, say, grocery chains and other manufacturers show that there is a case to be made that there is a lot more hype to this than reality. If that is the case, then we should identify what the true situation is, make citizens aware of it and, to the extent that there are impediments we can remove, we should remove them. I think that is the true function of government: to be the facilitator.

Mr Phillips: I really appreciate your report. I thought it was as thoughtful as we have had. At least I think it is—maybe because I agree with a lot of it, so I always think it is more thoughtful. I appreciate your comment on the capital account, which I fully support and I think is something we will have to look at.

I think we are going to find a certain pattern setting here at these hearings. This is our first day. It will be the government says it is right and we will say, "You ng," and we will not know for a year or two. So it is going to be a game of rhetoric, I guess. It will be th while and we will hear really good witnesses such ourself and others we have heard. But I worry that ause we are all projecting what the impact is going to we will not see much movement on it.

My question to you is, what will be the signals of ether this budget is working or not working? In the end ink we will have to set up those kind of guideposts that "You were right and we were wrong," or "We were it and you were wrong," because I think you have perally given us a blueprint in many respects of what to do is wrong. How will we know that it is not working?

Mr De Bever: Because we are a small part of a larger nomy it is going to be very hard to tell, there is no stion about that. But rather than focusing on keeping re I was much more interested in this case in saying, ook, you're focusing on the wrong things." Money is the issue.

This budget reminds me a lot of—you may think this appropriate—the Great Society programs of Lyndon onson where there was a set of ills, social weaknesses, ntified. The notion was, "If we just spend money on it, 'll upgrade education and we'll increase equality of op- tunity and so on." I think the last 15 or 20 years have own that life is far more difficult and complex than that. u have to be very specific on setting goals and making e you get those goals. Just by spending money on R&D, hich is laudable in itself, and just by spending money on ucation, you are not going to guarantee you are going to t results.

I think that is the lesson of a lot of Keynesian-type spend- g. Spending money will stimulate the economy, yes. For a uile it will get you output, but it may not get you the ecific results this government seems to be after, which is to rease productivity by giving people increased skills for hich the world is going to pay. I think that is the ultimate jective. Unless you have very concrete specific programs lace that take the money that is being spent and channel it to very specific productivity-enhancing strategies, I am not re it is going to be worth while.

How are you going to measure it? When I was at the ank of Canada we did a lot of studies on what fiscal olicy could do for you. The end result was that it cannot o very much for you structurally over the long haul. All it n do for you is in the short haul ease the pain of a ecession. If you are after structural changes, you have to e much more concrete; you have to be much more spe- fic. I guess that is the part I found missing in this budget.

The Chair: You have approximately three minutes left.

Mr Phillips: Another quick question then. In terms of here we are going to see jobs created, which is a huge worry for many of us, I think in your analysis you said, Listen, 10 years ago you looked at the manufacturing ector and said we'd be lucky to hold the absolute number f jobs," although my recollection is that the percentage of e gross domestic product by manufacturing actually ent up when the jobs stayed the same because of investment, so I interpret from your comments here we are going to be very lucky to hold manufacturing jobs. It is going to require a lot of investment; we are going to have to attract capital investment to hold manufacturing jobs.

That being the case, and the labour market growing at 1.5% a year, we need 75,000 new jobs just to hold even. We have lost 200,000, so we have to create 300,000 jobs very quickly. Where are they going to come from?

Mr De Bever: This was exactly the kind of discussion we got into in 1981-82 when I presented that projection. Unfortunately I find that you cannot make a case that to politicians or to laymen is very convincing. All I can tell you is, over the last 30 years there has been a dramatic shift of job creation out of the goods-producing sector to manufacturing. People say: "This cannot continue. How many services can you consume? You can only do one haircut. You can only go out to dinner so many times. Where are these services going to come from?" The fact is that between services and what is now referred to as the information-oriented sector, there is job creation in services and there has been. I am very convinced that there will be.

Just to illustrate that point, because it is a point that most people find hard to accept, in 1981 I got involved in a debate about the impact of computers on jobs and the same argument was being made. Suppose you go and invest in computers; you make a whole bunch of people redundant. Where are they going to find jobs? The projection was, we were going to have a 40% unemployment rate for secretaries in Toronto by 1991. I declared that forecast to be totally ridiculous and it turned out to be ridiculous, but at the time I must have debated it in three or four different forums. I could not make my case because people could not visualize that jobs would be created in other areas.

Mathematically it makes perfect sense that jobs will be created in the service sector and I think they will be. To visualize that is very difficult, but I think the shift of demand is away from goods. For every incremental dollar you will find that a smaller proportion will be going to goods and a larger proportion to services. Because of that we may in fact have, by the middle of the decade, a shortage of labour in many skilled areas rather than the surplus we are worried about now.

Mr Sterling: I would like to echo the sentiments of my colleague Mr Phillips in terms of your presentation. I really found it quite enlightening. Perhaps your knowledge of the budget matches anybody's in this province in terms of your understanding and going through it. I appreciate your analysis.

I once listened to a speech by Professor Phil Gillies, who used to be a provincial MPP, and I remember him saying that the whole debate over the free trade agreement was a bit of a farce because it did not matter whether we had a free trade agreement or not. Free trade was going to be a fact in 10 years regardless of whether we had an agreement; we were just going to be forced into it by what was happening in the world.

One of the problems I have is there seem to be three whipping boys in all the arguments that you hear. One is free trade, the other is John Crow in terms of his monetary policies and the third is the federal government in terms of the GST and that kind of thing. I do not see those as the real problems in regard to what is happening to us at this time.

One of the other things we have heard, particularly from the manufacturing and the business sectors, which have suffered greatly in the last little while—as shown in your graph, their profit margin is way, way down—is that everybody seems to argue for an 80-cent dollar. That seems to be the panacea in terms of solving the problems. Would you care to comment on what would happen?

Mr De Bever: Even if you wanted to, you could not get to an 80-cent dollar in a real hurry, because if Crow were to wake up tomorrow morning and say, “Look, I’ve been wrong all along. I want an 80-cent dollar. Go sell the dollar,” it would not stop at 80 cents, and that would have problems of its own.

When you look at the history of devaluations in various economies, you find that weakening the currency is never the solution. My advice to manufacturers would be, find yourself 5% or 6% productivity in your operations rather than wait for Crow to drop the dollar, because if you have the 5% or 6% in productivity, you have that in your hand. They cannot take it away from you. The dollar may go up or down beyond your control.

If you think that is an unreasonable suggestion, go back to 1981-82. You may recall that the presidents of Falconbridge and Inco and so on were arguing very strenuously that without devaluation they would never be able to survive. Then when it dawned on them that between the dollar not doing what they expected it to do and commodity prices not doing what they were expected to do, they had better do something about their own operations. All of a sudden in the space of one or two years they realized dramatic improvements in their operations simply by saying, “Look, this is what we’ve got to do.”

I think that is where the solution lies. It is only human nature that we tend to postpone unpopular decisions as long as possible. A lot of manufacturers have done that. Free trade is now bringing to the fore a lot of problems that have been subterraneously existing for a long period of time. Now that we are finally confronted with the fact that we have to compete internationally, these problems are being addressed.

I really believe that the answer is not complaining about the other guy; it is to a larger extent trying to do, in your own shop within your own sphere of influence, what is possible. I am not for a moment discounting the fact that government can play an important role in there, but I do not believe that it should be there with its money bag. It should be there to say, “Okay, what is the environment that we have to create for you to hire more people and to create employment?” and not necessarily as the subsidizer of new ventures.

Mr Sterling: If you were the Governor of Canada, in John Crow’s place, would you take much different action than he has?

Mr De Bever: I must admit I am partisan. I used to work for John Crow. I might have taken a different tack in the sense that I think his basic error was that in the beginning he did not communicate what he was trying to do. We have a situation where everybody was assuming that the monetary policy was being geared to inflation continuing at 5% or 6%, whereas the reality was that he was serious when he said he wanted inflation down to zero. I think that has caused a lot more pain than it needed to, and it probably has caused a deeper recession than it should have.

In terms of the intent of the policy, no. I think the history of Canada shows that the errors in monetary policy have always been made in that they have accommodated much more inflation than they should have.

Mr Sterling: You mentioned the $45 billion of debt which is held by Japanese interests. I understand there is a certain amount of debt out there—I have heard the figure of $35 billion or $40 billion or something like that—which is relatively short term, held in short term. If the interest rates were dropped and the interests of those four investors disappeared, what would happen?

Mr De Bever: If interest rates were dropped—

Mr Sterling: Presume that the two things that hold that debt are the value of the dollar relative to the other currencies and the interest rate. That is what the investors are looking at. So if the interest rate drops or the dollar drops or a combination of the two, what happens if that $45 billion is no longer there for us?

Mr De Bever: The fact is that you could not finance your debt if you tried to do that. The Japanese or any other foreign investor is not there for philanthropy. They are strictly in there for returns, and they will sell us down the river any time it seems advantageous. They have no particular love for Canada or Ontario or anybody else. I guess the answer to your question is that if you try to refinance the government debt at lower rates, you could not do that unless you had a substantially lower inflation rate in your economy so that the real returns to the investor would remain the same. That is ultimately what the Bank of Canada is focusing on.

Canada’s debt is extremely short; the average term to maturity is only around 4.4 years. What that means is that there is a tremendous positive leverage from dropping inflation and interest rates. If you can bring inflation down, you can bring interest rates down. If you do that and you work out the mathematics of compound interest, it has a dramatic impact on both the federal deficit and the kind of provincial debt-servicing costs we are talking about here. It is very dramatic in the sense that it could wipe out half the deficit in a matter of three or four years. Every 100 basis point, every point reduction in interest rates, will, over a period of one to two years, reduce the deficit by $4 billion or $5 billion. The reason that this is being masked right now is the recession. The recession has caused both the federal and the provincial governments to spend more money. Once the recession is over, only the impact of lower interest rates will remain. So that is a very dramatic lever and it will continue to work for us, and interest rates will be able to continue to drop if we can get inflation down.

The point is that by international standards our labour costs are not very efficient, and even though producer prices have been flat for the last year, wages are still rising 5% a year. So we have a problem there in terms of changing people's perception adjusted until it is possible.

Mr Sterling: Do you think the provincial government's budget should have done something in terms of bringing some leadership in restraint?

Mr De Bever: One thing that other provincial governments have done is to stand behind the federal government in terms of saying: "Look, here is the wage budget. Do what you will. You can have fewer employees and lower wages or you can have the same number of employees and no wage increase." I think something like that would have been positive.

I am not saying, by the way, that civil servant wages are necessarily too low; in fact there may be a case in some areas where they are too high. In some cases one may argue that they are too low. All I am saying is that what works for the private sector also goes for the public sector, that there is a limited amount of resources and that you have to do with the resources as much as you can. I think the area where we traditionally have had problems is that the sectors that are not as much bound by profit-and-loss considerations have tended to lead the way on wage inflation.

Mr Sterling: Dianne, did you have something?

Mrs Cunningham: We thank you for your presentation. It has been a real treat.

The Chair: Three minutes.

Mrs Cunningham: We also get to read the Hansards. I have a couple of questions and maybe we could have a discussion. When you talk about the positive assessment of Ontario's economic potential, the positive statements that you have made with regard to "good quality of life" and "high level of education of labour force," my concern is as a critic of Education and Skills Development, and my background being board of education in London, Ontario, for many years as an elected representative, your next sentence on that page disturbs me just a little bit: "I expect that our fortunes will be boosted significantly in the nine-ties by strong immigration."

My great concern has always been that yes, we have a great education system and our public are highly educated, but in the area of skills development and producing what we need them to produce, I think our system has been an abysmal failure. Most educators would say there needs to be a very major change in direction and training of young people, as well, of course, as retraining. I just wondered if you would comment on that and tell me what you meant by "strong immigration." Are they going to take the jobs that we should be training our young people for?

Mr De Bever: The facts are that recent immigrants are dramatically different from previous ones. There is a high proportion of immigrants who are highly skilled. You are probably thinking about the proportion that is not skilled and in fact requires a higher level of government services to bring them—

Mrs Cunningham: I am thinking of both: the skilled ones doing the jobs we wish we had trained our young people for, or our workforce for, and the others needing so much more education, as we are all experiencing now.

Mr De Bever: That is right. As a parent, I would agree with you that what I see in the educational system is not what I think is possible. It comes back to an earlier comment: If we are spending all this money on education, let us set some standards that tell us whether we are doing what we think we ought to be doing. Again, the comment should be made that just spending money on education and providing for decent salaries for teachers and educators is not going to be the kind of thing that I am referring to here.

I would not want to go on a right-wing binge of the three Rs and all that, but there is a point where you have to bring it down to basics, and that is to measure both the skills you are trying to impart and the means by which you are doing so. Just saying, "Well, we have so many teachers per pupil and we are spending so many dollars; therefore the results are going to be there," I do not think is going to work. You have to be much more specific on that.

Mrs Cunningham: Which takes me down to the points you made on efficiency and delivery of health and education, where we talk about not measuring how our programs are working. I would thoroughly agree with you, with my background as a person who did private sector audits of programs.

I think what we need—certainly we have been talking about this for probably 10 years, so I am not blaming any particular new government or previous government, but there just does not seem to be the political will to make the major changes and to do the measuring. It is so easy to go along with the status quo. As politicians we are advised by civil servants who are supposed to provide us with the expertise, and yet we are not getting the kinds of things I am talking about now and the kinds of things my colleagues of all parties here and out in the public want. We do not get that good advice. At least if cabinet members are getting it, it certainly has not trickled down to the regular representatives of the public, because I have never heard anybody, other than in lip service, say that we need these major, major changes in delivery which France, West Germany and England—I am very familiar with their skills councils—have done and are continuing to do in criticizing themselves first.

How do you get it? You said once that you advised public servants, so how do we get that good advice? Where do you see the political will coming from? No one seems to be listening to the need.

Mr De Bever: I think the advice and the strategies are probably out there, but as you indicated, the political will and the obstacles to that are maybe very serious. You are talking about antagonizing some people—I am talking about teachers and so on—who probably do not want to be measured. Some of them do.

There have been proposals in the United States and other jurisdictions to make compensation much more responsive to performance. Of course the question is, how do you measure performance? The way it is right now, any teacher who has put in a fixed number of years is earning the same salary, regardless of what his or her performance is. So a lot of them are arguing, "Why should I take on more responsibility and get extra training so I can be more productive when I do not see anything showing up in my paycheck?"

I think those are the kinds of issues you are going to have to grapple with, and I am sure there are strategies out there that outline what you have to do to get there. The problem is that you are talking about some very major change and you are talking about antagonizing some people who are voters. It is like anything else. But I think it will ultimately boil down to a battle between two sets of voters, the educators and the parents. As educational resources become more scarce, I think the parents are going to more and more gain the upper hand and pressure the government at the provincial and local levels to shape up and do the kinds of things we are talking about here.

The Chair: Your time is up.

Mrs Cunningham: Just one—

The Chair: No, I am afraid not. You are already over by four minutes.

Mrs Cunningham: Okay, if you had told me at four minutes—we are not participating, in Ontario, in the national testing right now that is going on. That is one of the great concerns that we have—

Mr Sutherland: And we know why.

Mrs Cunningham: Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I have had one of my colleagues, a member of the third party, ask me what Nomura is. I had just assumed that everybody would know and I would—

The Chair: If you would like to explain—

Mr Kwinter: One minute just to tell you what Nomura is.

Mr De Bever: Nomura is the largest Japanese brokerage company. I have nothing to do with the publicity that they garnered themselves over the last few weeks, but it is effectively, the largest brokerage company in the world.

Interjection: From Japan?

Mr De Bever: In Japan.

Mr Kwinter: They are Japanese, but they are the largest securities company in the world. Their capital base is as large as that of all of Canada. That gives you an idea.

Mr De Bever: The Japanese securities industry is not as well developed as the North American one. There have been certain problems in terms of how they treated one client versus another that have hit the press rather dramatically and caused the resignation of both the chairman and the vice-chairman.

The Chair: Thank you for returning and doing this presentation today.

We have some business to deal with as a committee. A problem has developed for tomorrow and I would like the clerk to describe what that problem is.

Clerk of the Committee: Because of the short time frame that we had for scheduling some of the witnesses, we were having difficulty scheduling some of the time slots to begin with. Since this morning, four of the groups that are scheduled for tomorrow have cancelled. We have been calling everyone else on our list trying to get other groups to take those time slots on short notice but have met with only limited success. I am just wondering if the committee is happy to have me keep trying to schedule as many groups as I can to try to come up with as much of an agenda as possible.

Mr Sterling: Which four have cancelled?

Clerk of the Committee: The 10:30 and 11 o'clock and the 3:30 and 4 o'clock have cancelled.

Mr Sterling: So all we have is the Ontario Nurses Association at nine o'clock in the morning?

Clerk of the Committee: We have moved them to 10:30, and I believe my office has been able to get another group at 10 o'clock, so the committee will not have to meet at 9 am for only one group.

Mr Kwinter: The committee will meet at 10 o'clock in the morning?

Clerk of the Committee: Yes, but if you are happy with just having me work as much as I can to get other groups from the list—

Mr Sterling: Do you have somebody at 10 o'clock are you trying to get somebody?

Clerk of the Committee: Yes, we do have somebody confirmed at 10 o'clock.

Mr Christopherson: Why did four cancel?

Clerk of the Committee: I believe they committed appointments last week believing they could make it. On reflection they just found they cannot make it in time frames.

The Chair: Could we suggest to them that if they have no prepared statement but would like to come and make a short statement and have questions and have more of the time dealing with questions, that maybe would be a satisfactory alternative to them? This would of course have to be done with the okay of the committee.

Mrs Cunningham: Or come later on?

The Chair: Later on is not a possibility. We are booked pretty solid. There are very few spaces available later on.

Mr Sterling: I would suggest, Mr Chairman, if we are going to meet at 10 and at 10:30, that if you were able to have anybody else, you slot them in at 11 and 11:30 and that you do no more than two more.

Mr Sutherland: Let me just raise a point. I do not have my schedule right in front of me. Are we booked solid for Wednesday and Thursday?

Clerk of the Committee: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, because there has been some concern. It is unfortunate some of these groups could not come, because I have had a few people call me, some of the individuals who wanted to appear beforehand and because of the decision we made as a subcommittee that ny could not appear—I was just wondering if there was room to schedule any of them in. It does not appear possible?

Clerk of the Committee: The only gaps are in tomorrow's schedule.

The Chair: So the directive to the clerk would be to find whomever he can find and this committee will reconvene tomorrow at 10 o'clock? Thank you. We are adjourned until 10 o'clock.

Mr Jamison: Is that individuals or organizations?

The Chair: Whomever, I suppose.

Clerk of the Committee: From the individuals list as well?

The Chair: The individuals list as well?

Mr Sutherland: I would appreciate that. Given the fact that we cannot fill the time, we might as well hear from people.

The Chair: Okay, this committee is adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning. Thank you.

The committee adjourned at 1647.

1991-92 BUDGET

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Chair: I see a quorum, so I would like to begin what we are not too far behind by the end of the day.

PHYLLIS GRIFFITHS NEIGHBOURHOOD CENTRE

The Chair: I would like to welcome Reet Mae from Phyllis Griffiths Neighbourhood Centre. The procedure is that you have half an hour. You can do your presentation, however long that takes, and then the committee's time divided equally among the three parties to ask questions in order. At the end of the time, we have to move. That is the procedure. If you could begin, we will have half an hour from now.

Ms Mae: My name is Reet Mae and I am the executive director of the Phyllis Griffiths Neighbourhood Centre, which gives a considerable number of people difficulty over its name and its pronunciation. I get called Phyllis quite an awful lot.

This is a multiservice community-based agency that receives a portion of its operating costs from the Ministry of Community and Social Services. Because I am speaking on behalf of our chairperson to a certain extent and also on behalf of issues that are relevant to other similar agencies, I will be speaking from a prepared text for the most part.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak today to the standing committee on finance and economics in the matter of the current budget for the province of Ontario. I am not here as an economic expert, nor will I address any global issues relating to the budget. I am here to ask for your support of front-line community-based programs and services in a number of areas. Such community-based programming forms a minute proportion of the provincial budget expenditures yet provides a critical link to the rest of the social service sector for community members. By making a substantial financial commitment to community-based, community-run programs and services, we save dollars in later social service costs and reduce the burden of suffering of the vulnerable and isolated in our communities.

In the speech from the throne, I was pleased to hear that there is a commitment on the part of this government to "listen to the people" and to "work towards our communities becoming supportive environments where all people, including those who are vulnerable, can meet their full potential, participate in community life and make their contribution to society."

I am reassured that this government is "committed to both employment equity and pay equity...particularly in areas such as child care" and that this commitment extends to the "range of public services to families." I am counting on this government taking practical steps to fulfil its stated declaration that public policies and programs must reflect the realities of family life, the growing participation of women in the workforce, the balancing of work and family life, and the changing role of the extended family in caring for children.

As a taxpayer, I also appreciate the commitment to the most effective use of public funds, and I wish to bring to your attention a number of existing social services which provide a most efficient and effective way of addressing many of the issues and concerns cited above and outlined in the speech from the throne, as well as in the budget speech.

With your permission, I will briefly outline some of the relevant background and history of community-based support services and then present three specific issues in community-based programs for which I am seeking your support. Community-based programs and services are very precarious under the current budget allocations yet provide vitally needed services to large segments of our communities in an accessible, effective and cost-efficient manner.

In 1979, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto outlined a number of issues making social service planning and provision difficult, particularly in large urban areas, in a report entitled Metro's Suburbs in Transition. Outlined in part 1 of this report were a number of factors contributing to changing needs in large urban areas. Metro's suburbs at that time were experiencing increased immigrant populations, the isolation of the elderly and of those caring for young children, increasing unemployment among young people and changing age structures in suburban areas. Many of these changes are continuing and greatly affect the accessibility to social services and community programs of community members. The importance of local, community-based resources that could respond to local needs in an immediate, accessible fashion was stressed in the report.

Following this, the report Neighbourhoods Under Stress was produced in 1983 by the joint task force on neighbourhood support services. The Neighbourhoods Under Stress report contended that neighbourhood support programs could be considered essential services in much the same way as roads, police, schools and public health were. Such neighbourhood support services provide the essential work to enhance the quality of life for individuals and to make communities healthy and support living environments, particularly for the elderly, the isolated and the vulnerable. The report further argued that no other essential services use public dollars as efficiently as neighbourhood support programs do.

The community and neighbourhood support services program was a funding program that was a creative response to the issues outlined in both of these reports. This province-wide funding program is shared jointly among the province, which provides 50%, the local municipality and the United Way locally, which both provide 25% of the core funding allocations. The funding program is intended to provide core funding to local neighbourhood-based agencies which are representative of and responsive to their communities and which have no other stable source of funding. The funding program began as a pilot project in 1985 and was made a permanent part of the provincial social service structure after the completion of the three-year pilot phase.

Agencies funded under this program are run by volunteer boards of directors, use many community volunteer hours and are able to provide flexible supports and services to members of local communities, providing a wide range of services, including employment counselling, family support, community integration for new immigrants, seniors support services or programming for new parents. The success of the program is due to the dedication of the large number of community volunteers who donate their time and talents, as well as the dedication of the staff employed in these agencies.

The funding of the community and neighbourhood support services program, however, is inadequate and has been inadequate from its inception. Initially, the maximum dollars available for core expenses were $30,000. Out of this limited allocation, boards of directors were expected to pay the salaries of their executive director, office support staff, office rental costs and administrative costs. Even at the time, this was clearly inadequate. In a 1988 salary survey of CNSSP agencies, the average salary for the senior staff person was found to be $22,000. This is the chief executive officer of these agencies. This was equivalent to the starting salary of a clerk at Metro and there was no access to benefits for any employees. While these figures have improved to some degree in the intervening years, I remain concerned and I wish to share this concern with you.

Most CNSSP agencies are primarily staffed by women, who are continuing to bear the burden in a very direct fashion for the provision of social services to our communities. This, I believe, is a disgrace, particularly when we are surrounded by commitment to pay equity. It does reflect the prior provincial lack of financial commitment to adequately fund the community and neighbourhood support services program.

Without adequate funding, the burden of providing support and service to communities remains directly on the workers, particularly in smaller social service agencies, as well as on the community, which must generate additional funds for the agencies to remain viable. These community-based services have become a valuable part of our social service system in Ontario, yet the CNSSP program has not shown the growth that could be expected. This, I believe, has been due to the lack of funding commitment on the part of the province, which is the major funder. There are no equivalent means for cost-effectively providing support and services to our citizens before costly interventions are required, and I believe the community and neighbourhood support services program deserves our fullest support.

I believe, as this government has outlined, that the future wellbeing of Ontario depends in large measure on how we care for our children today. Former support systems such as extended families no longer exist for many today's families. As a province, we must address the changing needs of families and provide services that support the child. At the moment, in the greater Metropolitan Toronto area there are over 100 family resource centres providing a wide range of prevention-oriented services to families and children. Some of these are funded through the provincial government through the child care unit. Others are funded through local municipalities, and still others through private means or their own fundraising. Many of these family resource centres operate as part of broader community-based agencies.

Family resource centres are a vital part of our services to children. As the majority of children in care are not in licensed day care settings, resources need to be made available to care givers of young children that ensure adequate standards of care for all of Ontario's children. A family or preschool resource centre can provide such support services for all community care givers and thereby enrich the lives of children in care as well as reduce the risk of child abuse and neglect. Such services fulfil the same role for parents, grandparents, aunts and uncles who are staying home to provide care for young children. Support services may include drop-in programs, toy libraries, informal day care registries, child enrichment programs, parent training and informal counselling.

At the moment there is no stable funding source within the province of Ontario for such services. Agencies funded through the child care unit have in the past been informed that providing support to parents is not within the mandate of the child care unit. Unfortunately, at the moment, inclusive family support services do not appear to be within anyone's mandate.

This is another sector in which the majority of employees are female. Once again, the already heavy burden of providing for the social service needs of this province is resting on the female workers in the sector. Even within agencies funded by the provincial government, wage inequities are immense and the majority of agencies remain dramatically underfunded and rely primarily on women to make up the funding deficits. Such agencies, while employing early childhood education graduates, as in licensed day care agencies, are not eligible for direct operating grants or any other form of pay equity adjustments at the moment.

These women also are child care workers and they fulfil a very important role in ensuring safe, high-quality child care made available for all children in the province, both from parents and informal day care providers, as their salaries are falling far behind those with equal responsibilities and equal qualifications providing child care in licensed agencies at the moment.

Finally, I would like to remind you that a large part of the social service provision in this province is still being done by women. Because the services outlined above are predominantly provided by women, until new legislation comes effective we are not even eligible to be considered under employment equity. Many women who work to provide much-needed programs and services to the citizens of Ontario are themselves sole support parents, immigrants, and vulnerable individuals because of their life circumstances. Many of these programs and services are provincially underfunded. If pay equity legislation were to set guidelines for equitable salaries in small, community-based services, the local volunteers and board members, many of whom again are women, would become responsible for raising unrealistic amounts of additional dollars for salary adjustments. Unless the province itself is committed to pay equity for all agencies under its various funding programs, pay equity cannot become a reality in the province of Ontario.

To this end, I believe, as this government does, that it is possible for us to live together to build a society in Ontario that provides a decent quality of life for all of us. To this end, I am asking for the support of this government in the three areas that I have outlined above by, first, providing equitable and realistic funding to the community and neighbourhood support services program, phased in over a three- to five-year period; second, making both a financial and a philosophical commitment to the lives of children in this province by recognizing the importance of those caring for children, especially in the early preschool years, and by providing the necessary financial, economic and social resources to support both parents and care givers in this important role, particularly in recognizing the important role of family or preschool resource centres and ensuring that adequate funding is made available for such services; and finally, making a financial commitment to pay equity for women that will include an evaluation of the province's role in contributing to inequity through underfunding of many smaller social service agencies and by developing a strategy to provide supplementary funding to such agencies when the appropriate legislation is passed.

I thank you for the opportunity to present these concerns. I know that you share these concerns with us and look forward to seeing some practical answers to these concerns, both in the current budget and over the long term.

The Chair: We have 15 minutes left, five minutes per party, beginning with the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr Jackson: Reet, thank you for your presentation. One gets a sense from it that we have heard these concerns before. However, trying to pull that into the budget, where you see the budget having addressed that or whether the budget has not, I certainly have a clear view of that, and I wanted to get a sense from you where you see the deficiencies in the current budget. I do not want to prejudge the committee or this government, but it is highly unlikely that a whole series of promises in the last budget are going to be dropped in order to shift them to others. I do not want to prejudge that, but by the same token, I am a realist. But I want to ask you very simply—

Ms Mae: The commitment to pay equity, for instance, does not apply to the workers who are working for me providing child care support services. There is no additional funding for them.

Mr Jackson: Okay. I am familiar with a couple of documents that address the preventive aspect of children's mental health and children's support services and not the proactive funding in that area—that is your second bullet point on your synopsis page. Is there a concern about not having clearly defined dollars in the budget for that area as well?

Ms Mae: I guess the concern is more a lack of commitment to the entire concept of providing support services to families. I believe that anyone who looks after young children is entitled to the maximum amount of support that we can provide. Those agencies that are funded through the child care unit have in the past been told variously that if they allow parents to come to such programs they are not within the mandate of the child care unit. The funding has not been cut because of that, but it has always kind of been the line that has been held over everyone's heads.

I honestly believe that by providing support services to children in the community, whether they are cared for by their parents or someone who is paid for it, we will ensure a better society for us all, and that it is very effective and cost-efficient to do this on a local community level.

Mr Jackson: I could not agree with you more, but I am trying to get a clearer sense of why the budget and/or policy direction does not address that issue. We see elements of it; we see it in interval houses. There is a growing recognition of the need for not just child care workers but persons with psychometric skills so that they can do work with the children in that setting, in that environment. Although it is a family in dysfunction, it is a separate family with the mother and the child or children. Are you suggesting, therefore, that there is not this acceptance of community-based programming that works with families in that—

Ms Mae: I do not believe there is a commitment anywhere to this on a broad-based level. I believe there is a commitment that started from a concern over children in the informal child care system, which still remains the majority of children being cared for, but I do not believe that anyone has really examined a sort of philosophical overview of what we provide for all of Ontario's children. Because my staff, for instance, who are providing services in a family resource centre, are not eligible for any type of salary supplements, their salaries are falling far behind those of people in child care. I paid my co-ordinator for all these services $25,000 last year, which I do believe is a disgrace.

Mr Jackson: A final question, then, on the issue of the pay equity. I am surprised to hear that the government's position is that you are outside of the extended circle. I understand that we are broadening the circle for pay equity, but I know cases such as the YMCA network where they have been told that they fall within the legislation but outside of the line in terms of funding support or subsidy. You seem to be falling outside of both lines: whether pay equity affects you and whether or not you would be eligible to present yourself to the government for a subsidy.

Ms Mae: Unless this government makes a commitment to include us all, I am concerned that we may fall outside of it. We will not know until the final straw comes. The problem is, you see, that our agencies are already tremendously underfunded. So if you give $2,000 more and there only is half of the operating cost it really cannot supplement salaries until the core funding is adequate.

Mr Sutherland: I am glad to see that the member for Burlington South recognizes the difficult task the government had in terms of the demand for services and not being able to meet all those demands. There is still much more that has to be done, obviously, and we see that from your presentation.

As you are a neighbourhood centre, I would suspect that you can probably put a little more perspective on the impact of this recession. We hear that the recession is over, statistically the recession is over, but what is the reality of the situation? What are you seeing in the centre on a daily basis? How has it grown? Who is being affected and impacted the most?

Ms Mae: Statistically it may be over but it certainly has not changed in terms of the communities. I think this is true for agencies across Metropolitan Toronto: that there has been over the past year an increasing number of people who have been homeless. We have had families come to us, for instance, who have had young children and no access to food. We have had one of the members of Parliament call us to ask for emergency transportation to provide access to a disabled woman who had just returned from the hospital and could not get to a food bank, there being nothing to make that transportation possible for her to access those services.

We find that families are experiencing severe difficulties and that the need for peer support and also trained support for parents who are dealing with things such as unemployment or underemployment is becoming increasingly important, particularly in the issue of mediation in attempting to reduce the possibility of the risk for family violence as well as child abuse.

Those are all things that have been increasing. The demand for services at the community level has been increasing considerably over the past year, and we do not expect it to abate to any degree.

Mr Sutherland: Are the people you are seeing the traditional people who have always been struggling in the system to get above the poverty line? Are you seeing new people, different types of people that you have never seen?

Ms Mae: Our community is very interesting because it is a community that has some very wealthy people living in it and also has a large number of co-operatives and some subsidized seniors' buildings. So we have literally the entire spectrum as well as some basement flats and little tenementy kinds of buildings over storefronts and things like that.

We find that this has affected almost everyone in our community. As you probably know, in Scarborough the whole issue of basement apartments is a big issue, and certainly within our community people who before would have had no difficulty in maintaining their own homes with their own resources are not able to do so any more. In our community, as well, there is a large proportion of elderly women living on their own and really struggling to maintain their own homes, particularly women over 65 which is a very vulnerable population.

Mr B. Ward: Part of the benefits of the budget as far as the people of Ontario are concerned was our maintenance of social programs during these extremely tough economic times. As well, and you touched on it, we do have a commitment towards pay equity, although in your opinion it perhaps is not moving along as far and as fast as it should.

Because of this commitment to maintaining social programs during tough times and moving towards pay equity, we have been criticized as a government by some groups and individuals. That criticism is centred on: we should be cutting programs to keep the deficit down, we should be cutting programs that benefit the people of Ontario, and we should not be moving towards pay equity because that will make us uncompetitive as a province compared to other jurisdictions. I was just wondering, what are your feelings on those two issues and how would you answer that criticism, if you disagree with it or if you agree with it?

Ms Mae: I have to say that personally I am very impressed by the commitment to both social programs and pay equity for the people of this province, and I understand the delicate juggling and balancing act that goes into the process. I am by no means criticizing the current budget, and I do not—

Mr B. Ward: I am not saying you. I am saying that there are some groups and organizations that were criticizing us because we maintained social programs and because we are moving towards pay equity.

Ms Mae: I understand that, and I guess I am just saying that I do not believe I am speaking from that group perspective, that I am truly speaking from the perspective of the people in the community whom we hear constantly.

Mr B. Ward: Yes, and recognizing that you are trying to do the best you can in your job, do you think that we are moving in the right direction during these tough economic times?

Ms Mae: I personally do.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much for your presentation. I could not help feeling when I listened to it that it was a pre-budget presentation as opposed to a post-budget presentation. It is the sort of presentation we heard prior to the budget, when people came to express their concerns, to express their needs.

I would really like to get your feeling. You have indicated some of it. The government has indicated that it chose, rather than fight the deficit, to fight the recession. How has that impacted on your organization? In other words, are you any better off as a result of this budget than you were before the budget?

Ms Mae: We are better off by probably about 1% in terms of our funding to the family resource centre program.

er than that, we are in roughly the same state as we e prior to this budget. I agree with you. To some extent, is a pre-budget, but it is also pre- the next budget and next budget and the next budget as well. For that, I reciate the opportunity to be here.

I really believe that the pay equity issue is something has to be seriously considered by the provincial government, particularly as it applies even to one specific sec- such as people working with child care, because I have se people working for me, and they are not affected er this budget, as are people working in other agencies organizations.

Mr Kwinter: Given the fact that in one area you have ut a 1% increase and in other areas you have none, how you propose to deal with your problems between now l the next budget?

Ms Mae: I am not saying that we got 1%. We got 1% ve what we would have expected, so that we got 5% s 1%, for instance, from the child care unit. This is not ay there has been no increase at all. We will carry on in ch the same fashion that we have in the past, by doing r own fund-raising, by relying on people in the commu- y to support the services we provide, because they also knowledge the need for them.

Mr Kwinter: Are you having any problem recruiting ople as a result of, say, the lack of effective pay equity d/or employment equity?

Ms Mae: The family resource centre program that we ve is three years old now, going into its fourth year. In e first 18 months of the program, in two staff positions, I ent through eight staff members. This is not a very effi- ent way to run an organization. Since that, things have come better, to a certain extent.

The thing that keeps all these agencies going—and this throughout the province—is the commitment of the peo- e to their communities. Particularly in family resource ntres, there are many, many women who are single par- ts, who are on various types of government assistance, ho really need and believe in the need to support one other. Because of that, they are prepared to make this pe of commitment, as are the staff members. I just be- ve it is an unfair burden to place on the workers in these eas.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

Mr Sutherland: Just before we go on to the next pre- entation, Mr Chair, I believe we had a document tabled ith the committee yesterday. If that document has been ible, will all the members of the committee be getting a opy of it very shortly?

The Chair: I understand that is the case. I thought verybody got one yesterday. I did not know that every- dy did not get one.

GARY A. PORTER

The Chair: Our next presentation is Mr Gary Porter, artner, Porter Hetu. The rules are that you make your resentation. Whatever time is left from the approximately 0 minutes available for individuals is equally divided among the three parties to ask questions at the end. Thank you for coming, and you may begin.

Mr Porter: First of all, thank you very much for the opportunity to speak this morning. On behalf of myself and my partners in Ontario and across Canada, let me say that we appreciate this opportunity.

Just a little bit about us. There are over 4,000 account- ing firms in Canada. Ours operates from St John's, New- foundland, to Vancouver, and is currently rated by a publication that does an annual survey called the Bottom Line as the 23rd largest.

Our practice is based on small- and medium-sized businesses. It is especially from the vantage point of our experience gained while serving these clients that I am speaking here today.

Our clients are not abstract or faceless business entities. They are real human beings with mortgages, aging parents, kids in school. Most of them are close to their employees, know the employees' families and feel a strong sense of responsibility towards their obligations as employers.

We have watched as high interest rates, a resulting highly valued Canadian dollar and then a deep recession have battered these businesses, their owners, the employ- ees and their families. We work with these people face to face in their stores and machine shops and in our offices. We are unable to see them as statistics, and for that reason we support the decision of the government of Ontario to battle the recession. It is our view that the heavy economic engines in Ontario cannot be allowed to run down unat- tended or to fall further into a state of disrepair.

As a national firm, we are mindful of the fact that Ontario accounts for over 40% of Canada's output. It is here that the recession has been most harsh, with more factories closed, more bankruptcies, more jobs lost and larger output decline than any other region of Canada. It is right and proper that the government of Ontario attempt to soften the blows, shorten the length of the recession and lay the groundwork for the recovery.

It is clear that this budget was not the time to cut back expenditures on social welfare, health or education. To do so would create additional unemployment, and the dis- placed workers would have little hope of finding new jobs.

James G. Frank, vice-president and chief economist for the Conference Board of Canada said it this way: "Al- though a tighter fiscal plan would have kept the deficit constant, it would have had a major adverse effect not only on Ontario but also on Canada. It would have led to a significant delay in the recovery and contributed further to increases in unemployment, bankruptcies and lost output."

We note with approval that the budget did not waste money on the creation of meaningless jobs and make-work projects. We agree with the policy of maintaining and in- creasing basic capital expenditures to maintain and im- prove the infrastructure in Ontario. These sensible investments account for almost 45% of the deficit.

It is our view that the way to make Ontario competitive in the global marketplace, and especially in a North Amer- ican free trade area, is to increase productivity. This does not mean speed up, which only results in burnout and increased injuries in the workplace. The road forward is through greatly enhanced worker retraining and relocation programs, and a much increased development of technologically advanced production of goods and services.

If workers in Canada earn $15 per hour and workers in Mexico are paid only $3 per hour, it is possible to maintain our standard of living by producing five times as much output per hour or per wage dollar as is done in Mexico. Only a strong, consistent commitment to high technology investment and worker training, supported by public policy, can attain this objective. A clear economic strategy is required and a partnership which includes both public and private sectors is indispensable.

The budget papers make clear that the government of Ontario is headed in precisely these directions. Part of the increased productivity which we require will be a critical and thorough examination of the value for money we are obtaining in the massive public expenditure areas such as health, education and welfare. We are pleased that the government of Ontario has already undertaken to increase the efficiency of the health service by reducing expenditure growth while sustaining the quality of service.

We want to point out that it is a daunting task. Anyone can cut costs by cutting service. Such actions do not increase productivity or efficiency; they merely reduce our standard of living. Long-run gains in efficiency require cutting costs while maintaining the essential quality of the services provided.

We are pleased to see that the government is committed to maintain reasonable limits on the carrying cost of the provincial debt. Our own view is that the provincial economy will recover somewhat more quickly and reach somewhat higher levels than is predicted in the budget. If we are correct, we recommend reducing provincial deficits more quickly.

In our view, there are three areas where the government may find its current direction is at odds with its longer-run objectives. We do not believe that the clawback of the small business deduction within the narrow range of profits ranging between $200,000 to $500,000 is prudent. Small businesses are well known to create a high proportion of new jobs. However, jobs are created by reinvesting after-tax profits in the business. Smaller businesses have persistent difficulties finding outside sources of funds. Thus, retained profits are an especially important source of their growth. If a small business earns a $200,000 profit on which approximately $50,000 is paid in tax, and each of only two partners is paid dividends of $50,000, only $50,000 remains. However, to create a new job requires $60,000 to $75,000 to pay for space, equipment, hiring, training and new salaries or wages.

We believe that the clawback only serves to reduce job-creating capacity, alienate small business and is unlikely to generate a substantial increase in tax revenue. If the clawback is used at all, a threshold of $750,000 and a full payback by $1,000,000 is suggested. We believe that a minimum corporation tax will increase tax complexity unnecessarily. Better directed tax incentives or removal of incentives is preferable. This policy would simplify taxation of corporations while increasing tax revenue.

Finally, we recommend that the Treasurer proceed cautiously on a land speculation tax. A tax, for example, does not exclude principal business corporations would be a strong disincentive for these companies to develop property in Ontario. There are many good and valid reasons why a land developer may sell a property before coming development. Inability to obtain approvals for intensification or cash flow requirements flowing from recession, high interest rates are examples. Other businesses will be negatively affected.

These points are made in the context, let it be clear that we support the basic policy directions and stated economic objectives of the government. We are pleased to see business people, as professional accountants, and as citizens and as human beings that the government has taken for a course of action to reduce suffering in Ontario, speed the recovery and move towards restructuring our economy to flourish in a changing global environment. We support sustainable growth as an objective.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Porter, I want to thank you very much for your excellent, articulate presentation. It is important for all of us, and for those Ontarians who are paying attention and will read the Hansard from these discussions, to appreciate that there are objective business opinions that concur with the direction that we have taken. The opposition has been trying to portray the budget as wild-eyed socialists having gone crazy with the purse. In reality, as we see it, is something completely different. I am confident that by the end of these provincial hearings on the budget there will at least be a balanced opinion on there that would suggest that there are a goodly number of objective professionals, as well as ordinary citizens, who recognize that what the government did was a prudent course of action, that indeed it is a good budget for these times.

I note that you talk about your clients not being abstract or faceless business entities and that they are everyday people who are very close to their businesses.

I would like to focus my question on a statement made in the middle of the second page of your presentation where you state, "It is right and proper that the government of Ontario attempt to soften the blows, shorten the length of the recession and prepare for the recovery." I would like to ask you what you think would be the plan of Ontario with regard to that statement had we not gone the direction we did, but rather had gone the way that the federal government has, which would be to chop service, hold the line and make that budgetary concern, that debt constraint, the priority and ignore all these other things. What do you think, from your perspective, would have been the result in Ontario for the people who you work for and represent?

Mr Porter: Let me start this way. I think a lot of the smaller and middle-sized businesses that we represent were very much affected because they provide services to working people. Some of them provide services to other businesses, but many of them provide services directly to employees. It seems to me that following a course of action of maintaining even the deficit of approximately ion would have contributed quite dramatically to increasing unemployment. It was that, probably above all, the psychology that creates, the kind of conservatism people have where they will not spend because they are not sure they are going to have a job tomorrow, that really affected markets for smaller businesses. While on the one hand you are preserving jobs, on the other hand you are helping to create an atmosphere in which people are more confident that this thing was going to find a bottom, that things were going to turn around, and just created an economic climate where you could actually find customers. So from a small business point of view I think it is probably the most significant psychological impact. I do not think there is very much in the budget that goes directly towards giving things to people. It is maintaining existing programs, it is building capital expenditures and that sort of thing. At the day-to-day level of smaller businesses that is the single biggest impact. Ordinary people began to believe it was not a bottomless spiral and they could look to a possibility of coming out of the recession.

Mr Jamison: I have just one fairly quick question. You stated in your submission that there is a view "that the heavy economic engines in Ontario cannot be allowed to go down unattended or fall further into a state of disrepair." As you may know, we have invested in the future by investing in the infrastructure of the province. You go on to say, "It is right and proper that the government of Ontario attempt to soften the blows, shorten the length of the recession and prepare for the recovery." If we had not done what we have done in the budget, do you feel the recession could be a longer, deeper recession?

Mr Porter: We now know that all the statistics seem to be pointing to the fact that the recovery began in the second quarter, although at the same time there is a very strong body of opinion that says it is beginning rather weakly and inconsistently. I said our firm is quite optimistic and we believe that a lot of recessions end that way. All the statistics do not turn suddenly at once.

Again, the single biggest thing was a clear signal from the very large province, a very important province, that it was not going to go along with simply fighting deficits, that it was going to actually put a block under this recession as much as it could and to turn and signal to people that somebody was going to play Tom Henke, if you want, and be the stopper. I think that was the single biggest message from the point of view of fighting the recession.

The future, in terms of working with the private sector to develop high-tech, high-value-added jobs—I think that is the terminology used in the budget, and which I agree with—is the real way to have a sustainable long-run recovery and to really turn the problems in Ontario manufacturing around. I think the indications of that are in the budget.

Mr Kwinter: I would just like to make a comment before my colleague speaks. I have never heard such garbage in all my life.

Mr Porter: Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: You said yourself there were signs of the recovery in the second quarter. The budget did not come out until the end of the second quarter. There has been very little money spent on anything to date. There have been projections of what they are going to spend. To say that the best signal that ever went out is that someone is going to take control—if you read anything about the budget, it was just the opposite. People were saying the greatest concern was about the deficit. Whether they understood it or not makes no difference. I am talking about the general public. The reason we are having these hearings is because of the general feeling against the budget, and to suggest that the greatest thing that happened in this budget was that it gave a sense of confidence to people, that Tom Henke was in there as a stopper, is absurd. It is absolutely absurd to listen to this. I cannot believe it. Carry on.

Mr Porter: Is that a question?

Mr Kwinter: I said I just wanted to comment before my colleague asked a question.

The Chair: Normally he is not quite so lucid in his opinions.

Mr Phillips: I tend to agree with my colleague. You are in a different world than I am in terms of the business community. I will ask a question, though, on another comment you made, that you see the economy recovering a lot better than the budget figures. I would be interested in your estimates, because obviously you know the budget really well. What are your estimates for the recovery and, therefore, if those numbers you predict are right, what kind of surpluses should the government be running as it moves into that?

Mr Porter: I really have not worked out what I think the future budget should look like. We would look at the economy on a quarterly basis in our own firm, and the last look we had was just last month. People are talking now about 2.6% and 3% kinds of growth. We really felt the growth would be more in the neighbourhood of 4% in 1992. We do not believe the inflation targets the Bank of Canada has set will be reached, at least we hope they are not, because if they are, we believe it will be a fairly brutal experience on the economy. This is a national organization. We have not worked through for Ontario what we think that will mean in terms of increased tax expenditures and that sort of thing and exactly how the deficit should decline and so on.

Mr Phillips: I find that curious because in your document you say: "Our own view is that the provincial economy will recover somewhat more quickly and reach somewhat higher levels than is predicted in the budget papers. If we are correct, we recommend reducing provincial deficits more quickly."

Mr Porter: That is all we are recommending. We are not giving exact numbers.

Mr Phillips: I assume you have looked at this. You have obviously projected out, I gather, what is going to happen to the provincial economy. What would you therefore be suggesting to the government in deficits?

Mr Porter: As I said, we have not worked through it from the point of view of what we think the impact would be on tax revenues on the one side or the expenditures and program spending on the other side, so I am not in a position to tell you what I think the deficits should be.

Mr Phillips: What are you predicting for economic growth, then?

Mr Porter: As I said, I think in 1992 we can look at a 4%—

Mr Phillips: Real growth?

Mr Porter: Yes.

Mr Phillips: And if that were the case, what kind of deficit do you think the government should be running?

Mr Porter: I have tried to answer this question twice already.

Mr Phillips: I am relying on your credibility in this thing in that you have obviously studied the budget, and I assumed you had looked ahead at what your firm believes economic growth will be and what the deficits will be. One of our concerns is that, for ever, for the next 10 years, with economic growth at 4%, we are still looking at deficits of $7 billion, $8 billion a year. I had thought your firm had done some analysis and said it was predicting a certain growth and therefore deficits should be lower.

Mr Porter: We do think they should be lower. Because we think the economy will grow a little faster than the budget working papers predict, we believe it will be possible to reduce the deficits. On the other hand we also talk in this same presentation, and our view is, that the government should develop with the private sector a number of programs in terms of helping to develop productivity, high-value-added jobs, research and development and so on. Really, it is part of the capital fund for increasing expenditures on that side.

Mr Phillips: By the way, is your firm in agreement with the way they are planning to account for the capital fund?

Mr Porter: We think it is a good idea to separate operating and capital funds.

Mr Phillips: But do you agree with the way they are going to account for it?

Mr Porter: I cannot answer the question because I am not sure. I have not looked into the details of how it is planned to be accounted for.

Mr Phillips: It is quite important. As somebody who has studied the budget, I think they plan, as I think you know, to show virtually no cost to the capital for the next four years. I would be interested in the accounting community's view on that because most of your private sector clients wanted to show some appreciation. I think it is hocus-pocus finance but I assume your firm studied the budget. I would like your view on that.

Mr Porter: No cost account? What do you mean, they are not showing depreciation? What is it there?

The Chair: Time is up.

Mr Phillips: Maybe you could give us your view on that in writing. I have asked a few others, if you would not mind.

Mr Porter: I will look into it, sure.

The Chair: The next five minutes for the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr Sterling: I am totally amazed at your presentation today because I have always thought CGAs represent small business. I have not met one small businessman, woman in my constituency who has anecdotally said they could understand where the government was going on the budget. They are not only in disapproval but they are frightened by the fiscal policies of this government. I have been in politics for a long time and I have followed a number of issues which the CGAs have been involved in very much and I am very cynical about this presentation and its motivations. I do not want any other questions.

Mr Jackson: Just to build on that, can you name at least one of your Ontario-based small business clients who has told your firm they support this budget? Has a client called you up and said, "Look, we're just wild about this thing," or, "We think it is supportable, we think it is good for my business"?

Mr Porter: Yes, I could name clients because I have personally received phone calls from clients who support the budget. It is not my business to do so. Relations between clients and accountants are confidential in nature.

Mr Jackson: Do they know you are taking this position on behalf of the firm and referring now on record that you have received support from your clients for this budget?

Mr Porter: Any of them who have talked to me about the budget, which is a lot of them, know where I stand on the budget.

Mr Jackson: That is not what my question was. My question was, do they concur with your—

Mr Porter: We did not sent any announcement to—

Mr Jackson: The kind of firms I work with normally do that. Yours does not publish a letter of analysis? You are not that large a firm.

Mr Porter: We do. We send out an analysis of the budget.

Mr Jackson: Could you submit that to this committee so we could have a look at what your firm said as opposed to your personal views on this matter? Could you make that available to this committee?

Mr Porter: I can do that but I cannot do it today.

Mr Jackson: What was your firm's position? I understand your personal position in terms—

Mr Porter: When you receive it you will find that what we do at the time is simply send out a statement, basically, of fact. This is reasonably traditional among accounting firms. The commentary is almost kept to nil and you basically report what is in the budget and report what the basic statements of the Treasurer of the day are, whatever the political persuasion of the Treasurer. It is a fairly non-political statement.

Mr Jackson: And your senior partners would have met to discuss these matters. Are you one of those or that—

Mr Porter: I am one of the founding partners. We met to discuss it.

Mr Jackson: And that is the consensus of your partners?

Mr Porter: Yes, the consensus, that is true.

Mr Jackson: Okay. Are you aware of the government's need to raise $1 billion in revenue each month of this fiscal year?

Mr Porter: It would have to be somewhere near that based on the deficit.

Mr Jackson: And are you aware that the current tax mechanisms available to this government, with its sent projections, would indicate that it will fall short?

Mr Porter: No.

Mr Jackson: If that were true, what in your view as economist would be the options of the government faced with that reality?

Mr Porter: I am not an economist, I am an accountant, first of all.

Mr Jackson: Thank you for correcting me. You sound more like an economist than you do an accountant, but I apologize.

Mr Porter: I have not said "on the one hand" or "on the other hand" all morning.

Mr Jackson: That would make you sound like a politician.

Mr Christopherson: And then he would be like you.

Mr Porter: Can you just summarize this? You are saying the government is falling short by $1 billion a month.

Mr Jackson: I have been advised by certain persons to have analysed the budget that there is a shortfall in revenue projections, even with the $10-billion deficit and certain optimistic growth projections for revenue. As an accountant, when that situation occurs, what options are available to a government?

Mr Porter: The only options available if you still have a shortfall is you have to increase borrowing, increase taxes or cut expenditures. Those are the three options any government always has.

Mr Jackson: Which of those options do you think would be in Ontario's best interests if that were the case?

Mr B. Ward: Hypothetically speaking.

Mr Jackson: He has been answering hypothetically all morning.

Mr Porter: I wanted to start off by saying that this is hypothetical, because you are telling me this. It is obviously that kind of thing.

Mr Jackson: It has occurred in most of the last few years, incidentally, that we have had a shortfall. That is well known to you, I am sure.

Mr Porter: Obviously, some form of prudent mix is what you need. I do not think you do one or the other.

Mr Jackson: So you are referencing to the wealth tax or to this land speculation tax as a potential supportable document for you as an accountant, a supportable approach?

Mr Porter: I stated here what we thought of the land speculation tax. We thought that certainly principal businesses should be exempted, that is, people who really do develop land. Otherwise, it will cause a disinterest in developing property in Ontario.

Mr Jackson: What about the transfer of properties, like a nursing home or whatever, a day care centre, anything of that nature, private business that extends into the social sector?

Mr Porter: You ask me if there should be a tax on that kind of transfer?

Mr Jackson: That is what would be embraced by land spec tax or land transfer and land spec tax.

The Chair: Our time is up, so I must interject and thank you for your presentation.

Mr B. Ward: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I am a little bit troubled by the comments, I think from Mr Kwinter, I realize in the heat of the moment. We have individuals we invited to come down to give presentations on their points of view of the budget, and I am going to have some difficulty in accepting what I hear at times from certain groups or organizations, but I really do not think we should use words like "garbage" or other words that I think are inappropriate for this committee. Sure, we can disagree and we can ask pointed questions, but that was a little bit extreme.

Mr Jackson: I would have used "irresponsible" myself.

Mr B. Ward: I am expressing my opinion. I do not think it is appropriate at this committee to use language like that when we invite people down here to express their opinions.

Mrs Sullivan: That is not a point of order.

The Chair: I do not think we should enter into a debate on this. I think we should maybe take that as a consideration, that we would like to have a nice atmosphere in here so that a good exchange of information can take place. Thank you again for coming and for your thoughts and opinions.

Mr Porter: Thank you very much.

FAIR SHARE FOR PEEL TASK FORCE

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Fair Share for Peel Task Force, Hal Brooks, chairman. We have allocated half an hour of time. The length of your presentation will be subtracted from the half-hour and whatever time is left over will be equally divided among the three parties for questions. Thank you for coming. We will just have a moment while the brief is handed out and then we can begin.

Mr Brooks: Mr Chairman, members of the legislative committee, good morning and thank you very much for the opportunity to meet with you. My name is Hal Brooks and I am currently the president of the board of directors of the United Way for Peel Region. This morning I am speaking to you on behalf of the Fair Share for Peel Task Force, a group of major child and family service agencies in our community. With me is Mr John Huether, who is the executive director of Peel Children's Aid Society and also a board member of the Peel United Way.

We are concerned about our community. The infrastructure required to meet child and family service demands in Peel is clearly inadequate. Furthermore, the gap between demonstrated needs and service capability is now widening. The implications of this gap are indeed serious and we believe they challenge the social stability within our region. Peel, like other outlying regions in the greater Toronto area, has experienced dramatic population growth. With that, rapid transformation from a rural to very much an urban profile has occurred over the last decades.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services not long ago released the Children First report. As you are well aware, this document makes an impassioned plea that the wellbeing of children and the protection of their entitlements must be society's highest priority. This is certainly consistent with a number of related initiatives, some even international in scope. I refer here of course to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

The agencies that provide for children and families in Peel are frustrated, frustrated because the tremendous growth and need in the region have far outstripped the capacity to meet it, frustrated because the primary resource allocations from the province do not presently recognize this growth nor provide for it.

Nevertheless, we were heartened by the adoption in the Legislature in June of resolution 15:

"That, in the opinion of this House, recognizing that there currently exists a chronic underfunding of social services for children, youth and families in the region of Peel, which has caused a report to be prepared by the Fair Share for Peel Task Force consisting of volunteer presidents and senior staff from the Children's Aid Society for Peel Region and the United Way of Peel Region, which report has clearly shown the need for a consistent method for allocating provincial grants for social services, the Minister of Community and Social Services should take concrete steps to increase the service base to a satisfactory level over a five-year period and develop an equitable funding formula that recognizes population growth and social indicators."

We commend the Legislature for recognizing both the seriousness of the issues at hand and the need for decisive action on this front on behalf of not just the children and families of Peel, but of Ontario as well.

Regarding the report of the fair share task force, I would draw your attention initially to the page which lists organizations in Peel which have so far provided formal support for our initiative. These represent broad-based and grass-roots organizations in our community.

The main body of the report, and I believe everyone has a copy, chronicles the allocation of provincial funds to our community in various categories. In each case, typical service implications for Peel agencies are highlighted. For example, on page 7 you will notice towards the bottom that the Peel Children's Centre has wait lists of approximately 14 months. Even cases of extreme need will wait four or five months for service and there are presently no crisis intervention services available in Peel. In the child welfare category on page 11 is another example. If you go to the last line, you will notice that the per capita support for Peel is less than half of the provincial average. In fact, it is the second worst in Ontario, slightly ahead of York Region, which is another GTA region, as you know. This places tremendous strain on children's aid society programs, and some of the implications are listed on pages 12 and 13 at the bottom. Similar findings are reported in categories of child care, developmentally challenged family services.

Let me give you some very typical case studies provided by the Catholic Family Services of Peel-Dufferin.

Mrs A called the Catholic Family Services of Peel-Dufferin to get help for her two school-aged children, Sarah and Peter, who were having behaviour problems at school. They had seen a social worker at school who assessed them and felt they needed longer-term counselling, which the school could not provide. The school social worker felt that the children were experiencing many problems because they had witnessed the murder of their father two years earlier. Six months after the original call, they are still waiting for service.

A second one: Mr B recently contacted the agency to get help for his son, who had been sexually abused by a relative. They had just completed a very agonizing trial which had resulted in a conviction of that relative. They had received great support during the trial from a court-appointed psychologist and others. Several months after the trial, however, Mr and Mrs B's marriage took a turn for the worse under the weight of the trial experience. Mr B called the agency for help but was placed on a waiting list. Five weeks later he called back to say his wife had forced him to leave the house, and they are still waiting for help from the agency.

Finally, Mrs C called the agency recently because her marriage was falling apart. She and her husband had tried to sort out their problems on their own without success. They called family services to get help to make their marriage work. They have two young children, Tim and Wayne, and would prefer that the family stay together. Several months after the original call, Mrs C called back to say the situation was getting much worse. Several people had suggested lawyers, but they did not wish to separate. They were unable to afford a private therapist. Separation will probably mean Mrs C will have to apply for family benefits.

We could go on and on. These are real-life situations that currently exist in the region of Peel.

What do we want from Ontario? Primarily and first of all we would like recognition that children and families are the greatest and most important resource we have in this province, and then funding priorities which reflect that commitment. Second, we would like recognition, as resolution indicated, that areas with high population growth have not been well served by the current funding algorithms. Redress is required to provide some form of equity of service, and we look forward with considerable hope and anticipation to working with the government in addressing these issues in a very co-operative and collaborative fashion. Thank you very much.

Mrs Sullivan: I am very interested in your presentation. I think you make a compelling case. Coming from the ighbouring area of Halton, which has not experienced the same amount of growth that Peel has but certainly has had the same pressures on children and family services, I would like to ask some very specific questions. First, have you completed in Peel an infrastructure review that includes both capital and operating needs for the long term and presented that to government? Has that exercise been gone through in Peel?

Mr Brooks: I could ask John on some of the specific questions, if you would not mind.

The Chair: You could perhaps introduce him.

Mr Brooks: John Huether, as I mentioned at the outset, is the executive director of Peel Children's Aid Society. He is also a board member of the United Way.

Mr Huether: In 1988 we conducted a needs study outlining some of the priorities within the region, which has been submitted to government. In terms of prioritizing capital expenditures, no, we have not done that.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you also have a joint committee—this is just sort of information-gathering—of people who are involved in the delivery of children's health and care services who work together to present priority lists to the ministry in terms of funding?

Mr Huether: We do have an interagency committee that is working on formalizing the kind of structure you are talking about. On an ad hoc basis, we have co-operatively worked with the local area office in prioritizing needs and use of the available dollars within the region. Our problem is, how do we stretch the dollars? There are only so many things you can do with the dollars and it is a Hobson's choice we are faced with.

Mrs Sullivan: Have you joined with other children's aid societies in the growth areas that are facing intense pressure on their budgets and that have been operating and are operating in a deficit position? Have you joined that particular group of children's aid societies?

Mr Huether: Our children's aid society and board are actively participating with the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies' board and funding committee to present the issues and to try to see that they are addressed in a systematic way. We are not making fast progress, but the association had a meeting with the minister in the spring. Another one is scheduled for the early part of September. She has assured us that she sees there are fundamental problems with the child welfare funding formula and is prepared to work with us to try to address that. At this point in time, there have been no additional dollars provided to address that and there are a number of societies in the GTA that are in very serious trouble.

Mrs Sullivan: Including our own.

Mr Brooks: Could I add to that an additional response? We recognize beyond the CAS, which is certainly a critical area of need, other agencies that are reflected in categories in this report. We have worked in some concert and collaboration with regions like York to make them aware of what we are doing. I understand they are in the process of releasing a report not unlike this one; their chronicles. We recognize that these are GTA issues and there has to be some response which is co-ordinated, but we are here today because we represent the particular issues within Peel region.

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly in the budget hearings, because in the budget you do not see these problems being addressed nor a beginning.

I want to ask a question about commercial child care. Do you see the recent changes in policy relating to the funding of pay equity programs for commercial child care as affecting the availability of child care in your area?

Mr Huether: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: Would you like to comment further on that? How many of your young people are in commercial child care centres now?

Mr Huether: Our task force has not looked at that particular issue in specific terms so I cannot give you specific examples, but it is a reality in Peel that the commercial child care centres have made up a reasonably high proportion of the centres in that community, and there is no question that they are having considerable difficulty surviving.

Mrs Sullivan: In Halton, I think more than 70% of our children are in commercial child care centres and I wondered if the figures were comparable.

Mr Huether: I am sorry, I do not have the figures available to be able to talk to that other than to say that in general terms there is a decline in available child care spaces.

Mr Jackson: I would like to build on that question because I think one of the offensive priorities of the current socialist government is its interest in building child care spaces but not providing the subsidies or allowing the current system to expand naturally with some funding, but rather to shut down one sector. There is a delay in that. We understand where they are coming from, they support that, but there is a cost in the transition because you are putting money into building competing child care spaces at taxpayer expense when there is an incredible demand, particularly in Peel—there is across Ontario, but it is particularly acute in the GTA because of growth—for subsidized spaces or for increased subsidized space levels.

I think that really hits at the nub of an offensive priority where money may be going into capital but that money could be going into program. Is that the concern being expressed? It has nothing to do with the philosophical argument of for-profit or not-for-profit; it is just that for every dollar you are putting into bricks and mortar you cannot be helping a family who is on a waiting list.

Mr Huether: I think my perspective of the problem of available subsidy dollars for child care in Peel is that every single additional cent that might be available for social services or any soft services in the region is going into paying the 20% of the municipal share of welfare, and therefore the region, even with a significant tax increase, is not able to pick up the available spaces that can be made because it cannot afford to put an additional burden on the property tax base. That is an incredible dilemma that the regional government is facing and is something that I think is of much more concern in terms of its impact on the number of subsidized spaces available.

Mr Jackson: Let me move into that area then. One of the other offensive priorities of this socialist government which concerns me is that it has shelved the Provincial-Municipal Social Services Review Committee report, the Ron Book report, which I thought was a fairly good document in terms of bringing focus to the relationship between municipal funding levels and provincial responsibilities. Obviously that document made some recommendations—we are pleased it went that far—showing the changes in ratios.

My understanding, from discussions at the deputy ministerial level, is that that this whole document is dead, that the years of progress we thought we were getting towards in terms of stabilizing not only the formulas about participation but also acceptance of growth factors which have become so acute in York and Peel—and you are at the top of the list for how serious this problem is in this province.

Are you concerned about the fact that the government seems to be turning its back on these reforms but is rather infatuated with some other reforms that have little, if anything, to do with children's mental health services and social service delivery?

Mr Huether: Our task force has not specifically looked at the details of the PMSSR but there is no question that the governance issues, which is what you are talking about in terms of social services, need to be addressed. The Children First paper that Hal made reference to also raises that as a fundamental question that needs to be addressed.

Mr Jackson: My final question has to do with this whole issue of children's aid societies because, like Mrs Sullivan, coming from Halton, we are quite aware of the dire straits that children's services are in particularly in the GTA and in northern Ontario which it is also experiencing severe cases.

The budget document sets out the government's priorities. They cannot do all things for all people. The day before the budget they wrote off some $200 million owing with respect to the Dome. They made a major transfer, about a third of a billion dollars, to the teachers' pension plan. There were some very subtle priorities expressed by the socialists and yet we did not get confirmation that there is enough of a buffer in the Ministry of Community and Social Services to accommodate the adjustment in your growth factor.

I am not disputing that it took four or five months to get the minister's attention to a meeting. You got that. There is speculation in the paper that we are going to have a new minister so the whole thing is going to be set back another little while.

The fact is that there is no money in this budget to address your concern. That has been confirmed at the deputy ministerial level. How do you feel about the fact that we have seen no indication that the government is prepared to cut from other programs in order to honour its informal discussions with you to address a serious problem facing children? I know what it means in my region. The increased suicide rate among our youth is the most graphic demonstration of the cost of this offensive priority.

Mr Brooks: Just to respond, we recognize that government faces some very tough decisions. We do want to minimize those choices that you face at all. I guess our position and the reason we are here, as I mentioned the conclusion of my comments, is to make an immodest plea that children and families represent the highest priority within this government and, second, that the whole allocation system be thoroughly reviewed because what is inherent in it right now are some really gross inequities.

It is fine within the GTA for communities like 50,000 and 100,000 people to spring up. Somebody looks after the roads and the sewers and perhaps, if we are lucky, the police force, but there are a lot of other soft services that have to be put in place and there has not been recognition of those growth factors in the past, and we are hurting.

Mr Christopherson: I think within the issues that you raise you have probably dealt with, one way or another, half the issues that impact on this government. The other half, part of your comments about the infrastructure and the relationship with municipal governments and the need there are ones that are very close to me, having spent 25 years in local government before I came here myself.

I was also interested in the concerns and references made both by questions and in your comments to PMS about the Hopcroft report, the whole issue of disentangling the infrastructure. All of these are priorities for both levels of government and certainly all the services that are contained within the communities that are mentioned. Children and families are a top priority, I would suggest to you are one of the driving reasons why you have a budget such as we have in front of us here in this province.

It was mentioned by previous members that certain things were not addressed and some things were omitted. I would like to make a statement and put a question to you: that one of the things we attempted to do was to follow a philosophy that said we cannot walk away from the people of Ontario during this major recession, the most important and deepest recession since the 1930s. We cannot walk away from those people and ignore them, and so we have done everything we can to maintain the kind of service, beef up the services where at all possible, and still try to remain as fiscally responsible as we can. Quite a balanced act.

I would like to ask you, first of all, if you believe in general, that thrust during a recession is the right thing to do, and if it is—and I am asking this hypothetically—how would following the other approach, the Mirony approach, have impacted on the agencies and the people you represent? If we had held the line and cut back on services and not recognized the need to at least maintain, how would that have impacted on the people and the agencies that you represent?

Mr Brooks: Perhaps we could both respond, and I could go first.

Mr Huether: One thing that needs to be recognized about the services we provide is that our volumes go up in ce of a recession. The number, for example, of credit counselling referrals that have been made to Family Services of Peel that it cannot respond to are approaching 300 and 400. So as the government responds in terms of making available the funding through GWA and FBA, it needs to recognize that there are a group of support services like Family Services of Peel for credit counselling. Our agency is faced an average of 100 additional families a month at we are having to serve. Our abuse statistics, in terms of allegations, have gone up significantly over the last eight months, and yet we have no additional capacity to respond to that. So that would be part of my answer.

The other reality, I have to say, is that in answer to your question about the federal government, it is very clear that the government is facing the negative impact of the limit on the Canada assistance plan, and that is affecting all of our ability to respond to the people because of that limit. It is clearly that has had a negative impact on our ability to respond and your ability to support us.

Mr Brooks: In making reference to the cap on CAP, I could certainly agree that in economically troubled times focus on people, people being the priorities, is important. In terms of the decisions you face, what gets the funding and what not, you face some very tough decisions, and I really cannot comment in terms of what goes and what stays, other than to say that we represent and feel passionately, at the grass-roots level, that the impact on children and families within our community because of the growth has been bad enough. The recession, as John has just mentioned, through Family Services, Rapport Youth and Family Counselling, all these, adolescent services and so forth—when families are under stress, they tend to fracture, and it is agencies such as ours that are expected to pick up and run with the ball, and we are hurting.

In terms of the juggle of priorities that it comes down to, I guess what we are asking for is that children and family services—furthermore I would like to applaud you. The mere opportunity to come and talk about these things and for the government to open the doors to say, "Let's sit down around a table and deal with the issues in a very up-front fashion," the mere opportunity to dialogue is refreshing. I would encourage you to proceed in that direction.

Mr B. Ward: I represent the city of Brantford and I assure you that although we have not had the same growth as Peel from a population standpoint, we do share economic pressures and, as a result of the recession, the ever-present need for social services.

I asked this question of a previous participant. There are some groups and organizations in this province that are criticizing our government for taking the stand we did in this budget and ensuring that the effects of the recession from an economic standpoint, are lessened as much as possible on the grass-roots people, the working people in Ontario. We have been criticized for that, and these groups are saying we should be cutting those programs, we should be cutting out the social safety nets. What I am hearing from you in fact, because of the impact of the recession, is that there is an ever-present need for services that you provide. In fact, it is being underfunded to a degree, not only from the growth standpoint, but also because of the impact of recession.

Am I clear on that? I believe that was the gist of your presentation, that rather than cutting the programs of organizations that have been crying to us and criticizing us for not doing it, in fact more money should have been allocated, if possible.

Mr Brooks: I have two responses: First is, I think it is incumbent upon all of us to adopt a spirit of continuous improvement in the way in which service is delivered, so that we get the most efficient and effective delivery of service for the dollar investment. I mean, we have to do that and we have to be encouraged to do that; to sit down and work collaboratively so that there is an overlap in service and that the money is not going into bricks and mortar—

Mr B. Ward: Or more properly, duplication of service.

Mr Brooks: Duplication of service and those kinds of things, that is part of it, but fundamentally, within that process of dialogue and with the government, to recognize the inequities that exist in the allocation systems, and some of them are chronicled in the report, as I mentioned. For Peel to have doubled its population in a little over a decade, the funds to provide that infrastructure are not there, so that what we end up doing is Band-Aid stuff. It is like a balloon: You squeeze it here and it pops out over there.

The Chair: Time is up.

Mr B. Ward: Quickly, I did not see anything on day care, and there seemed to be a focal from our friends across. Which page was it?

Mr Brooks: There is a day care package on page 12.

Mr B. Ward: Did I miss it?

Mr Brooks: Yes. I highlighted a couple, pages 9 and 10. Page 9 is the statistics and 10 is the analysis.

The Chair: Time is up anyway, gentlemen. Thank you for coming and for your presentation.

ALLIANCE FOR EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Alliance for Employment Equity, Handel Mlilo. Please introduce the person that you are with and begin your presentation.

Mr Mlilo: I am Handel Mlilo. I am co-ordinator for the Alliance for Employment Equity, and with me is Carol McGregor, co-ordinator for Disabled People for Employment Equity. Mr Chairman, we would like to thank you for the opportunity of speaking to you today about the first budget presented by the New Democratic Party.

The Alliance for Employment Equity is a coalition of 65 organizations representing women, visible minorities, persons with disabilities and aboriginal persons. We were formed in 1987 to lobby the government to introduce mandatory employment equity legislation in Ontario.

Disabled People for Employment Equity is a broad-based coalition of 33 disability organizations representing the thousands of people with disabilities in Ontario. DP has been in existence since 1985, following the release of the Abella report which identified persons with disabilities as being among the most disadvantaged group, economically and socially, in this country. The primary mandate of DP is to press for mandatory employment equity legislation both on the federal and provincial levels.

We are here today to express our concerns with the budget that was introduced on April 29, 1991. We are quite aware of the attempt by the opposition and business to attack this government for the current deficit. The fact remains that this government inherited a $3.5-billion deficit from the previous Liberal government. This came in spite of the assurances from the then Premier Peterson that the budget was balanced.

Attempts by critics of the NDP government to blame the deficit on overspending will not fool Ontarians who know that the primary responsibility for the recession in Canada must be laid squarely at the feet of the present Conservative government in Ottawa. Its fiscal policies of Reaganomics have resulted in 250,000 workers being laid off by the time the NDP budget was introduced in Ontario.

In order to deflect criticism of their own inept financial policies, the Tories chose to attack a government that was attempting, in our opinion, to deal with the recession in a responsible manner. The NDP chose to assist those most affected by the recession.

From the point of view of employment equity advocates, creating jobs or preventing loss of jobs must be seen as a priority issue. The people on whose behalf we advocate are usually the last ones hired and the first ones fired. While there have been some gains for women and racial minorities in the past few years, the recession has negated this today. Persons with disabilities and aboriginal peoples are still unemployed in large numbers.

It was estimated that disabled people had an unemployment rate of 80% prior to the recession, and we now know that these numbers have risen considerably during the recession. Reports from food banks indicate that disabled people are having to rely on this service just to exist from week to week. Approximately 35% of aboriginal peoples are employed for less than six months per year and aboriginal women earn approximately $5,000 annually. I would like Carol to continue from here.

Mrs McGregor: We understand the difficult position that the Treasurer was in in attempting to deal with the overwhelming problems facing this province, but we have some serious concerns about the budget that we would like to address at this time.

1. In the budget, $24 million was allotted to the public service for employment equity initiatives. Of these monies, $11 million was committed by the previous Liberal government. The budget is strangely silent on funding for the new Employment Equity Commissioner. In fact, we know that the commissioner received only $1 million to carry out her mandate of developing legislation. This is to include the cost of consultation throughout the province. This makes one wonder about the true commitment of this government to employment equity.

2. The budget makes no mention of extending funding for accommodation for persons with disabilities in the public service. At a time when various ministries should be encouraging persons with disabilities to apply for positions, this omission could have serious repercussions. In fact, it is now taking up to one year to accommodate an employee who is disabled within the public service. This is totally unacceptable from our viewpoint. You will not be able to retain disabled people within any ministry if you are not able to accommodate them.

3. In its budget submission, the government recognizes the importance of education and training for jobs. In its previous submission that we made prior to the budget, we pointed out that students with disabilities at colleges and universities must have expanded funding to compensate them for their extra expenses incurred as a result of accommodating their disability while attending post-secondary education. There is nothing in this budget to address that problem.

4. If a person wishes to access programs on job training, he or she must have a job in the first place. For aboriginal persons and persons with disabilities, those opportunities have not existed previously. We are not able to access those programs and, again, there is nothing in this budget to address that. Where are the training initiatives that will enable these groups to enter the workforce?

5. In the budget there is a reference to equity for aboriginal peoples. There is a commitment for $48 million to assist aboriginal peoples in establishing self-government and land claims. However, there is nothing to assist large numbers of aboriginal peoples who live in urban centres. Off-reserve people are not fully represented in the budget.

6. In the budget there is a strong commitment to equity by this government. The years of discrimination towards women have unfortunately made it necessary for the government to respond in this fashion. However, we would like to point out that if previous governments had introduced mandatory employment equity legislation, there would not be this necessity to correct past wrongs. Mandatory employment equity legislation would have achieved the same objective and would have assisted all three designated groups simultaneously.

This budget attempts to respond to the ravages of a serious recession. If the opposition is indeed concerned about the deficit, then it should be working in partnership with the government to find solutions that will alleviate the pain caused by this recession. The charade of public hearings will do nothing to put food on the table for workers who have been laid off. It is not going to assist disabled people who have to continue to use food banks in large numbers. The charade will just increase this deficit. The voters of Ontario will not be misled.

We urge the government to stay with the values that got it into office in the first place. It is these values that won them the right to form the government. We urge them to ignore their detractors and carry out the promises that were made during the election. Mandatory employment equity is just one such promise.

The Chair: Thank you. We have five minutes left for each of the parties, beginning with the New Democratic Party.

Ms M. Ward: I appreciate your advice, which you started off with, telling us to stay on track. You emphasize problems that the disabled face and I think that is a very good point to be emphasized. It is something that the public should realize could happen to any of us. We could at any point be disabled and be in that situation. Sometimes we have to appeal to people on their own self-interest.

What I would like to ask you is if you think we are heading in the right direction. I think I gather that from your presentation. You have some recommendations of things you think we should be moving a little faster on, the employment equity, but overall do you feel that the direction being taken is the correct one?

Mrs McGregor: We felt initially that the direction the government was taking was in the right direction. However, I must tell you that the disabled community in particular has serious reservations about the direction that your government is heading in.

We are not happy with long-term care, although I am hoping to let other people coming in this afternoon probably speak on that. Transportation remains an issue. As for employment equity, the recent speech by Juanita Westmoreland-Traoré gives cause to think that you are backing away from your previous commitment of Bill 172.

The disabled community is at a very militant stage. We have had promises from the NDP government. We worked very hard in consultation with your leader to develop Bill 172. This is a bill that he put his heart into. We put a lot of hours into trying to develop this legislation that would affect all the four groups and labour. This was not done just on a whim. To back away from this piece of legislation at this time would seriously damage your own reputation with our community.

We had been promised at a meeting in the fall with the premier that we would have employment equity legislation by this spring. Obviously, we do not have it. We were told at a recent meeting earlier with the new commissioner that we would have legislation come September. We will not have that legislation by September.

We probably will not get this legislation introduced into the House until next spring, following yet another round of consultations. We have been consulted to death about employment equity, about the wrongs that have been done to us.

You cannot expect this community to stand back and support you while there are repeated attempts to stall. We are not getting people employed. Disabled people are not getting employed. I cannot emphasize it hardly enough. I have people out there who are in dire need. We are being hit very hard by this recession. We have people who are not getting attendant care until five o'clock in the afternoon. They are not getting breakfast until five o'clock in the afternoon. They cannot get out even to go and meet their own ministers because they cannot get transportation. We cannot even get people in the labour force; we cannot get them out of bed.

This group of people is being hit very, very hard by the cuts in services. I do not think this community will stand still without some strong legislation, strong measures coming from this government, and we see this government backing off on disability issues.

Ms M. Ward: There have been increases for the disabled transportation, and the—

Mrs McGregor: The services have been cut back on transportation. I do not know whether you are aware that the city told the disabled community that they must be content with less on Transhelp.

Ms M. Ward: From what I understand about the buses—

Mrs McGregor: We may get that. There is a—

Ms M. Ward: There is an effort to stall at the moment because of the municipalities. The province wants to put in more funding for it but the municipalities have a problem with the matching fund.

I probably had better finish off my questions. In the employment equity, there was $24 million allocated for initiatives in the public service, and the disabled, along with minorities and aboriginal peoples, are the target group of that. That is the public service.

Mrs McGregor: That is right.

Ms M. Ward: You need the legislation, I think, in order to get it to happen in the private—

Mrs McGregor: To the public.

Ms M. Ward: To the broader public, yes.

Mr Sutherland: I guess basically what you are telling us is that you feel this government has not done enough, quickly enough, on the issues of employment equity in terms of the legislative channel, but also on putting the money where our mouth is in terms of other programs within the public service and in those agencies that serve many of the constituents you represent. This seems to be a common theme that we are beginning to hear, despite the fact that we have a $9.7 billion deficit. The demands and the needs are still very great out there and they have become greater.

I guess the other thing you are saying is you are getting very frustrated, and as people who have been patient for a very long time it is easy to understand why you are getting frustrated.

Besides what you have got in your document here, is there any other specific advice you would like to give in the area of employment equity?

Mr Miilo: Yes, I think so. What we are really urging you is to stick to those principles. One of them is lack of mandatory employment equity legislation. It is still as essential as it was before you got elected. It is even more so now because of the effects of a receding economy. The urge for me is, do not be distracted from those principles that got you here and let us get on with it.

Mrs McGregor: I would like to again emphasize the lack of accommodation in the public service. This has been coming to me more and more often. We have several people who have gone into the public service who have yet to be accommodated after eight months. This affects the job performance. It affects the way other employees view disabled people if you do not have the equipment to do your job.

I use a voice computer, for example. If I was to go into the public service, I would even tell you the process, because we are fighting with this government now to try to get one person accommodated. We have been trying now for eight months to get one person a voice computer and a scanner to do his job. Being blind, if you do not have this equipment—I was offered a job with the government, and it was very nice, but I still could not do my job because you guys could not give me the equipment. It is tendered out and to me, this is a ridiculous way to do business with disabled people because you are going to have to develop a large store of specialized equipment that is there so that you are not going to have to wait for months.

You cannot ask people to go in there to do a job and not give them the tools to do that job. I am very competent in what I do, providing I have that equipment to do my job. The people you have hired in your various ministries are very competent, but if you do not give them the equipment to do their job, they are obviously not going to be very efficient in their own job. There has to be a better way of serving the accommodation needs of people within the public service.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for a very good presentation. It is just one year ago, almost today, that the election started, as you probably remember, and I think your community played a big role in the change of government. I always carry the Agenda for People around with me because it certainly was used very much in the campaign and, as I say, I think your community played a big role.

As your community would see priorities, what would be the number one in terms of the government's taking action to be of the most assistance?

Mrs McGregor: You are talking about the disabled community?

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Mrs McGregor: The disabled community right now is not happy with long-term care. We are not happy with deinstitutionalization. We are not happy with employment equity legislation and transportation. Those four are probably all sitting up there equally.

We thought we were going to get something out of long-term care, and it is a very poor piece that came out. We are not at all satisfied with that, and people who are stuck, who are in institutions, you just have to read the cases going on with Christopher Robin right now. Our concern with the children in institutions is very great, and we have to look out for those because they are very vulnerable.

Employment equity legislation: Obviously we have to get our people off welfare. We are attaching a great priority to this. I for one am not convinced that this is going to be the be-all and end-all. The constituency I represent probably does feel that by the time we get this legislation, we are going to automatically get jobs. I am afraid we are not going to get those jobs when we see what is happening after five years on the federal level. Even if we were to introduce this, the backlash even within the Ontario public service is still fairly sharp against disabled people coming in. I am a registered nurse and I still was not initially deemed qualified for a job by anyone, even though I had past work experience. We have a long way to go to accommodate people with disabilities.

I really could not put a priority on any one, but the four still remain top.

Mr Phillips: I think you say in your brief that a high priority is to create jobs, just jobs generically. As you can imagine, there is in this committee quite a difference of opinion about the impact the budget will have in terms of job creation in the province, and my own view is only time will tell. This is an interesting debate we are going to have here, but the proof will only be maybe in a year or two years from now when we see what impact the budget will have.

In terms of the groups and the people that you deal with, are you seeing any change now, in the last month or so, in employment opportunity? We hear the recession is ending. The budget is beginning to kick in now with a positive impact. Are you starting to see a pickup in the economy?

Mr Mlilo: When people say the economy is turning around, is coming up, the people I represent are probably the last ones to feel that. You know, last one hired, first one fired is not a position in which, right now, you start to feel any positive anything. We are starting from a disadvantage in the first place of discrimination in the workplace for the designated groups, and that disadvantage makes it worse during a recession. We applaud recession-fighting measures because they minimize to some extent the pain that the designated groups would suffer, which is even more in many ways.

But in terms of have I seen anything in the last month or are you asking me if I have seen anything in the last two or three years? There may have been positive things here and there for women in racial minorities, but we are just seeing a lot of designated group members who are just not accessing the workplace, because the workplace is still very discriminatory to them. There are dozens of examples of these of people who could come here and and tell you that despite their qualifications, despite their efforts, the workplace is not very friendly sometimes.

Mr Phillips: You would say that the budget is recession-fighting. Is it? The concern some have is that it is fighting the symptoms of the recession, but perhaps rather than accelerating the end of the recession, it may prolong the recession. Does your group have a view on that?

Mr Mlilo: We have read also, as you have, the columnists who have said that perhaps this province took the right road in trying to deal with the economic problem that exist right now. I look at it from the point of view of somebody dealing with disadvantaged people. When somebody says to me, "We are trying one way or the other to minimize the effect of what is going on here"—and that is a positive thing—then I say: "Go on from there. Deal with these systemic problems that exist."

Mrs Sullivan: How do you see that having been done in this budget, the effect of the recession being minimized? From what I hear from you in fact, there has been none of that minimizing effect in your organization; you do not see that effect.

Mr Mlilo: No; I am saying any time you try to blunt increase in unemployment, you indirectly help us, because we are the ones that get there first in the unemployment situation, because of the historic disadvantages. That all I am saying. I am not saying that the claim that it is a recession-fighting budget is being seen, because I have not seen it. I am just saying that in any discussion where nobody is attempting to minimize unemployment rates during higher and minimize effects of economic recessions and so on, you have to look at it and say, people are doing something, at least in the immediate term, and hopefully longer measures in the longer term.

Mr Sterling: I am interested in your views on the projected deficits by the Treasurer over the next three or four years. We hear a lot about the $9.7 billion, but we hear less about the deficit of about $8 billion for the next three years, when we are supposed to be out of the recession and in a positive time. Do you think that the government should be operating at a deficit during that period of time?

Mrs McGregor: I do not see any other way the government is going to operate except in a deficit. We have no problem with the deficit from our perspective. Disabled people never have any money to begin with. We are always living on a deficit. We would like to see the government continue on its course, I think from our perspective, if we had some decent legislation that would enable disabled people to have jobs.

You have to look at the cost of keeping a disabled person at home each year. You are paying people who are qualified, people who have got university degrees, college degrees, to sit at home and collect welfare up to $21,000 and $25,000 to $26,000 a year with support services. If that person were enabled to enter the job market, that would take that burden off it. The other taxpayers would not have to pay.

I do not know of any other society that is so willing to keep disabled people sitting at home collecting welfare as Canada is. We are the last industrialized country to bring disabled people into the workforce. We have such an aversion to having to look at someone who is disabled. I really think that if that legislation is in effect we will start to see a little bit of a shift. Employers will be forced to look at hiring disabled people. That is going to take some of the pressures off the taxpayers. They are going to see the value of having such legislation and perhaps see the value of introducing such positive legislation.

Mr Sterling: My concern is the ability of future governments to take care of special problems of many of the people you represent. My concern is that by continuing to load up the total debt, or the deficit, you make future governments less and less capable. They are less capable because they have fewer dollars to deal with those problems, to support people who are deinstitutionalized and to help people in the community who need extra help.

Mrs McGregor: We would agree with you on that but I think again we have to look at the fiscal policies that are coming out of Ottawa. The transfer payments obviously had a negative effect in how they are being introduced by our community. We are fighting the Tories very hard on this. We are not happy with the fiscal policies in Ottawa. When it trickles down from the feds to the provincial government to the municipal governments, municipal governments are the ones that have to turn around and say, "We cannot provide services."

I have got diabetics coming to me saying they have home care services cut off and no one to load up their insulin syringes—people who are blind having to load up their own insulin syringes. I do not think you would be very happy if I, as a blind person, were to load a syringe and give it to you. Yet we are asking people in their homes not to have anyone come in and do this. So the municipalities are being forced because of lack of resources to do this. We are already being hit. I do not know how much worse off this community that I represent could be in the future than we are right now.

Mr Sterling: My concern when we hear representations, as we did yesterday afternoon from economists and people who have a worldly outlook on the whole matter, is the ability of future governments to take care of the people in the best possible way they can. I have to tell you that it appears that the provincial government has set a direction that was practised by past federal governments. It is going to be in a very, very difficult position to be able to deal with problems. That is my biggest concern. If we do not pay our way now, or if we do not pay our way next year or the year after, how on earth are we going to be able to take care of our people? I do not know the answer to that. I mean, you have to pay some time.

Mrs McGregor: I do not know the answer to that either, but I certainly know that in the last eight years disabled people in boom times were not being served by the present economic policies. We are not being served in the recessionary times either obviously. At some point in time we have to bite the bullet. Yes, we know—everyone tells us to take in our belts, you know, tighten up a little thinner. You are asking people to live on less than $600 dollars a month in most cases. You are asking them to do without food, which is making their health worse. This is in boom times. This is prior to any recession. This is when Ontario was booming, we were asking people to live in poverty like this. In a recessionary time, you want a government to say, "We are going to cut you off even further"? I do not think anybody would expect services to be cut less than they are right now.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this morning. This committee will reconvene this afternoon at 1:30 with the Ontario Federation of Agriculture.

The committee recessed at 1209.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1338.

The Chair: I see a quorum. I would like to begin this afternoon's hearing so we can be on time. We are starting a little late, but that is not a problem.

The format for the hearings is that you will do your presentation, and whatever time is left over from the half-hour you have been allocated will be divided equally among the parties. The questioning will be done in order. Each party will take up its time for the questions. The questions will begin, after you have finished your presentation, by the Conservative Party this afternoon.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

The Chair: Welcome to the post-budget hearings. This is the Ontario Federation of Agriculture; Roger George, president. If you would like to introduce your companions at the table, we can begin.

Mr George: My name is Roger George. I am the president of the OFA. On my right is Carl Sulliman, the chief executive officer of the OFA; on my left, Cecil Bradley, the manager of our research division; and in the back benches we have Laurel Campbell, our media communications officer.

We are indeed pleased to be here this afternoon to speak before this committee of the Legislature. As you know, the OFA has several meetings on an annual basis with senior cabinet ministers, and we did meet with Mr Laughren before his budget to give him our advice. We met again with Mr Rae and a number of cabinet ministers shortly before the budget, and we have obviously passed comment on the budget afterwards.

Today we are here to talk to you about some events that have happened since the budget and about some of the impact of the budget and some of the ongoing events that are happening in Ontario agriculture today. I think they are of significant economic importance to Ontario.

I would like to start off by telling the committee that the OFA is made up of 20,000 individual voluntary members. We have about a $3-million budget. Among our membership we also count some 29 commodity and allied organizations, and we are represented in 47 counties and regions right across Ontario.

For your information, farmers in Ontario farm or have control over 14 million acres of land. That is quite a chunk of real estate when you think about it, so some of the impact of that on rural communities and on the environment is very great indeed. I do not think anyone in this room should sell the farm community short when it comes to realizing the economic importance of this sector to the Ontario economy. So while we are here, of course, to talk about the implications of the 1991 budget, we are also here to tell you people of the importance of our industry and why we need government assistance in some sectors to maintain a strong and vibrant industry, not just for the farmers themselves, but for the Ontario consumer and for the wellbeing of the Ontario economy.

You have before you a brief. I do not intend to through it, just to hit the highlights on the first two or three pages.

As outlined at the bottom of page 1, we are, in Ontario, concerned about the $9.7-billion deficit. It is large, and I guess we are concerned about the projections for ongoing deficits, having come through the last 10 or 15 years where we have seen the very same pattern start in Ottawa and continue to the point where we now have what is essentially an unmanageable federal deficit. We are concerned about the underlying trend to that with this budget.

Having said that, as I said, we believe that ours is a sector where money put in, money invested in agriculture by the province, does have that economic spinoff. Agriculture in my mind is of just as critical an importance to health and education to this province.

On page 2, we do say we are not sure the provincial commitment is as strong as they would have us believe. The Premier has made statements, as has the Minister of Agriculture, about the commitment of the governing party to this industry. We do not see it in the budget. We have seen the agricultural share of the budget decline by another .1% in actual dollars. When we discount the property tax rebate, some $150 million which agriculture has never considered should be part of the agricultural budget anyway, our share of the provincial budget is in decline.

We did welcome the $50 million of interest rebate that was announced shortly before the budget. That was an important safety net for farmers who last year were trapped in spiralling interest costs. That is a short one-year agreement. We are still working with the Ministry of Agriculture toward a longer provincial credit policy for agriculture, because credit is a vital part of our industry. Farmers are large users of borrowed money.

In our mind, the government missed a golden opportunity in the April budget when it came to what we call the net income stabilization account. Here was a great opportunity for the province of Ontario to show its commitment for a relatively small amount of money, some $10 million or $12 million. The government could have committed to this NISA program, as it is called, which is one of the major federal-provincial safety nets. They could have committed themselves to the first year, and that would have triggered additional federal matching funds. That would have been of significant importance to cash crop farmers, who are having an extremely tough time surviving this year. I will talk a little more about that in a second.

On tobacco, in the OFA we are not so much worried about the product as the farmers who produce the product. In our mind, any attempt to tax farmers off the land, to take people off the land, is just an abysmal way of going about things. We are very, very concerned with the tactics of both the federal and provincial governments in two consecutive budgets when they have raised tobacco taxes that way they have without offering any type of transition to those producers. We are dealing with people who for many generations have made their living on those families.

ms—because that is what they are. The tobacco farms Norfolk and Haldimand and Brant counties are family ms.

The taxation on gasoline and diesel fuel, while it does not directly affect farmers, does again alter the competitive position of industries like the food sector and makes us much less competitive in Ontario. Indeed, it adds to cross-border shopping, which does directly affect farmers, particularly those in the dairy sector. In some parts of Ontario fully 25% of the dairy products coming into areas like Sault Ste Marie, as an example, are coming cross-border. That is causing some severe economic hardship on any farmers in the dairy sector.

We did welcome the attempt to put money into waste management, into municipalities. That is a very positive step and one which the OFA applauds and is in support of.

One example of fiscal policy which we felt is ill-timed and ill-conceived is the change in minimum wages. Agriculture relies to a great extent in some commodities on seasonal labour, and the minimum wage is going to have a tremendous, dramatic impact on many horticultural producers in particular. The effects of that are still to be felt. Once again, it strikes us as strange that in a time when on the one hand government talks competitiveness, on the other hand we are bringing in policies which reduce our competitiveness. I think one of the critical things we have to be looking at is to make sure that whatever fiscal policy we bring in, whatever new taxes we bring in, we do not add to that lack of competitiveness and start driving more and more small businesses, farmers included, out of business and driving businesses over the border.

I have spoken directly to some sectors that were discussed in the budget. I just want to take a couple of minutes to bring the committee an update on the state of the industry in Ontario today.

I cannot remember any summer where there has been so much strain, stress and uncertainty in the farm community and particularly the cash crop sector, the grains and oilseeds sector, where the cash flow has just not been there. We have been moving, as I said, into this new generation of safety nets where the farm community, along with the federal and provincial governments, has devised a pair of new safety nets called gross revenue insurance program and NISA which will be there for horticulture and for grains and oilseeds producers for 1992. But in our mind, the governments have abandoned the farmers in this critical transition as we move away from the old ad hoc program through to the new programs and there is just no cash flow. That is leading to many stories of farmers who are almost destitute. They are penniless. They have no cash flow as they await these government programs, from which money will not flow for many months and with some of them not for a year.

As an example, just last week I received a telephone call from a farmer in Huron county. The man farms 1,000 acres, grows 1,000 acres of grain, and he told me he had no money to buy groceries for his family this week. That struck me as being really tragic, really ironic, that he is a farmer growing 1,000 acres of grain, feeding countless hundreds of people, and he does not have enough money to put food on his own table.

That is part of the tragedy that is out there in the rural community. We are caught in this uncertainty with the trade talks. We are caught in international trade wars in some commodities and many farmers are questioning why they are doing what they are doing. Why after three or four generations should they continue to risk the equity that they built up in their operations? Why should they be encouraging their families to continue farming? What sort of inheritance are they leaving to their grandchildren?

This in my mind becomes a critical thing for the members of Parliament down here at the Legislature in Queen's Park to firmly get in their mind. Both urban and rural members have to come to grips once and for all with the fact that farmers cannot keep on doing this for ever and take all these beatings without some aid. Governments have to stand by agriculture in tough times. They have to; otherwise the farmers are just not going to be there when the good times finally roll around. At some point in time, this country, this province is going to lose its food security. We are going to be dependent on food coming in from south of the border or elsewhere. There is always going to be somewhere in the world where they can produce any goods, agricultural or otherwise, cheaper than we can do it here in Ontario.

If we are going to consistently let industries die because of some short-term economic policies, we are treading down a very dangerous and slippery slope. When the people of Ontario stop and think about it, all those millions of people who live in the cities, I do not think they want to see the family farm disappear in Ontario. I would put it to you that it is a real danger at this point in time. There is a real danger of that.

Politicians, if you want something to do in the summer holidays, get out there to rural Ontario. Those of you from urban ridings, get out into the countryside and team up with some people from county federations. They will take you around and you will see some of this hardship. Sure, there are bread lines and soup kitchens in Toronto, but we have equal hardship out there in rural Ontario, and it is high time the province of Ontario finally made some real commitments to rural development issues. I think for too long we in rural Ontario have sat in the shadows of the urban centre seeing billions and billions of dollars pumped into the Golden Horseshoe, all this money pumped into areas within 50 or 100 miles of the Canada-US border, and we have seen rural areas just left to make it on their own.

Well, we are not going to make it on our own unless we get some change in policy, unless we get some support from government to help us through these periods. Sure, farmers will get out there and we will do it. We will generate that economic activity when we can, but until things turn around a bit we cannot do that. Farmers are great spenders when they have money, and the money put into our industry is money well spent.

Sure, we are concerned about some aspects of the budget but we are also not interested in the least bit in discussing with our Minister of Agriculture and Food or any other member of the cabinet any talk about cutbacks in this industry. You should no more consider cutting back agricultural support than you would consider cutting back on education or on health.

Those are my opening remarks and I think we will be open for some questions.

Mr Villeneuve: Roger, thank you and your delegation from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. I think you have painted the picture exactly the way it is, and it may be a little worse. We are actually getting prices for grain right now, not adjusted for anything, that are lower than they were 18 and 20 years ago. I do not know how many people are making their income at what it was 20 years ago, not adjusted for inflation or anything; those are in real dollars. Have you ever seen a situation where at this time of the year there is no market for barley, grain and soybeans?

Mr George: No, I cannot say that I have and I am not sure I want to see it again. I just returned from Manitoba. We were in Winnipeg for the Canadian Federation of Agriculture meeting last week. They have a wonderful crop out there and that same week the minister for the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr Mayer, announced the initial price of wheat in the west at $95 a tonne, and this is down from last year. It was $135 a tonne.

In Ontario the initial price is $75 a tonne. As Mr Villeneuve said, you have to go back 17 or 18 years to find those same prices, and you all know that $75 was worth a lot more 18 years ago. To give you an example, the expected net realized farm income from the whole of the Canadian grains and oilseeds is expected to be $250 million in 1991. Twenty years ago it was $3 billion. When people say Canada was the bread basket of the world, $3 billion is what our farmers were actually making in net profit growing grain that time ago; now we are down to $250 million—one twelfth. That is some example of the state this industry is in, one twelfth of the income of many years ago. As Mr Villeneuve said, it is a tough situation, compounded by the international grain situation out there.

Mr Villeneuve: You have had an experience that you have just shared with us of someone who had no money to buy groceries. A rather ironic thing that occurs is that farmers are now attempting—and I realize we have to save farm land, but right now there is no demand for what they are growing. It is a very negative signal that is coming out. Therefore in order just to exist, to keep the banker off their back, they may try to sell a small parcel of land. We have, I think, an example in Ottawa where the Ministry of Agriculture and Food is spending some $2 million-plus and saving 180 acres of agricultural land that is producing crops that no one wants. I would like your comments on the kind of situation when the Ministry of Agriculture and Food objects vehemently to someone trying to sever a lot just so that he can keep the banker off his back, keep his home and buy some groceries.

Mr George: For many farmers, the way they make the cash flow work is to get a severance or something once a year. I think the fundamental point in this is that if we had a healthy industry, farmers themselves would be the best defenders of farm land. We would be saying of ourselves: "Hands off our farm land. Let's just save every acre we can."

It is very difficult for a farmer to make that case any more. The Ontario Federation of Agriculture, 10 or 15 years ago, was saying we were doing our best to try to slow the development around Toronto. We gave up on that a long time ago when farmers said, "There is nothing we can do." The Premier himself I think acknowledged that at a convention in November, that it is no good trying to freeze land into agricultural production if there is no crop that you can grow on it.

So the first thing you do is make our industry healthy and then we will protect every acre of farm land with our dying breath. Farmers will be the ones who will be defending it. We will not need a Ministry of Agriculture and Food to be defending it on our behalf.

Mr Villeneuve: As a final question, when farmers have money, what is the ripple effect throughout the economy? I think I have some sort of answer to that, but I would like it coming from you. When farmers have dollars to spend, what is the multiplier effect?

Mr George: We believe it is seven to one.

Mr Jamison: Thank you, Roger. We are pleased to have you here today, and the very interesting presentation you gave to this committee earlier on, but certainly times have passed since then. I would like to thank you for your reference to the tobacco industry, that area which I represent. We share your view.

I would like to touch on something we all talk about and that is really about the family farm and how viable the family farm is, subject to the pressures that are there internationally with the problems with GATT and related federal and provincially. What will it take, in your mind? Obviously, from your presentation, we have done some things, and then you are saying very clearly that we have not done enough. What would it take, in your own mind, at this point in time to help the farm community and the family farm as far as farm-gate prices to the farmer are concerned? What is your opinion on that?

Mr George: To the extent that government can directly affect farm-gate prices there is probably little that can be done, other than the fact that some farmers have chosen to get into supply management systems where they have a degree of control over the prices and the profits they can make. Many of our commodities are priced outside the borders of Canada even and we have little or no control. So if you cannot do anything about the actual cash you receive for your product, then you have to get it by looking at the cost of inputs. Governments very clearly can do things and they have attempted to do some things with interest rebates. Fuel becomes one issue. We mention the cost of fuel, and taxes.

One thing the government can do is to be very conservative of not only agriculture but all sectors when you bring in new legislation. I think of the environment. I am concerned that we are going to go hog-wild on environmental issues. Not that we do not need to be very concerned about environment, but every time you bring in a new regulation, there becomes a cost of compliance and in some cases that cost of compliance may be more than the farmer can tolerate. So I think we have to be very careful about balancing those two things off between what is right environmentally and what the industry can actually tolerate and work under.

Another example I think I mentioned earlier where government could give a real shot in the arm to the rural community is with some rural development initiatives. This has been talked about in these buildings for the last 10 years, that I can remember, and we have seen precious little come out of this thing yet other than rhetoric.

It always seems to be, in my mind, one of these issues that kind of floats to the surface. You think there is going to be some sort of pilot project announced—and we thought there might have been in this budget—and then it gets slashed at the last minute because nobody exactly has a good grasp on it. This is where you need the vision. This is where politicians need the vision for rural Ontario, to take a chance, to get some of these things going, because that is where you are going to flush out some other money. There is going to be entrepreneurial money out there and this money is not going to come into agriculture, in my mind, until we get some degree of stability. Investors, entrepreneurs, farmers themselves, are not going to open up their savings account until they have some sense of security that the rural economy in agriculture is indeed on the up and up. Then I think you will see some of these initiatives going, but it needs some help from government to get them started.

Mr Sutherland: I am glad you are here today and thank you for your presentation. I guess the message you want to leave with us—and it is a message that came home to me last Friday when I was in my constituency office. My brother, who is a cash crop farmer, actually called me. He had got one of the initial cheques back on that and it was substantially lower than it had been last year. So I am well aware of the impact hitting home in that degree.

Basically the message you are leaving with us is that we do not do enough, that there is still a lot more that has to be done. I was wondering if you could just give us a little more precise terms on what you think needs to be done, particularly in the short haul. How bad do you think the situation is going to be in the fall? I notice today in one of the papers it says that grain futures are up because there is a possible drought in the United States Midwest. What do you think it will take to carry us over into the GRIP and NISA programs?

Mr George: We have some requests in to the provincial government for some adjustments in the existing stabilization plan, just to get some of the money that has been promised flowing. Some of these things are just administrative bottlenecks. There is nothing more annoying for farmers now. We have been promised some of this money three times so far this year. Mr Wilson announced it in his budget of February; there was another announcement on April 18; the ministers announced it again; they were going to flow it when they met on July 1 in Alberta and there is still not one penny coming. So there is money being committed. If we even get that flowing, that would be very helpful in the short term.

Mr Kwinter: You referred to NISA. Under the net income stabilization account, the government decided it would not participate this year but it would participate next year. What impact has that had on agriculture?

Mr George: It cost Ontario cash crop producers approximately $20 million. It would have cost the provincial government maybe $12 million to get in there the first year and it could have triggered another $6 million in additional federal money. As it is now, the federal government is going to be putting approximately $35 million, $40 million, in this program. We could have been that much bigger had this province committed.

I think the other issue there is that the federal government actually gave all provincial governments a break on contributions on the GRIP program, 10% of their contributions, which in Ontario's case was $3.5 million to $4 million. So the provincial government has a windfall of $3.5 million from the federal government in this fiscal year. As far as we can make out, that money is going to go back to Treasury; it is not going to go to the farm community.

Mr Kwinter: So what you are really saying is that GRIP and NISA are replacing the farm stabilization program and they are paying those premiums now. Next year, they will not be paying those double premiums, but you will not be benefiting from the fact that the money is there.

Mr George: The farmers signed up for GRIP in the spring of this year. The final premiums are due on November 1, but the final payments on these programs, or at least on GRIP, cannot be made until the end of the crop year. That is a year away, so there is a great lag time.

I should point out to members of the committee that these programs are jointly funded by farmers and both levels of government. It is not just governments funding these; the farmers are in for 33%. That is the way it should be and this is the idea, to get away from ad hocery and have some sort of predictable prices, the point being that as we make this transition from the old world to the new, we have this period of 10 or 12 months where farmers are just left to the mercy of the markets, and the cash flow is not there.

Mr Kwinter: What about the farm interest assistance program? That is like a one-year project. What do you see in the future? How is that working?

Mr George: We do not know to what extent all the $50 million will be utilized. We were very concerned about some of the criteria there on the off-farm income. Whether all that $50 million will be utilized, I do not know. All I would say is, if it is not utilized on the first go-round, I would hope they would open up the applications again to make sure it is utilized. There is nothing worse than the government getting all the credit for a $50-million program and then finding we have only utilized $35 million and the rest goes back to the Treasurer.

We are working with the government and the Ministry of Agriculture to develop a more long-term and stable and predictable farm credit policy for Ontario, and that is the right way to go. We as farmers much prefer these types of new programs, as opposed to the old unpredictable ones where it relies on the timing of elections more than anything else in order to secure the funds. We want to get some predictability into this industry. We have so many things already that are unpredictable in agriculture. To the extent we can put some predictability in there, the better.

Mr Phillips: I wanted to ask a quick question on the tobacco issue. I note that the revenue from the tobacco tax has gone up almost 50%. It is over $1.5 billion, I think. Almost twice the Ministry of Agriculture's total budget, I think, is raised from taxes. My question really is, what sort of increase and support have the tobacco farmers gotten in the last year or so to help them through this period, and what is your recommendation? I know you have some general comments in here, but—

Mr George: As far as I know, they have not had any support at all on any transition programs. I believe they have some proposals in to both levels of government for support, and OFA will be supporting the tobacco board and the farmers on that issue. When we look at this we do not talk about the health implications of tobacco. We talk about the farmers and the farm families.

Mr Phillips: So there has been no increase in the last—

Mr George: To my knowledge, no, and they have collected goodness knows how many extra hundreds of millions of dollars out of the thing.

Mr Phillips: I think the revenue has gone from $770 million in 1989-90 to $1.5 billion and I think we all understand the reasons behind that, but I was just interested in what help has been available to the tobacco farmers.

Mr George: We are a forgotten industry, a forgotten people.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon.

Mr George: Thank you, Mr Chairman.

FAIR RENTAL POLICY ORGANIZATION OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Fair Rental Policy Organization of Ontario—Philip Dewan, president.

We have half an hour. The same rules apply from the previous presentation. Could you begin, please?

Mr Dewan: First of all, I would like to thank the committee for the opportunity to be here today. I think the fact that this committee is even sitting to hear comments on the budget is a very important step because it is a document that has stirred up a great deal of controversy around the province and it behooves everyone to have an opportunity for the various groups to come in and express their views.

I am here today, as some of you know, on behalf of the thousand landlords and property managers who are members of the Fair Rental Policy Organization and, I guess more indirectly, on behalf of the 150,000 or so landlords around the province, since FRPO is the largest group representing this sector.

I certainly have to say at the outset that, although we are delighted to have the opportunity to appear before the committee, there is a great deal of scepticism among members about what may come out of this, given the experience we have just undergone with the public hearing on Bill 4 and the various deliberations on both rent control bills that have been undertaken and are still ongoing. Our members are not very convinced that the government actually has any intention of listening to what these various groups have to say. I hope that is not the case with this committee, and I hope we will be very surprised by the results.

I do not intend to read the submission here. I will skip through some of the points I think are most important and want to start out by indicating why I hope the committee will take what we have to say seriously. Our organization represents an industry which is perhaps underrated in many people's minds in terms of its importance in the province. There are, in fact, more jobs created in the supply and management of rental accommodation in the province than there are in the entire auto industry. It is a very very substantial industry in the province. It is a very diverse industry. We provide accommodation for 3 million tenants and provide an essential product which certain government could not afford to replace on its own.

We also—and this speaks directly to the concerns of this committee—make a very large contribution to the coffers of various levels of government. People are often surprised to find that the average apartment in the province contributes about 25% of the total rental stream directly through property taxes alone, not even counting all of the various other tax flow-throughs from sales tax and income tax and so on. That is about $2 billion a year that the municipalities would otherwise be turning to Queen's Park for. It is a very substantial amount of money, and it is in everyone's interest to make sure we still have the ability to continue.

The other reason I think it is important to hear from our members is that they are a very diverse group. Rental property tends to be one of the first forms of investment for a lot of new Canadians coming to the country because they understand real estate. It is often the form of investment of choice for people who do not have pensions and are looking for some retirement security, and so it is important to some of the smallest businesses in the province as well as some of the largest, what happens to the state of this industry and what government does to the industry.

Given the diversity in the industry, there are a lot of different areas in the budget that some of our members are concerned about, but given the time we have and so on, we would like to focus just briefly on three particular concerns, some of them direct and some more indirect: the overall spending levels and the deficit forecast; the particularly large increases in spending in the Ministry of Housing in this budget and over the past years and its relationship to the various government policies out there; and, more generally, the climate for business that has been fostered and encouraged—or not encouraged—by this budget and by other actions and pronouncements of the government.

Let me start with the fiscal policy and the deficit. I guess landlords generally were as surprised and shocked as many people by the size of the deficit numbers in the April budget. I think everyone was expecting there would be a substantial increase, where there undoubtedly were recessionary costs that were going to be greater than forecast and revenues would be less, but the extent of it, the tripling the budget in one shot, was I think a shock to all of us, and sent a very disturbing signal to the business community generally and to our sector in particular.

Quite aside from the understandable increase in the Ministry of Community and Social Services budget related to welfare assistance, if we look at the size of some of the other increases in comparison to the 5.4% limit that landlords are being asked to live within we get some very different numbers: anywhere from 10.6%, 10.9% for health and education, on very huge bases, obviously; up to 39%, or more than 39%, to the Ministry of Housing; 122% for the Ministry of Labour; 283% for native affairs; and 488% for Management Board, when you include the contingencies that were lumped in. Obviously the government is preaching a very different message to the private sector in terms of what they have to live within than it is practising itself, and that, in itself, is not a good signal.

Certainly a lot of these increases, we recognize, arose from decisions made before this government came into office. There are many spending programs that were coming on stream or were expanded to some extent by previous administrations or built on by this one, but that does not really make any difference to the view that people are going to take of what was in the budget. Faced with the recessionary times we are in, it was up to Mr Laughren and his colleagues to make the tough decisions and decide where the new economic reality dictated there would be some cutbacks, that there would be some reductions in the rate of growth, and there does not appear that there was any attempt to do this. That is one of the most disturbing aspects of the budget.

So we are looking at a situation where not only do we have a budget of almost $10 billion for the current forecast year, but four years from now we are still looking at getting that down to only $7.8 billion, and as you have heard many times, I know, the very fact that in four years you are going to be accumulating a greater total debt than in the entire previous history of the province is something that is absolutely disturbing to everyone. I say everyone—everyone whom we have talked to whom we represent.

The severity of the problem, I think, is particularly reflected when you look at the figures in the operating account. All business people can understand that there are times when you have to borrow for capital works, and just as we amortize costs over a longer period it may make sense for government, with certain types of capital expenditures, to look at those costs and borrowing to pay those costs in a different way.

When you are taking ongoing daily expenses and borrowing year after year to fund them, it is something that business people generally find quite unacceptable. It is as if you are using your Visa to buy groceries every day, and that is not the way that anyone is going to get into a stable financial situation. Particularly after we have been through four years of operating surpluses and essentially a decade of the operating accounts being reasonably in balance, these sudden four years of massive deficits on the operating account with no remedy in sight are a very dangerous signal.

I guess there are a lot of questions that have to be raised about whether even these forecast targets, as scary as they are, can really be met, given the numbers that are in there. The budget refers to expenditure growth estimates of 6.3% next year and 7.5% in the subsequent two years, compared to 13.4% in the current fiscal year. There is no real explanation given as to how the government intends to achieve that reduction and there is no attempt to reconcile the vast range of obviously expensive promises that were made by the government when in opposition with this cutback in spending rates, which leaves a lot of people, ourselves included, with a real concern that if there is not going to be an attempt to really grapple with expenditure restraint and the deficit is going to continue to grow even beyond those, unfortunately, probably optimistic numbers in the budget, the only attempt to rescue us from this fiscal climate is going to be by tax increases.

There is a very disturbing line in the budget that notes that revenue moves may be required in the future to achieve these target growth rates. When you read into that and look at the budget as a whole, that is a pretty sure indication that there absolutely will have to be revenue moves, and given the state of competitiveness in the province, in our relative tax and regulatory situation vis-à-vis some of our competitors now, that is certainly something that is not going to help the province but it is going to cause a great deal of harm.

I want to spend a little bit of time just talking about the housing expenditures directly, because that is obviously of particular concern to us and our members. There is probably no clearer indication of the problems of housing policy in the province, both under this administration and previous governments, than the sort of numbers that are in the Ontario budget this year.

You are looking at a 39% increase compared to last year and a 369% increase in spending for the Ministry of Housing over the last six years. They are extraordinarily large numbers. Even with these huge increases in spending, there has been essentially no dent in the waiting list for affordable housing, which is the problem that the various governments are ostensibly trying to address.

The 10,000 additional units of non-profit co-op housing that were committed to in the budget are certainly not going to do a great deal to meet this need. Even if you get these on stream in the next two or three years, which seems to be the time we are looking at, given the experience with the non-profit producers, only about half of those units generally go to the most needy tenants due to the necessity of income mixing in the projects. At that rate, you are looking at something in the order of up to 100 years to meet the total need for housing in the province, and that is assuming that you could somehow hit the taxpayers for the $6 billion that it would cost to subsidize that housing. It is something that simply cannot work in the end, and I think people are slowly coming to the realization that there has to be a more cost-effective, more reasonable way of addressing this need.

We have always said there is an alternative. The fair rental policy organization has long advocated a balanced partnership between the private sector and government to try and ensure both new housing supply and assist those who cannot afford rental accommodation on their own. That has to begin by a recognition that for the majority of low-income tenants the problem is not that there is no available, affordable rental housing, it is that their incomes are too low to afford even the most reasonable housing.

If you look at what we have stated over the years and elaborated on many times, we have talked about a gradual elimination of rent controls to stimulate new rental supply and allow for the conservation of the existing stock, which is particularly important given its age. We have called for a replacement of the current rent review system with a much simpler, non-bureaucratic protection against unconscionable rent increases. We are not saying everyone should be able to raise it 100% a year or anything like that, but there has to be a very simple system that allows for the market to function within normal bounds.

Most important, I think, there has to be the implementation of a universal shelter allowance program to provide direct financial assistance to the tenants who have affordability problems. I am not going to go into all the details of this today because it would take a lot longer than we have here, but I would be glad to sit down with any committee members who would like to explore this in more detail. We will be providing some additional documentation on this to the ministry in response to its Housing Framework green paper.

We estimate, based on looking at programs in other jurisdictions and the work we have done with outside economists, that a shelter allowance program could be instituted at a cost of well under $500 million per year, which is less than the existing budget in the Ministry of Housing and which would essentially address the income needs of those people encountering difficulties in paying a reasonable portion of their income on rent today.

I will briefly run through an example of why this differential is so great and why this sort of alternative is feasible. If you take a family of working poor who are making, say, $12,000 a year and paying $400 a month on rent, they are paying 40% of their income on rent compared to the guideline of 30% normally acceptable. The problem is not that they cannot find a roof to put over their heads; they are already living under one but simply paying too much for it, more than they can afford. The problem is not that the rent is too much in real terms—I do not think anyone in this room would argue that $400 for an apartment in this province is an unreasonable rent today—but simply that their income is too low.

The approach of the government—and I do not mean just this government; the Ontario governments of the past number of years—has been to put such a family on a waiting list, keep them there for several years while they somehow work their way up to the top and then wait until they can build a unit from scratch to house that family.

Since this unit is coming on stream at a time of much higher land and operating regulatory costs, its total economic rent is far greater than the existing units on the market. We are looking at something in the order of $1,400 per month for the carrying costs for most of these units. If the tenant can afford $300 a month, that requires a subsidy from the taxpayer of $1,400 per month, about $17,000 a year.

In addition, because of the income mixing, you also have to add in the fact that there will be a market unit that will be rented out to someone who could easily afford to pay rent in the private sector. That will also have to go along with that, at least a portion of it, to preserve the income mix in the project. So in total you are looking at about $20,000 per year of costs to the taxpayer in subsidies to subsidize one core needy family housed in a new social housing unit.

On the other hand, if you took the shelter allowance program, you already have this family living in accommodation with which they would often be quite happy, and they could easily find alternatives for in the private sector at a cost in this case of $100, maybe $200, if you let the market be something closer to market.

So you are looking at a pretty stark contrast between the two alternatives; almost $1,700 per month, for the taxpayer on the one hand plus years of waiting for the tenant to get into this home, or about $200 in immediate assistance when you go the private sector route.

I think the numbers speak for themselves, and the fact that governments have gone with the former approach is a striking example of exactly how you get into problems with accumulating massive deficits without really improving the lot of the citizens they are attempting to help.

Finally, I want to talk briefly about the general climate for business, because this budget and the rental housing policies we are involved in, and a whole range of other things, are seen as a whole by business when it is looking at trying to understand where the government is coming from and what sort of attitude it is taking towards the private sector.

You cannot separate out all these programs individually because every one of them certainly has merits on its own, as any alternative does, but you have to look at the cumulative impact. In this case, when you take both the range of programs that have been announced or are being planned—rent controls, changes to labour legislation, auto insurance, what have you—and the attitudes displayed by some of the government ministers in their statements, it does not send a very encouraging signal to anyone in business.

I will give you three quick examples from our particular area of concern that illustrate what I mean.

When Bill 4 was introduced last November, the so-called interim rent control legislation, our industry was understandably concerned and outraged about this retroactive change. It came on the heels of a lot of statements by the Premier and the Treasurer about consultation and public participation and wanting to work in partnership with the private sector. So we figured maybe we could take the

it was stated and go in and try to have a dialogue with these ministers about what exactly this legislation meant and whether they understood the real impacts.

After numerous phone calls and letters, most of which were either ignored or quickly dismissed by staff, we finally received a letter from the Premier, many months later, saying, "No, we are not going to talk to you," despite the fact that we represent 150,000 individual business people out there who are very concerned about this proposal.

The story was much the same for the Treasurer, although I have to say his staff were a little more polite about it.

In the second case, we had a public rally in front of this building back in December where literally hundreds of concerned workers as well as landlords were voicing their anger at the arbitrary changes brought in by Bill 4, the rent freeze, that essentially had thrown these workers on to the unemployment rolls. There was no possible way any rational person could deny the link to Bill 4. These workers, the concrete workers, labourers, window manufacturers, plumbers and so on were saying they had full order books many months in advance on November 27 and two days later, after the minister made his announcement, it all went down the drain because the landlords would no longer be able to finance the work and the orders had to be cancelled.

Yet in front of this very audience, the Minister of Housing, Mr Cooke, made the statement that no jobs were being lost as a result of this legislation, that this was simply related to the recession. We had always understood, to some extent, that the government does not really believe what landlords have to say, but it was quite amazing to hear him tell the workers to their faces that this was in fact not the case.

The third example is something some people think has been blown out of proportion but when you think about it, it really has not. That is a comment Mr Cooke made at a press conference, albeit jokingly, where he referred to the fact that he was allergic to landlords. When this comment was reported and members of our community were understandably upset, he not only did not clarify anything or make any amends for it, he simply outright refused to apologize. He dismissed it as a joke.

It may well have been a joke, but I think it certainly underlines the attitude lying not very deeply beneath the surface towards this particular part of the business community. If you look at it from the point of view of who the government is here to represent, it should be disturbing to everyone. Clearly, if the Minister of Housing had made a comment saying he was allergic to tenants, a lot of people in this room would have reacted quite differently.

Some of you may think the latter part of this does not relate too directly to some of the concerns with the budget we are here to talk about today, but I would like to suggest that it does, because the budget is the single most concrete manifestation of the administration's approach to governing. When you combine what is in that budget, the abandonment of fiscal responsibility and the further handicapping of the private sector to provide the growth and prosperity needed to allow us to meet our social needs, with the sort of statements I have just talked about, you get a pretty clear indication of where the government's overall philosophical orientation to business is.

In short, it proves, at least to us, that a lot of those antibusiness statements and actions by various ministries, which we thought at first might just be the unfortunate results of some individuals new to their positions and new to such a prominent role in public life, are in fact founded on a common approach fundamentally antithetical to the business sector.

Given that reality, a lot of people might question whether there is much point in coming before a group like this or making any recommendations, but as I say, we are very optimistic and I hope that to a small extent our statements, and to a greater extent the collective views you will hear from the various groups appearing before the committee, might have some impact.

I have appended a few recommendations at the end here which essentially relate to the items we have just talked about. Again, I thank you for the opportunity to come here and I would be glad to try to answer any questions the committee members might have.

The Chair: We have approximately two and a half minutes per party which would probably be about one question with an answer, beginning with the New Democratic Party.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your submission. I appreciate it is very articulate. Obviously, you took a lot of time and it is appreciated.

It was interesting to note on the second page that you started your approach by talking about tenants as individuals and then talked about the tens and hundreds of thousands of jobs that are also in your industry. There seemed to be a desire on your part to focus at the outset on individuals, on people, as opposed to just a statistical document that analyses the budget and the economy, and I welcome that.

I would like to pose a question to you with as short a preamble as I can make it, although I am known for longer ones than I should. Look at the number of bankruptcies we have had, both business and private, in the province during the course of this recession the last couple of years, the number of plant closures—just folded up; jobs that have left as a result of, arguably, free trade, rationalization, globalization of the economy—the resulting job losses, literally hundreds of thousands of them, many of which we will not get back when the recession is over.

In light of that and in light of the fact of the course the federal government chose, to fight the deficit and fight inflation, which has led an awful lot of economists, some of whom were here yesterday, to say it is a made-in-Canada recession—policies that arguably have nosedived particularly this province with the entire nation into recession. In conducting this fight against inflation and deficits they have cut back on transfer payments, to provinces which has had an impact on municipalities, which has affected you through property taxes. I spent five years on local council so I know what that impact, that domino cutback has been: There are now fewer people who can go on UI at a time when more and more of them are needing it. Also, in light of the fact that most people—I have not heard a great deal of argument—say a stand-pat budget is $8 billion, just to leave the programs in place in light of lost revenue and increased costs as a result of greater welfare costs, etc, and with the arguments coming forward by the chief economist of the Conference Board of Canada that this is indeed the right way to go, that there is good rationale for what we have done, in light of all of that—

Mr Jackson: I knew there was a question in there somewhere.

Mr Christopherson: —what specifically would you have done differently if it were your call and how would those choices have helped those very individual people you begin talking about in your report? How would that help them cope with the worst recession since the 1930s?

Mr Dewan: First of all, you have to go back to the fact that you are not looking at the budget in isolation. I tried to stress in here that the budget has to be taken in consideration with the whole package of actions by the government over the last eight months.

If your concern is about job loss, about those hundreds of thousands of jobs that have been lost and the factories that have closed and so on, as you mentioned, I find it amazing that this would be a government supporting a policy like Bill 4, which in fact threw thousands of workers out on the street, which shut down manufacturing plants for windows and carpets and all sorts of various suppliers to the rental housing sector. They are completely contradictory statements, from our point of view. That is not necessarily something that comes out of the pure numbers in the budget, but it is very much a part of the policy of the government that is behind all this.

Certainly I am not in a position to go through each spending line of the budget today and tell you where you should or should not have cut. Those are some of the hard decisions that come with being a government. But there is an underlying responsibility, now that you are in office, to make sure that there is some attempt to come in with a total that is fiscally responsible in the end. I do not deny that the budget would have increased a great deal, as I mentioned earlier in the submission, just as a result of the recessionary climate, but I think it was the extent to which you went, and the fact that there did not appear to be any attempt to control the spending in a lot of these areas, which has upset our members.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to ask, given the fact that I only have one question, what do you see happening in your industry if these policies continue? How do you see the future for the accommodation industry?

Mr Dewan: The future is pretty gloomy right now in the sense that we have people who have incurred very substantial losses on work they had already done. They went out, as you know, prior to Bill 4 and made capital expenditures on their buildings which were then frozen and for which under the new legislation that has been brought in they are going to recover 20%, 30%, 40%, depending on the particular circumstances. So their ability to actually maintain those buildings and put in the capital expenditures that are required to preserve them and to keep them to the standard tenants deserve is going to be very much restricted.

There is a whole other range of things in Bill 1 which I could talk about that are not directly the concern of the committee here today, but again, it goes back to the jobs issue. If you really are concerned about people in the manufacturing sector, people in the construction trades, concrete workers who were out standing on the steps of Queen's Park, then the approach that is being taken is certainly not particularly helpful, to put it mildly.

Mr Jackson: I could not agree with your report, though I always have to remind you that you are very threatening to one group of my constituents. Those are the people who maintain two and three residences. People who live in Florida seven months of the year are most supportive of the NDP policies and most angry that I do not support them, because they want to keep their part-time Canadian residence rent as cheap as possible.

You are familiar with the several reports which support your thesis. First of all, George Thomson, who is now provincial civil servant in the Ministry of Labour, I believe, wrote a report in which he indicated that rent controls in and of themselves will not work and cannot work and that a form of shelter subsidy has to be looked at because, in spite of all the regulation, there are not the kinds of checks on the prices that people think there are in housing. It is still rising.

The Stuart Thom commission also, after spending a million or $5 million of taxpayers' money on a two-and-a-half-year study, came to the same conclusion, that rent controls were hurting the poor and benefiting middle and upper-middle income people in this province.

Why is it, do you think, the NDP government refuses when even supporters of its own philosophy come to the conclusion that a pure rent control system that it is moving towards will not work, that a modified regulatory system that allows for private investment and a shelter subsidy program is the only way to increase access and affordability for the poor? That is who we are talking about here, people with disabilities, people who have limited life chances at increasing their income, and in our society, to ensure we can make sure they are accommodated with dignity and affordability—we are not doing that.

Mr Dewan: I wish I knew the answer, because certainly from our point of view, we think the sort of shelter allowance approach you referred to is not only a lot more cost-efficient, which is why it is relevant here today, but also a lot more humane in that it will directly address the needs of all of those people out there who are facing affordability problems now, whether it is because they are working poor or handicapped or whatever.

Mr Jackson: But it is not fair to my rich tenants who are in Florida.

The Chair: There is no chance for—

Mr Jackson: It was a clarification, not a rebuttal.

The Chair: That is fine, Mr Jackson, you have done very well.

Mr Jackson: You pick up more of these subtleties the longer you are Chairman.

The Chair: Yes, and the subtlety of expanding on a short amount of time and dragging it out.

Thank you for your presentation this afternoon.

Mr Dewan: Thank you.

INCOME MAINTENANCE FOR THE HANDICAPPED CO-ORDINATING GROUP

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Income Maintenance for the Handicapped Co-ordinating Group, John Southern and Harry Beatty.

Mr Southern: Good afternoon. Thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today. Just a little bit about the income maintenance co-ordinating group. We are a group of organizations of and for persons with disabilities, those being service providers and also advocacy organizations for the disabled. To my left is Harry Beatty, who is a lawyer with ARCH, the Advocacy Resource Centre for the handicapped. Harry acts as a legal counsel to the group and ARCH has taken a prominent part in helping us keep together. My name is John Southern. I am with Persons United for Self-Help in Ontario, and PUSH is a cross-disability organization. We are a provincial organization and I guess we have close to 1,000 members.

I thought we would start by just reviewing our presentation to the financial committee in January. Harry is going to go ahead and do that and look at what we said and where we are at today.

Mr Beatty: When we appeared before this committee in January, as you might expect, we advocated strongly that a process of social assistance reform that began with the Transitions report—John, of course, was a member of the committee, also chaired by George Thomson, coincidentally, which set out a very extensive agenda for social assistance reform. What we did first of all was to argue strongly that continued social assistance reform basically made economic sense.

First of all, one of the major goals of the reform of the system is to enable more disabled people to be employed. As advocates, either professional advocates or peer advocates, every day we see people with disabilities who have a lot of skills, may have good qualifications to work, but there is some impediment to their being employed. Perhaps by attempting a job they will jeopardize some of their benefits or the combinations they require or the supports they require are not available when the job becomes available or they may have not had a fair opportunity for education or training.

We proposed as a goal that competitive employment be aimed at for—we picked an arbitrary number of 3,500 family benefits Gains-D recipients annually. That would be about half the increase in the annual case load. There are a little over 100,000 disabled people now on provincial family benefits. It is increasing by about 7% a year—a steady increase, but not the dramatic increase that has occurred with some other groups.

Clearly the government has taken a good step this year in establishing, or beginning to establish, an employment equity commission, but more needs to be done.

Often we argue that people do not really understand the cost-effectiveness of providing effective rehabilitation and job accommodations to people with disabilities. What people receive on family benefits is quite modest. In December of 1990, the average cheque amount from family benefits to a disabled person was approximately $670. With the increases in 1991, it would be something over $700 now. Even so, if you include with that the cost of the extra benefits, such as the drug and dental card, you would have an average annual expenditure perhaps of around $10,000 for someone on family benefits.

From that perspective, a $20,000 expenditure for training, equipment and job orientation can be very cost-effective. Certainly both John and I know of examples where a person has been given the appropriate opportunity for training, education and rehabilitation and it has made all the difference, where the person has gone on to be competitively employed, renting in the private market rather than in public housing and so on for many years and perhaps the rest of his working life.

There are American studies, and I do not know if they have been duplicated here. If you look at all the implications for money spent on rehabilitation, and training of a disabled person, if it is spent effectively, savings are on the order of $10 for every $1 spent for the system over the person's lifetime.

The second perspective from which we argued that continued social assistance reforms are affordable had to do with some data we presented relating to the people on family benefits Gains-D in Ontario. Essentially we presented information produced by staff at the Ministry of Community and Social Services which showed, for example, that of the approximately 100,000 disabled people on family benefits, over 12,500 are Canada pension disability pensioners. For those of us who are in the area, that is a very significant connection and it is worth reflecting on.

First of all, these are people who have been in the workforce for some substantial period of time, enough to qualify for Canada pension disability, and they also have to be fairly significantly disabled. Yet their Canada pension and whatever other contributory plans they have had at work have not been sufficient to keep them off social assistance.

I think it emphasizes the importance of talking to the federal government, of Ontario making representations around the inadequacy and some of the problems with programs like Canada pension disability.

Second, Canada pension disability is known to be one of the plans that is most restrictive towards people who attempt a return to work. If you attempt rehabilitation or training or a return to work, you may lose your benefits altogether. There is in our minds a clear link between the fact that Canada pension is restrictive in that area and the fact that so many people wind up on social assistance. They do not attempt to return to work because they are afraid of losing the small amount of entitlement they do have.

So against that background we set out our priorities for social assistance reform by the provincial government in 1991. Perhaps at the top of the list was to make special needs that are necessities mandatory, as opposed to discretionary, benefits and to transfer responsibility for delivery and funding of the special needs system to the province from the municipalities. While some municipalities such as Toronto and Ottawa have fairly developed special needs programs, other smaller municipalities which do not have the same tax base may have very inadequate programs or, in some cases, no program at all. A disabled person who goes to the local municipality for supplementary aid for a special transportation need or to pay the 25% of assistive devices that the Ministry of Health does not cover is simply told: "We do not have that program. Our municipality cannot afford to pay its 20% share and basically you are out of luck, regardless of what your need is."

Other priorities were a further increase in rates, to raise the asset ceilings and asset rules. Those of you familiar with family benefits will know that the limit is still basically $3,000 for a single disabled person and slightly higher for families, the same level as in 1980. We asked that the so-called non-profit boarding rates for disabled people living with their families be raised to the level of the other boarding rates. We asked for increased funding to the vocational rehabilitation services program, for a deduction of disability-related expenses under the Ministry of Community and Social Services' support to employment program and for increased funding for the special services at home program that provides in-home support for children with disabilities.

Now I will turn it back to John. Clearly in the budget there was an allocation of $215 million for social assistance reform and, shortly thereafter, an announcement by the Honourable Zanana Akande as to which of these items would be implemented and which would not be.

Mr Southern: Obviously I was pleased that in this time of recession the government did not do what many people in the media would like, to slash welfare programs, which really bothered me. I think there is so much misinformation in the media, especially as I belong to a group that is one of the most oppressed groups in Canada. Not having the opportunity to write that information is so frustrating and it makes you so angry it is unbelievable. Anyway, I am glad the government did not slash social assistance, but on the other hand, in my opinion, it did not go far enough. After all, it was the NDP government that took the initiative and pushed the Liberal government into reviewing social assistance. They agreed and the Liberal government agreed that the program needed changing. It was inadequate and it was not meeting the needs of the people on it, and it still is not. In fact, since that review started, the disabled people on family benefits have risen by 30,000. You wonder what we did the review for. I was really concerned that it did not even go as far as the minimal changes that were suggested in the Back on Track report, the Allan Moscovitch report that was released earlier this year.

People ask me what it is like to be disabled, and about disability in general, but I think society has to stop penalizing disabled people for being disabled. For many people who are disabled, it is not their fault that they end up there. We just remain the lowest of the low. People are starting to acknowledge that we exist and pay us some kind of lipservice, but I have not seen too much improvement in the lives of disabled people in the 15 years I have been involved in the disability movement, and I want to see more.

As I say, it is a time of restraint. I realize that fact and know we have a deficit. But on the other hand, you cannot keep people living in these abject conditions. I know so many disabled people who are living in utter misery, and there is no need for it in this day and age.

Also, I think this government must adopt a strong employment equity program—I cannot stress it enough—particularly for disabled people. Most disabled people of working age do not work, and they should, and a lot are capable, given the opportunity and training in this highly stressed area. We want to fulfil and take our rightful place in society and quite frankly I am getting a bit fed up with not being allowed to do that.

I am fortunate. At the moment I am working for an organization I represent. But on the other hand we struggle from week to week and from paycheque to paycheque—we could be unemployed next month, for all I know. Nevertheless, there should be better opportunities, and disabled people should be able to live better lives in this province.

As I say, there has been so much talk and people saying how wonderful it is to live on welfare. Believe me, I was there for a year, last year, and it was not one of the wonderful. I did not enjoy the experience one little bit, and anybody who thinks it is great to be on welfare is just crazy. There might be a few leeches at the bottom, but I do not think there are too many of them, either. Business people who criticize the government for spending on social programs—I mean, they made a lot of money out of this province when times were good. Sometimes times are not so good and yet they want to abandon the ship, it seems to me. Anyway, thank you.

The Chair: We have approximately four minutes per party, beginning with the New Democratic Party.

Mr Jamison: I would just like to go over with you the impact of the recession on your particular group of people, if you could really describe what impact there has been and what needs to be done. Obviously you are saying you like the assistance in the $215-million form, but you are saying that more needs to be done, especially in this time. What impacts are there at this point?

Mr Southern: I think disabled people live in a permanent recession. I do not know if it is any worse, except maybe their friends are feeling the pinch or something and family and friends are not able to help them as much as they would when times were good. But for disabled people, we live in a permanent recession; times are always bad, and things have not been made any easier by the introduction of GST and whatever. I really think there has been no significant increase over the years in the actual benefits that disabled people receive on family benefits. There have been little leaps and jumps over the years but nothing significant, and people are just living in poverty.

Mr Sutherland: You talked about the impact and one of the real problems, and earlier this morning the Alliance for Employment Equity discussed some of the problems. Carol McGregor was here and outlined some of the concerns. You just got through telling Mr Jamison that you did not think things were that much better. Is this budget, $215 million committed there, going to have some impact? Will it be of some benefit to your community?

Mr Southern: Of course. I think it will be of some benefit. It certainly does not go far enough. The improvements to the employment incentive program, STEP, where people will be allowed to retain a little more money and the levels of how you can get into the program have been changed a little bit, will help, and some of the other changes will definitely assist disabled people, there is no doubt about it, but not enough, I do not think.

Mr Sutherland: If we had brought in a balanced budget, which the leader of the third party has indicated we could have done, what type of impact do you think that would have had on the community agencies that serve people of your community?

Mr Southern: It is very political, but I will answer it anyway. I think it would have been devastating to us. There is no doubt about it. I do not know how the government would have brought in a balanced budget and done anything meaningful if it was in such a big recession. With the cutbacks from the federal government, you would have had to slash some social programs, and as I told you, we do not have enough now.

Mrs Sullivan: I was quite taken with your report to us today, having recalled the dramatic presentation you made to this committee in advance of the budget. You have indicated your disappointment that the social assistance reforms had not proceeded more quickly through this particular budget. I also was quite interested in hearing what you had to say, by example, about reform of long-term care, which clearly affects people who belong to and are served by your organization and where in fact what we have seen is the shelving of that program.

Mr Southern: Well, obviously I would like to see more action. I do not know whether you would say it is totally shelved. I think there is starting to be some movement in the area of long-term care, but obviously it needs to happen and as I tell you, we want to take part in society. There have been some advances over the years in people getting long-term care. People are starting to get it a little easier in some housing projects and whatever, but nevertheless there are still too many people housed in long-term care facilities who should not be there and want to be out of them and we should do everything to do that. As I say, there is no point in bringing people out of institutions if you are going to just institutionalize them in the community. We need a lot of assistance to participate fully in society.

Mr Phillips: Hi, John, Gerry Phillips. John used to be a constituent of mine.

The Agenda for People called for social assistance rates set at levels where no family any longer has to choose between paying the rent or eating. Just in terms of the impact to date of the changes in the social assistance, can you give us a hint of where that stands now and what your expectations are for the next year?

Mr Southern: I do not know what government is going to do in the next year, because there has been so much poor publicity around social assistance, and some of the major media stations in the market—I will not mention them—are just putting social assistance programs down. Maybe the government will want to regain some popularity or something and not do too much in this area but I hope things will happen. But as things stand now, I think there has been some improvement.

The STEP program, although it has not assisted too many disabled people, has helped some get into the workplace. I know it did me. I am off the program altogether right now, I am thankful to say, but it did help me and was useful to me to get back into the workplace. It has helped other people that I know of. It is a great improvement over the Win program, which was the previous work incentive program, and some of the other changes are having some effect on our constituents. But as I say, obviously we hope it will go a lot further.

Mr Sterling: I would just like to make it clear that Mr Sutherland is telling an outrageous lie when he says that the—

Mr Southern: I object to that. Who are you calling a liar, pal?

Mr Sterling: I am calling Mr Sutherland a liar.

The Chair: Mr Sterling, you cannot use that language in the committee and you know it.

Mr Phillips: It is not you, John. He said Mr Sutherland.

Mr Southern: I thought he said Mr Southern.

The Chair: Mr Sterling, I am going to have to ask you to withdraw that comment.

Mr Sterling: I will withdraw the comment of calling him a liar, but I will say that his information about what my leader, Mr Harris, has said with regard to a balanced budget for this year is totally inaccurate, without foundation. Mr Harris has never said that a balanced budget was possible this year. What Mr Harris and my party are concerned about is the lack of effort on this party's part to trim its expenses, particularly those people who have been doing quite well. We made some suggestions about the greater public service who are guaranteed jobs.

We object very strenuously that some of these people are getting 10% and 11% and 12% and 20% wage increases, while people like yourselves are being denied adequate funding for programs and for other things.

Our concern about deficit financing is that we see this provincial government going down the road to the same kind of fiscal position that the federal Liberals and the federal Conservatives have put us in with regard to our federal situation, where federal governments—be it this one or the next one—are going to be limited in what they can do for people who need help. So we are concerned that, particularly at this time, the Treasurer has, number one, shown no idea or taken no responsibility for constrained spending where we think it could be constrained. Also, projecting a deficit over the next four or five years is going to put governments, when we get into another recession, which usually happens every five, six, eight years, in an even more difficult position than this government is in at this time to help out groups that need to be helped out. That is basically where we differ very greatly with this government.

My concern is more with the deficit that this government has talked about going into next year and the year after and the year after. Do you have any concerns at all about deficit financing?

Mr Southern: I think anybody has to have a concern about it. Maybe the government or whatever should redefine where it spends money. But I know from my own constituents I do not think we can not spend money in this area. What do you do when people are living in poverty? Do you want to oppress them more? You cannot say, "We've got a recession this week; you don't get your family benefits cheque." In this day and age I do not think you can do that. If you help people off the social assistance programs, and I think disabled people have not got enough of that yet, then as I say you can turn them into valuable people who will pay taxes and pay their own way instead of relying all their lives on handouts.

Mr Sterling: I do not think the drive by any politician or any political party is much different from the other in terms of what they want. It is the means by which they get to that result. Our concern in our party, and my experience over the last five or six months, have been that the business community is not reinvesting in this province; they are voting with their feet at this time. Therefore the revenues we need in order to help people out will not only not be there this year but may not be there five years from now, so it will put any government in the position of being a more unkind and less generous government, regardless of who holds the reins of power at the time.

The problem we are facing at this time is one which seems to continue endlessly. What do you think about guaranteed annual incomes and that kind of approach rather than the whole number of different social programs we have?

Mr Southern: I think that maybe Harry would want to address that. He was going to mention that anyway, were you not?

Mr Beatty: Whenever people look at this area they always say, "There should be a comprehensive plan," and then as soon as anyone starts to look at how to do it, it looks like too much to do. Clearly our group does not have a model as to how this should be done. A guarantee or universal plan is not much help if it is inadequate. But I think people would say there does need to be a good comprehensive review, at least, of how these programs are actually working in Ontario, not just how they look on paper, particularly looking at things like: Is there encouragement of training and education? Are these programs efficient? What percentage of the dollars coming in from the payers—whoever they are, government or employer or people paying premiums—is coming out the other end in the form of actual support?

An area that is of great concern is the interactions between the programs. I could give some very sad examples. For a person who is clearly disabled and is waiting for benefits because of the circumstances in which he became disabled, there are three or four different plans that conceivably should or ought to pay him. The person sits there with no money while somebody tries to resolve whether he has a workers' compensation claim or a long-term disability claim or which of these various payers he should be going to. So I think certainly it is worth a serious look at this area. I find disabled people to be a bit sceptical about grand schemes as well.

Mr Southern: The point you made about adequacy—if the payment is low and it is meaningless, what is the point in having an annual guaranteed income for disabled people if you cannot live on it?

The Chair: Unfortunately, our time is up for this presentation. I would like to thank you for coming and making it.

Mr Southern: Thank you for your time.

ASSOCIATION OF DAY CARE OPERATORS OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Association of Day Care Operators, Judith Preston, president.

Mrs Preston: I would like to introduce Liz McWherson. She is a colleague of mine and also on our board of directors.

We appreciate the opportunity to speak with you and air our views on how child care has been handled within this budget and by this government.

The Association of Day Care Operators of Ontario directly represents more than 11,000 child care spaces in centres employing over 1,500 workers and providing service for approximately 11,000 Ontario families. Indirectly the numbers triple, as ours is the only association which addresses the concerns of over 700 independently operated child care centres. It is, in fact, the only association in Ontario which represents the directors and operators of licensed child care programs, regardless of auspice.

We have a unique view of the situation, as we immediately see the devastating results of government decisions on this sector.

Our members have led the fight for years for quality, affordable and accessible child care for the children of Ontario. We are working parents ourselves and we know and understand the challenges which face others in the same situation.

The immediate need is for more subsidy dollars, not more spaces. All child care funding must go in just two directions: subsidy funding and government monitoring.

At the present time no new government-funded child care spaces should be created. This association recommends the funds currently allocated to capital financing be redirected to fund subsidy spaces.

While this budget made no specific announcements for child care, policy statements made by the Minister of Community and Social Services have indicated the manner in which the funds allocated to this ministry for child care will be spent.

In the NDP's An Agenda for People in August 1990, stated policy on child care was:

"New Democrats understand and support the struggle of working parents to care for their children. We have fought hard for affordable, quality child care in Ontario. New Democrats believe that parents have the right to work their jobs and have quality care for their children.

"New Democrats would provide funding for 10,000 new non-profit child care spaces and for subsidies on 10,000 spaces in each of the next two years. This would cost $240 million in total."

We have some difficulties costing this promise, as it is somewhat ambiguous. Do you mean 10,000 spaces this year and a further 10,000 new spaces next year, for a total of 20,000 new spaces and 20,000 new subsidy spaces, or a total of only 10,000 new spaces but a total of 20,000 subsidy spaces? What happens in year three?

The current cost to provide care for one child for one year is approximately $6,000 before pay equity. At this rate, the cost for the subsidies would be $60 million in the first year and $120 million in the second year and every year thereafter, plus, of course, the cost-of-living increase. The cost of establishing 10,000 new spaces could be as high as $20,000 per child space, a cost of $200 million per 10,000 child spaces. Depending on how these promises are interpreted, the cost could range from $260 million in the first year alone to $500 million, not $240 million as estimated. These more realistic cost estimates may explain why these specific promises have not been delivered yet. We can but hope that the costing in the recent budget has been done more accurately.

In our position we cannot hope to tell this or any other government the dollar amount which should be spent on any particular budget item. We would hesitate to approach this even from a percentage basis. However, as taxpayers, business people and parents, we feel it appropriate to comment on the strategies, policies and directions.

First, the concept of such a huge deficit: If the cost of this budget is accurate and the deficit stays at the promised level, it is bad enough. However, there is no guarantee that the deficit will stay at $10 billion. When we look at figures like $10 billion, it quite frankly stuns the average person. So we try to relate to our business or household budget. We know that during hard times, if we overspend, it takes that much longer to recover. We know that in order to balance our budgets in hard times, when emergencies come we must reduce spending somewhere else. This government has done neither. We do not want to see the people of Ontario paying for this deficit for years.

This government has some very specific ideologies and goals resulting from these ideologies. Both Mr Rae and Ms Akande, in letters to our members, have stated: "The child care system must provide high quality care that is affordable to working parents, is accountable to the parents and the community, and pays fair wages to its workers. In our view, these goals can best be achieved through the non-profit sector."

It is time that Mr Rae and his government colleagues step aside from their ideologies and look at economic facts and at what the people of Ontario want, not the demands of a small vocal minority.

Independent child care is accountable. In the Levy-Coughlin report, October 1989, it was found that the independent centres used the direct operating grant funding exactly as directed. In fact, 99.5% of the DOG money went into salaries and wages in independent centres, whereas in non-profit and municipal centres the range was 80% to 89%. This report, which was commissioned by the government of Ontario, stated that the private sector was accountable. Further, we have offered on numerous occasions to develop enhanced reporting procedures which would further satisfy the public's right to know how public money is being used. On a final note, any centre which receives money from the province directly or indirectly, ie, through the purchase of service agreement, must open their books if requested by the government.

Independent centres are established at no cost to the taxpayer while non-profit child care centres cost the taxpayers up to $20,000 per child space to create. In many cases, non-profit centres are also less affordable to the parent using the service. On a recent W5 program the non-profit centre had a preschool fee of $125 per week as compared to the fee of $115 at the independent centre. In May 1989 a study done by York magazine found that 45% of the non-profit centres were in financial difficulties. Some even had to have loans guaranteed by individual parents.

This government may be interested to know that in Mississauga a recent survey was done of child care centre wages. It was found that when the DOG funding was removed the independent centres actually were paying their staff more than the local non-profit centres. The major difference in wages and benefits is the result of government discrimination. The staff who work in independent centres receive only 50% of the direct operating grant. The result is a difference of up to $3,300 per staff per year. If the pay equity initiative does go through, make that $5,300. This discrimination must stop.

The government is to be commended for its efforts to make high-quality child care available to working parents. To ensure the quality of care, courses in early childhood education are available at many community colleges. Child care centres must have specific numbers of trained staff. To ensure quality, regulations exist. All centres must comply. To ensure quality, all centres are monitored. Please note that the training, regulations and monitoring apply to all centres, not just those preferred by this government.

The one aspect which has not been discussed is availability. In the past few years we have seen many new non-profit child care centres open, then close. There have been insufficient funds to operate the spaces created. What is the point of creating spaces and not providing operating costs?

A survey done in April indicates that over 25% of centres had vacancy rates between 20% and 50%. The centres were experiencing financial hardship and were forced to lay off staff. The vacancies were not caused by the lack of children needing care but by the lack of subsidy dollars. At the time of the survey, the overall vacancy rate in the centres surveyed was over 24%.

Again quoting from An Agenda for People:

"Current high interest rates are having a devastating impact on small businesses. We propose to introduce a program of reduced-interest loans to small business for startup costs and to refinance existing high-interest loans."

Any new child care centre, regardless of auspice, should be eligible for funding through this type of program. Independent centres should qualify for startup funds under this program as they are small businesses and employ literally thousands of citizens in this province. If non-proprietary operations were forced to pay back their startup costs, it is guaranteed that funds would be used more wisely. This also can ensure a continuing source of funds for child care centre development.

In the NDP policy paper on child care, it is stated, "there is no room for profit-making in the care of children." Let us take a realistic look at this position. The Association of Day Care Operators believes there is no room for excessive profits in child care, but there is room for the director or owner/operator to make a reasonable return on his or her time, energy, expertise and investment.

In many regions, profits are controlled through the purchase-of-service budgeting process. In Hamilton-Wentworth, an independent operator is permitted a 10% profit line. However, 80% of capital costs of additions or renovations or major equipment, all computer costs, costs of loan repayment from startup, any deficit resulting from a larger than 5% vacancy rate and all business taxes must be deducted from this 10%. Hopefully, at the end of the year, the operator has been able to make a reasonable return.

Providing that the discrimination issues are addressed, independent child care centres can solve some of this government's financial problems. Any new spaces can be established by this sector at no cost to the taxpayer. All independent centres would meet or exceed the current government regulations. Due to the business practices of most independent business people, the centres would be established where there is an established need.

The Association of Day Care Operators suggests the following be considered: that all funding be directed towards assisting the families in need to cover the cost of child care; that all funding be directed through the purchase-of-service system. The DOG funding and the pay equity funds should be rolled into the subsidy system. This will result in increased per diems. The end result would be seen in higher salaries and a more stable workforce.

That the eligibility criteria for subsidy assistance be adjusted to allow more families access to the system.

That for a period of at least two years, the municipalities be relieved of the requirement of 20% to cover the cost of subsidy spaces.

The policies which exist in Ontario today have led to the closure of many child care centres—18 independent centres in the last six months that we know about. These policies are also causing the government to consider converting independent operators. In a period of financial hardship, it will become increasingly difficult to just spending millions of dollars to change the corporate status of existing centres when the need is for more subsidy spaces.

We are asking this government to remove its blinders. Non-profit status is not necessary for the children wanted by the parents. What this province requires is immediate assistance for families in need.

It is time to stop the rhetoric. The private operators, quality licensed child care programs in this province are ready to join forces with the people's government to build a partnership. Each of the partners has its own strengths, which, when combined, will ensure for Ontario's children the highest-quality, affordable and accessible child care system, a system of which we can be proud.

Mr Phillips: I might kick it off. You have come at the wrong time, I think, in that "profit" is not a good word for the province right now. Hopefully, it will be in the future.

Mrs Sullivan: In four years.

Mr Phillips: Whenever. I very much sympathize with your dilemma. I know it is partially in here, but I think what interests parents is assurance on quality. They probably are not even quite aware of how the facility is financed and what not. It is just quality assurance. What help can you give the committee in terms of assurance that the private sector child care centres can provide the same quality as the non-profit centres do at the same cost?

Mrs Preston: You can start right at the top in that you meet the same regulations when we are licensed. The Day Nurseries Act is what we have to follow. We have the same inspectors. We hire our staff from the same colleges. So the basis right there is the same.

Not enough credit is given to the parents. We have had parents come and inspect our centre and other people's centres, a variety of centres in the community, and end up choosing an independent centre for a variety of reasons. The parents have access to the classrooms and to the programs. They see the program plans. They have access to come in the buildings any time they want to see what the children are doing. I think that is the assurance we can give the parents.

The poster that was introduced by the last government, which we all have to post in our centre, basically has two columns. It shows you exactly the regulations, where you have all your staffing, which staff are qualified, which are not, all the things that you meet. If you do not meet any of the regulations, you get the dot on the wrong side of the poster. It specifies at the bottom exactly where the centre is lacking.

I know there was a study done just in terms of that in London. There was an article in the London paper a couple of weeks ago. One of our operators called me up and said, "You know, Judy, all these centres were listed that had provisional licences, and 75% of them were non-profit," do not think the auspice is really an indicator of quality. In the poster, the staffing, having the parents being able to come in and see the centre—seeing that they have happy kids, too.

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly your brief really touches people from my community, where the majority of children are in fact placed in commercial centres. Particularly with the recent pay equity announcements, there has been substantial pressure placed on the privately operated centres in terms of their very existence. This becomes a problem in terms of delivery of child care at all in our community.

I am interested in following up on the direct funding proposals that you are putting forward. Has your organization worked with the ministry in terms of cost analyses of direct funding?

Mrs Preston: The short answer is no. We have had an extremely difficult time in the last 10 months doing any work with the ministry.

Mr Jackson: Getting an appointment.

Mrs Preston: We had one appointment.

Mrs Sullivan: With the ministry and with the minister? Have you been able to meet with the minister?

Mrs Preston: Once.

Mrs Sullivan: I see. So as a consequence you have not been able to move your argument forward in any way in terms of the direct funding.

Mrs Preston: Not at all.

Mrs Sullivan: Including the basic research that would be necessary in terms of a cost justification?

Mrs Preston: No, we have not been able to do anything.

Mr Phillips: I think An Agenda for People, just to clarify the numbers, called, in the first year, for $80 million, and in the second year, for another $160 million. I gather you are saying that the capital does not look like it was included in their—

Mrs Preston: No. I worked with the figures for a while trying to figure out how they could have come up with that, with the cost estimates we had, unless they want to use commercial operators to open the new centres, because we do it somewhat more cost-effectively, and certainly at less cost.

Mr Phillips: There you are.

Mrs Preston: Our average is $10,000 to $12,000, so that might help.

1530

Mr Jackson: Thank you for an excellent brief. I have some working, active knowledge of the issues you have raised for the committee, and I share with you a concern that we have the offensive practice in this province of using female workers and children as pawns in a political exercise.

I know your brief carries with it much self-restraint. The fact is that there are 8,000 women, almost exclusively, being discriminated against by a government policy. There are also potentially some 10,000 children, and by extension their families, who might benefit from a sensitive government policy that would allow for expansion and access rather than this offensive, and in some jurisdictions illegal, activity of putting out of business one sector which is not a drain to the taxpayer.

Is it true that about 80% of the owners of day care centres are women?

Mrs Preston: I would think that is fairly accurate.

Mr Jackson: So this is also a discriminatory practice against women and their activities in support of the social service sector and their support services.

Would you also say that these activities are putting small businesses out of business and laying off staff? I notice you indicated that, but do you have anything more specific that you can share with us? We are hearing from the NDP that it does not do this, and yet we have discriminatory practices by the minister, Ms Akande directed specifically against women and children, and predominantly, as well, staff. I understand that in some cases even some CUPE members, who are unionized, are being put out of business because their commercial centre can no longer survive in this framework of the government's interference.

Mrs Preston: I cannot substantiate the union aspect.

Mr Jackson: I am aware of one case.

Mrs Preston: You are? I have not heard that. But certainly in terms of people being put out of work, I can get really personal. I just closed down my centre because I found that on the funds that were available through the parents through their subsidy program, with the restraints and some extremely unfair practices in our particular region, I could not operate the quality of program that I wanted to operate. This speaks to the quality of programs. I could have continued operating if I had been willing to cut corners and to operate at extremely minimum staff, but I was not willing to do that.

Mr Jackson: How many employees would you have laid off by the government having forced you out of business?

Mrs Preston: Four. I had a centre for only 25 children, so it was extremely small, which makes it that much more difficult because you certainly do not have the economy of scale that you would have with a larger operation. So it was smaller. Certainly in Hamilton we know of four, myself included, that have closed down in the last three or four months.

Mr Jackson: And those children would have been forced to go to another centre with new teachers, something we try to avoid in a school situation when it is unnecessary because it has adverse effects on the children to be ripped out of one learning, nurturing environment and thrown into a completely new one prematurely or inappropriately.

You have lost your business. You are closing your doors. You are no longer paying taxes to the city of Hamilton because you are not operating that business. You have laid off four people. What was the longest seniority of any of your employees?

Mrs Preston: One of my staff had been with me ever since I opened the centre.

Mr Jackson: Which is?

Mrs Preston: Five and a half years.

Mr Jackson: They have lost all their seniority rights in terms of job placement within this sector in this province.

Mrs Preston: One of the children had been with me for over three and a half years, so you have the same happening with the children as is happening with the staff. She had to go to a new centre and a new school.

Mr Jackson: I appreciate the fact that you have shared that with this committee as a living example of the damage this government is doing with its budget. In spite of the fact that we cannot get a clarified version of what the numbers really total, we are certainly getting a sense of the impact they are having: less access and clearly not as affordable because we are spending tax dollars to compete, when you are providing a service at no cost for your capital. You are contributing to the tax base and yet clearly the government is moving—frankly, if there is any message, it is that if these policies did not work in Cuba, I do not see how they expect them to work in Ontario.

Mr Sutherland: I find it ironic that Mr Jackson wants to accuse our party of being discriminatory against women when his party was in power for 42 years and could not see fit to bring in a pay equity bill so that women could be treated the same way.

Mrs Prescott: you stated that parents are content with a privately operated system. I am not as familiar with all the day care issues as probably I should be, but I have been following a bit. I noticed today you did not bring a teddy bear, and Cam did not bring one as well.

Mr Jackson: We did not know who the new minister is; that is why. I did not want to offend anybody.

Mr Sutherland: For those people who look at it and, let's say, draw an analogy with the education system, the provincial government does not fund private education. What would you say if people want to say day care should be treated in the same way education is? You do not fund private education, so why should you be continuing funding or providing equal funding in that way?

Mrs Preston: There are two things different about education and child care. One, everybody has to learn to read at some point in his life, and from what I understand there is a high number of children in Ontario who are not learning to read. Maybe we should be funding more private schools because I understand that they sometimes do a considerably better job. That is where people who are having trouble with the generally available education take their children, provided they can afford it.

Secondly, child care is not needed universally. We know that from surveys that have been done, both at the federal level and at municipal levels. At the most, at the very outside, everything being what it was a couple of years ago, we would need to double what we have. Right now we are servicing about 10% to 12% of the children in the province. From the surveys that have been done, at the most 20% of parents would like their children in licensed care.

Obviously 80% of the parents out there would like to see their children at home with mom or with dad. One works shifts at night and one works shifts in the day, so they are able to handle their child care needs and they think that for their children that is best and that is their choice. They want to see children staying with their aunt or with their grandmother or whatever, and that is their choice.

We do not need universal child care in this province in this country. Many taxpayers do not want to fund that even if we did.

Mr Sutherland: You are saying that if there are concerns about difference in quality—you said in your presentation today that you feel the quality is the same—the government has other options of ensuring the quality, whether it is through new standards, new regulations, more inspectors, what have you, that those issues can be dealt with.

Mrs Preston: We would like to see more government inspections, more government consulting with the inspectors. They barely have time to visit us in time to get licensing done, never mind providing any kind of assistance with programming or anything like that with the operators.

I would certainly recommend that there be some monitoring if you will, teeth put in the regulations so that if a consultant finds that a centre, regardless of auspice, is not meeting the regulations after it has been licensed, there would be a procedure that would stand up in court that could force that operator to comply, or, as there was a case in the north end of Toronto where there is an operator who is not licensed taking an inordinate number of kids from what we hear, that there be teeth in the regulations that can take care of those situations.

If we have money to spend, let's put it there and make sure that people opening up have what they should have in order to open up, or if they do not have it there are steps that can be taken. I do not see any point in wasting money closing down existing businesses.

Ms M. Ward: You are opposed to opening new centres. I can see that right at the moment. I know there is a high vacancy rate. I have been visiting a number of day care centres and am in frequent contact with people. The recession is one big factor there, the unemployment rate, people losing their jobs. Even if they have a subsidy they cannot maintain that subsidy. Would you agree that it has had an effect on the vacancy rate and the closings?

Mrs Preston: Yes.

Ms M. Ward: We talk about non-profit. There are really two types there, I think you can say. There are the government-run ones in government facilities where it is social service staff and so on. Then there are the independent community-run ones, which have a board made up of parents, and there is also the option of conversion from private to the community board type. Do you have any comments on that?

Mrs Preston: On converting?

Ms M. Ward: On converting, yes. Just one other point: You said in your brief there is no room for excessive profits. You said the operators should have a decent wage for their time and energy and so on. Given that, would there be that much difference, aside from your investment, in your role in it if you were an administrator with a community and were being paid that salary for your time and effort?

Mrs Preston: How much time do I have, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: You have about a minute and a half. I do think you can do it in that time.

Mrs Preston: All right; I will race. Another study of dependent operators—people who are opposed to our existence do not read these studies—was done by the Belos-Edwards Group in 1987. Profit was way down on list.

I have worked in government centres and I have worked for the board of education and I have worked for private non-profit with a community board. Quite frankly, the quality of my work has not changed, except that I have more experience. But believe me, I will never, ever work on a community board again. I spent 90% of my time educating people as to why it was inappropriate to run a three-year-old program—what the children did at kindergarten—with a three-year-old, etc, ad infinitum, for the whole year.

Ms M. Ward: Is that one experience, though, or would you say you think that applies to all community boards?

Mrs Preston: I have talked to a lot of people who have done it and I have worked for more than one board, where people come on the board who know absolutely nothing about day care, know absolutely nothing about making a budget and know absolutely nothing about doing a business plan or running a program. They come in and they think they are the boss, because it is status to be on a community board for a day care centre, but they do not know anything.

The supervisor or director spends so much of her time—if you want to check with some of the boards as to the amount of money they are spending educating their boards how to run a child care centre when in this province we have a wealth of individuals who have already got the experience—

Ms M. Ward: They are the parents, are they not?

The Chair: I am sorry. I have to interject. Our time is up and we have other presenters here today. Thank you for coming.

HAMILTON AND DISTRICT APARTMENT ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next deputation is the Hamilton and District Apartment Association, Derek Lobo, director. You have half an hour. The amount of time for your presentation will be subtracted from that and that will leave time for questions at the end, divided by three.

Mr Lobo: My name is Derek Lobo and I am a director of the Hamilton and District Apartment Association.

I want to tell you a story. It is an Eastern European story. Ivan the Soviet peasant was working in the field when all of a sudden God appeared before him. God said: Ivan, I'm going to grant you one wish, but there is a condition to that wish. Whatever you wish for, your neighbour gets double." So Ivan thought, "If I ask for a billion roubles, my neighbour will get two billion roubles." He thought and he thought. Finally God said, "Well, Ivan, what'll it be?" Ivan looked back at God and he said, "Gouge out one of my eyes."

That is the beggar-thy-neighbour attitude that this government has taken with our industry. It seems to be, make the rich, greedy landlord pay. Ontario's property owners were the first victims of the socialist experiment in this province. Punitive, retroactive legislation destroyed property owners, both large and small.

Here is a profile of the members of our association. We have 400 members. The majority of them are small landlords. We have a few small property managers and some contractors in our association. Our association bank balance is just under $4,000. Many of our members are first-generation Canadians. They are cautious people. In fact, they tend to be obsessed with security. That is why they invested in real estate. It was part of their Canadian dream. It was part of their retirement. They did not believe that Bob Rae or the state was going to take care of them, so they worked a little harder, they saved a little more and they invested in Ontario.

But the property owners were not the only victims of the rent control legislation. Let me show you a real life story, no ideology, no political theory. I brought a gentleman with me. His name is John Makuch. He is one of the owners of RAM Restoration Inc, a company that specializes in concrete restoration of apartment buildings. Here are some of his former employees: Steve Olmstead, Bill MacPhee, José Louie Sousa. All these men have gone to the wall for Bob Rae.

Prior to the NDP, John had 45 employees and he was in the process of hiring 15 more within the next three months. Now keep in mind, this was in the middle of the deepest recession, which you have talked about, Mr Christopherson. He was hiring people, 15 people. He had $1 million worth of work on the books and he was quoting on an additional $3.5 million, in a recession. The day after the election, most of his work was cancelled as landlords feared the NDP would live up to the election promises in the Agenda for People.

RAM Restoration Inc today faces bankruptcy. Today RAM Restoration Inc. has 10 employees where there should be 50. How many Ontarians have to go to the wall for this ideology? Tell John Makuch, tell Steve Olmstead, tell Bill MacPhee and tell José Louie Sousa about the social benefits of bankrupting their lives' dream.

In the budget, Bob Rae talks about creating 70,000 jobs. Well, here are 50 jobs for free, Premier. It will not cost the taxpayer a penny. These jobs were eliminated strictly because of Bill 4. These jobs were not lost because of free trade. They were not lost because of the recession. They were not lost because of Brian Mulroney and they were not lost because of high interest rates, but simply because of NDP housing ideology. Why are hardworking men and women, like the people behind me, going to the wall for the NDP?

John Makuch and his former employees are not alone. Bill 4 was really the job elimination program. After massive job losses in the apartment industry, the NDP made the following statement, and both David Cooke and the Minister of Labour made this statement: "Construction worker layoffs related to recession rather than new [rent control] legislation." That is just baloney. Ask the men behind me why they lost their jobs. It was not the recession.

Here is the ad they took out in the paper, a desperate move: "Thank you, Mr Rae. Your proposed rent control law may have saved me $25 per month on rent. Unfortunately, as a direct result of this act, I just lost my job. Signed: John Welsh, Pat O'Flaherty, Steve Olmstead, Bill MacPhee, Ernie Lancuso, Mike Shuster and José Louie Sousa, former employees of RAM Restoration Inc." They are behind you. What are you going to tell them?

Here is something else out of the paper shortly after Bill 4 came out: "Rent Control Legislation Crushes the Concrete Restoration Industry in Ontario." Four hundred and fourteen jobs are lost within seven days of Bill 4 coming out. That does not seem fair.

More job losses: Day Restoration Inc, 17 of 35 workers laid off; Oxford Window Manufacturing, 9 of 12 workers laid off; Regal Aluminum—these people make replacement windows for apartment buildings—their workforce was cut in half almost immediately, because all their contracts were cancelled.

If you were not reading the papers around that time, here is what the headlines said. It is pretty clear jobs were lost and these were not related to the recession. Contracts were cancelled.

This is what the Premier said in the Toronto Star about that same time. He said: "The Ontario government is not going to stand by and allow jobs to be lost during the recession." Well, there seems to be a communication problem between the Premier's office and the Minister of Housing. The Honourable David Cooke started slashing jobs left, right and centre, yet the Premier pontificates that saving jobs is top priority.

This province needs leadership, not ideology. A leader's job is to inspire and to instil confidence in those he leads. A leader must accept responsibility. The buck has to stop on the leader's desk.

When the CIA-engineered coup in Cuba failed, President John F. Kennedy did what a leader had to do. He accepted responsibility. He did not blame the Cuban freedom fighters. He did not blame the CIA. He accepted responsibility. The buck stops here.

The Premier of this province does not seem to accept responsibility. It is not his fault. He blames the recession, he blames the federal government, he blames the Bank of Canada and he blames bloated capitalists. The Premier seems to blame everyone but himself. In Ontario's time of need, we need leadership, not finger-pointing.

Now let's talk about the budget. The Ontario deficit of $10 billion is excessively high. The number, whether it be $8 billion, $10 billion or $12 billion, matters little. The funding to the Ministry of Housing has increased by 39% and at least $50 million of that money will go to maintaining the slothful rent review bureaucracy you people promised to eliminate.

Unprecedented funding for subsidized housing will compete against the private sector. The taxpayer will be burdened with subsidies of up to $1,200 a month for some projects, $1,200 per month per unit. It does not seem to make good business sense.

You cancelled the Red Hill Creek Expressway in Hamilton, which would have created thousands of jobs without competing against your constituents. Many items in the budget seem noble and just; preventing violence against women and equality for aboriginal people. I commend you on these efforts. They are noble indeed. They need to be addressed.

But on other issues, you have to remember that Ontario is not an island. To the east of us we have Quebec, where the entrepreneurial spirit seems to be flourishing. One hour south of here is really the bastion of free enterprise, the United States, and companies are moving there and expanding there. They are getting the jobs while our government is levelling the playing field of employee-employer relations. By the time you are finished levelling the playing field, we are afraid there will be no players left to play on it.

Increased corporate taxation, increased personal income tax, increased minimum wage; these must be done in concert or at similar rates to our neighbours. We cannot afford to be all things to all people. Creating the people's paradise oblivious to your neighbours is a recipe for disaster.

The $10 billion is a big amount but I really think the true deficit is in the spirit of the people of this province. More than bankrupting the provincial coffers, I think you are trying to bankrupt our spirits, maybe not intentionally but that is what is happening. Tens of thousands of Ontario's men and women have faxed you, written you, marched against you and lost their jobs for you, but you just do not seem to be listening. Oh, we go through hundreds of public hearings but in the end, the ideology always seems to prevail. I sat before the Bill 4 committee. Ideology prevailed there.

How many Ontarians like John Makuch and his employees have to go to the wall for Bob Rae? Socialist regimes throughout the world are toppling. In this hemisphere, we have two socialists left who subscribe to deficit spending, Fidel Castro in Cuba and Bob Rae in Ontario. In Cuba, deficit spending works because Mother Russia bankrolls it. Now Mother Russia has pulled the plug and Cuba will go down the drain. In Ontario, Bob Rae's deficit spending will be bankrupt and we will be bankrolled by our children. You cannot do that. It is not fair and it is just plain bad business. My three daughters should not have to pay for your mistakes.

I want all of you here to ask yourselves the following and answer it honestly to yourselves: Will Ontario be a better place to live four years from now after the socialist experiment? How many more factories have to leave, and do multinationals really want a partnership with Bob Rae after all the things this government is proposing? How can the disabled get jobs when there are no jobs? How can the minorities you represent share the bounty when there is little bounty? Why are you burdening our children with this deficit? Just ask yourselves the question, will Ontario better place to live four years from now? Regrettably, I think the answer is no.

You could say maybe I am not objective. I am not a member of one of your special interest groups. I am not a member of a union. I am not a tenant. Unlike you, I believe this province is already fair, eminently fair. Ontario has been governed by Conservatives and Liberals and the needy of this province are cared for as well as or better than anyone in this hemisphere. This government does not have a monopoly on fairness, benevolence, social justice or the environment. To think that you alone represent the needy in our society is sophomoric. Many of our goals and objectives are shared by all the people and all the politicians of this province.

Really, it is not your goals that our association is questioning. We have met with you. We have tried to work with you. We are not questioning your integrity; it just seems to me that your competence. This government does not seem competent. But I am biased. I am a landlord. We have been shocked by retroactive rent control legislation. We are a bit upset. But let's look at what others are saying.

European investors who invested in Ontario real estate are outraged by your government's attack on them. They are now channelling their funds to other provinces and other countries. They now consider Ontario in the same investment category as the Third World. Is this your vision of Ontario?

I cut this newspaper article out of the Globe and Mail about two weeks ago. It says, "Quebec Replaces Ontario as US Investors' Choice." This troubled me. I think it would trouble you.

"A growing number of US investors are betting that Quebec separatism is less of a worry than Ontario's socialism." Merrill Lynch of New York says, "Investors that would have normally looked to Ontario are now looking to Quebec."

Congratulations, Premier. It seems that American investors would rather trust their money with a government that is trying to destroy Canada than they would with your government.

This is out of the Financial Post: "Last Straw. NDP Deal Blow as Ontario Faces Slow Flight of Investment Capital."

I think this government in some cases has a simplistic view of some very complicated matters. The NDP sees landlords as villains and tenants as oppressed. Such a simplistic vision of Ontario's housing industry is a recipe for disaster.

In 1989 Bob Rae was asked, "How would you get the current private rental stock out of the hands of the large owners and into the hands of the non-profit organizations?" You have seen this quote many times, but it is really the question that is never read out. The question is, "How would you get the current private rental stock out of the hands of the large owners?" I did not realize that it was an objective.

Here is the Premier's response. He said: "You make it less profitable for people to own it"—that is rental property—"I would bring in a very rigid, tough system of rent review. Simple...there will be a huge squawk from the speculative community, and you say to them, 'If you're unhappy, we'll buy you out.'"

In that same interview, the Premier said, "You can't talk about rent review till you talk about...ownership." He went on to say, "We need a government program of purchase."

Let's look at the Premier's statement, sentence by sentence. He says, "You make it less profitable for people to own it." Mission accomplished. Conservatively, rental property values have decreased by 25%. Is this what Bob Rae means when he says: "Work with me. I will help you be less profitable"?

And the next sentence, "I would bring in a very rigid, tough system of rent review." That is almost done. After the sham Bill 4 committee hearings, Bill 121 was introduced and I sincerely hope that these committee hearings do not resemble the farcical sideshow the taxpayer had to bankroll on the Bill 4 committee.

"There will be a huge squawk from the speculative community, and you say to them, 'If you're unhappy, we'll buy you out.'" Well, Premier Rae, many of your so-called speculators were international investors, foreigners who came into Ontario and built rental accommodation. They are not squawking; they are just leaving Ontario and they are investing elsewhere.

In Bob Rae's recent article in the Financial Post he said, and I am quoting: "Wealth creation is crucial and we can't take it for granted. Attracting investment, encouraging the market to work, creating profits."

Are retroactive rent controls rewarding innovation, encouraging the markets to work and creating profit? The Premier seems confused. First, he wants to make it less profitable, as he said here. Now he is saying he wants to make it more profitable. Does this leader inspire confidence? No.

Just ask yourselves the following question: Will Ontario be a better place four years from now? How many factories have to leave? How will the disabled get jobs? How will the people you represent, the minorities, share the bounty if there is not any? Ask Bill MacPhee, Steve Olmstead and José Louie Sousa if Ontario will be a better place to live. Is it a better place for them to live now?

That concludes my presentation. I think you might want to ask these gentlemen some questions also. In one case, his unemployment runs out next week. He is going to have to go on welfare. I would encourage them to come and sit here with me and if there are any questions, or questions for them, we would be happy to answer them.

Mr Jackson: Mr Lobo, thank you for a very direct presentation and hitting the nail on the head with respect to several concerns. I guess rent control has been a theme today, because it has been raised by several groups, and affordability of accommodation. But I would like to hit on your concern with respect to the fact that governments have not realized that the failure of government-built housing—there has been more government rental housing built in the last four years than there has been from the private sector. In fact, our current dilemma is an expression of the failure of government-built rental units, because they cannot build them fast enough. They certainly cannot build them cheaply enough. I have seen some figures that were nearly double the cost for which they could be done.

It seems the taxpayers are not fully aware of what a devastating effect this is going to have taxwise. Would you comment about why you believe this government refuses to understand the role of the private sector in terms of creating wealth, as evidenced by RAM Restoration?

Mr Lobo: It is a very complex question. It goes to this government's philosophy on rental housing. Does it believe in the private ownership of rental property? We have the Premier saying he wants to buy the speculators out. We have the Premier saying he wants to make it less profitable. The only answer seems to be, "Yes, we're going to build co-op housing." I think that is even a little bit of a misnomer—it is subsidized housing. The taxpayer is taking money out of his pocket, sometimes to the tune of $1,700 per month, to build this subsidized co-op housing. It does not always go to needy people, either.

Why do you not let the private sector do what it does best? Most of this continent is reasonably well housed; most of this continent does not have rent controls. It was working before; it will work again. But for it to work, we need to trust the government again, and quite frankly we are a long way from doing that. After retroactive legislation coming out we are really a long way from trusting this government.

Mr Jamison: You touched on a number of points. You talked about finger-pointing. I find your presentation very one-sided. There are two sides in this issue, of course. In rent control—

Mr Jackson: That is why the workers are here.

Mr Jamison: —there are two sides to the issue. There is the side of the landlord and the side of the tenant.

Mr Lobo: Yes.

Mr Jamison: Okay. What this government has obviously tried to do, beyond Bill 4 and with the new—Bill 4 being an interim measure to catch control of some of the things that were going on out there in a major way. What this government has tried to do is strike a balance. I can equate to your approach as far as having European people come and invest their money wisely is concerned. My father did that, a 10-unit apartment, and under the Conservative government in 1970 there were rent controls in place.

Mr Jackson: In 1975.

Mr Jamison: In the 1970s. He was very successful in managing his property well and making sure the investment was there. The specific concern is where there were problems with rents increasing out of relationship to the actual economy itself. That showed the need for something that happened. If I might just put it into perspective, my understanding of the new legislation coming forward is one where CPI is taken into account and up to 3% over that. I would suggest to you that if the average person who goes back and forth to the factory was allowed that type of ability to increase an extraordinary cost, say when the GST came into play or whatever, over and above CPI, many would consider that to be fair. I think that is what government is trying to do.

Let me make it clear that it was a promise of government. Even through difficult times we recognize need to implement rent control policies. That was made very clear during the election and to act like it is a surprise today is certainly not the case and should not be the case. I have some difficulty, because I find your presentation very weighted. I would like a presentation that took into consideration tenants' views too, and I think the legislation in fact reflects a balance on that. I would like you to comment.

Mr Lobo: Sure. I think you should ask these gentlemen here who are out of work about the balance of your legislation. But there are a couple of points you make. First, if your dad still owns the building he is going to be mad at you because it has gone down 25% in value and he did not need to go down 25% in value. Second, I do not think you understand the legislation. The interim measure. Let's say I was concerned about the air you breathe in this room. I am temporarily going to put a bag around your head and seal it so that you cannot breathe until I clean the problem. As soon as I do that I am going to remove the bag from your head. That is what you have done to the property owners of this province. You said, "We don't like the current system, so we're going to freeze everything until we figure out what to do."

Mr Jamison: It was not a freeze.

Mr Lobo: Retroactive legislation, sir, for capital expenditures done as early as 1989 were disallowed.

Mr B. Ward: It was 5.4%.

Mr Jamison: It was not a freeze.

Mr Lobo: The 5.4% covered off—okay, conceptual you know what I am talking about. Capital expenditures done in the past were disallowed. These men are now out of jobs. That interim measure, sir, was much too severe. There was nothing in the Agenda for People saying that you were going to come in and put the brakes on a system that, while it was messy and cumbersome, had a sense of balance to it. It had some sense of balance. It was slanted for political reasons, towards the tenants, and really all three parties are to blame here. You guys brought it in, you guys made it worse and you guys killed us.

Mr Kwinter: Derek, you have just made me depressed listening to this because it really is sad. Yesterday we had an appearance by Mel Watkins. Because of the shortage of time I did not get a chance to talk to him, but I had a copy in front of me of the Waffle manifesto and the marshmallow manifesto and I wanted to throw back to him some of his quotations, for example, that the way we get socialism in this country is to get rid of capitalism. I made a great statement about this is the way we have to do it. I was curious to ask him if all of those lackeys he had on his list saying that this is the greatest budget ever going—most of them were supporters of that particular policy.

I really want to talk to the man who has lost his business. What do you feel is happening? Where are you going to go from here? What is going to happen to you?

Mr Makuch: I do not know. We are just taking it day by day and we really cannot plan anything. All we know is when the recession hit we did not take up the same logic as the government. I did not give my partners it cards and say: "Go out and spend. Let's spend our way out of the recession, boys." We cut back and tried to live on our own. Would I go home and give my wife a credit card and say, "Honey, we're going to spend our way out of the recession?" This is what the government is telling us to do. Does this make any sense to anyone? How can they do it? Countries run the same way a business does or a household does. You have money going out and money coming in. After everyone is working for the government, how the hell is going to pay taxes? Where is the money going to come from? That obviously seems to me what they are trying to do. No one is going to invest in business in this province. I know if my company goes bankrupt, and there is a good chance of that, I am seriously going to take a look at whether or not I will ever start another business and whether I will move my family south.

When your own government, the people you think are going to help you, put you out of business and put people out of work—He has already been to the welfare office. Is that the plan? Is everybody going to be on welfare? This gentleman down at the end of the table does not know where his mortgage payment is coming from next week. He has had notices put in. What is he going to do? It is not like me who have to look them in the eyes and tell them that, while all these people sit behind their big office doors and shut out anything they do not want to hear.

We are going to have to wait four years to see how much damage this government does. We know right now that in four years they will not be here. All the polls have shown it. They are gone. They are history. I guess they are going to scramble and just see how much damage they can do in four years and then we will have to pick up the pieces. Everyone I have talked to recently realizes the mistake they made voting this government into office. They have told me they will never, ever vote for them again. If these committee hearings are shams and do not work, then that is the ultimate. We are going to wait four years—out they go, never to return—and we will try to build a new Ontario when it is finished.

Mr Lobo: The key point here is that these people did not need to lose their jobs. This was not about the recession. This company was expanding. At the height of the recession it was expanding and it was chopped down by Bill 4. That is the difference. There are lots of workers out there who are unemployed. They are heading towards welfare. They are worried about what is going to be on the dinner table tonight, but they are unemployed because of the global situation. These people are unemployed because of the NDP. That is the real tragedy here.

Mr Makuch: I was at the committee hearings too and cannot tell you how many times I heard that, the guy hired some shoddy contractor and he did lousy work. Why do we not fix the solution, police the work better, take care of the landlords who are abusing the system, not discriminate, which is something they claim they do not want to do? They want equal rights for everyone and yet they slam people and discriminate. It is unbelievable.

The Chair: I am sorry, but your time is up and there are other deputations to be listened to this afternoon.

BEVERLY CAMPBELL

The Chair: Our next presentation is from Beverly Campbell, president of Equity Concepts. Thank you for coming. We have allocated 15 minutes for you. I think you were informed of that. Whatever time is left will be divided among the committee.

Ms Campbell: My name is Bev Campbell. I am a management consultant with a practice in downtown Toronto. While I provide general management advisory services, my main interest is in employment equity. By training and experience, I am a certified general accountant and a former professor of accounting and finance at George Brown College.

I would like at this time to say thank you for the opportunity to make this presentation today. The purpose of my presentation is, first, to speak in support of the government's plan, as expressed in the budget; to point out the inevitable portion of the deficit and the causative factors, and I want as well to applaud the government's decision to support the people and to invest in recovery and in future stability in Ontario.

Second, I wish to express support for the government's initiatives towards improved fiscal management by establishing the Fair Tax Commission, which will explore fairness in taxation; establishing the Treasury Board to manage budget expenditures and to implement multi-year budgeting, and separating the operating and capital budgets, which should provide some clarity of purpose.

Finally, I wish to express my views concerning management of the province's largest expenditure, which of course is health care.

At issue is the planned deficit of $9.7 billion for 1991-92 and, as a secondary matter, the planned continuation of annual deficits for an additional four years, although decreasing gradually in magnitude until break-even is achieved in the 1996-97 fiscal period.

Given the factors contributing to the current year's deficit, the managed, limited-term continuation of deficit budgeting is essential to the success of a managed economic recovery and the managed structural changes needed to provide the basis for sustained prosperity for all in Ontario and perhaps in Canada.

Speaking about the inevitability of a deficit, three major conditions or external actions account for a major portion of this deficit.

First is the recession. As you know, it is continent-wide in its scope. It is substantially worse than in 1981-82 when measured by job loss, and Ontario has been the hardest-hit region in all of Canada. The resulting budget effect is significant loss in tax revenues, both personal and corporate, estimated to be about $1 billion in the current year; significantly increased demand for welfare support, and pressure on Ontario to maintain its contribution to national economic stability, that is, in personal and corporate federal income taxes and consumption taxes, etc.

The second contributing factor to an inevitable deficit position is the federal government's actions and policies. The federal budget continues to shift budget strain to the provincial level by reductions in transfers for health, post-secondary education and social assistance. Since all three expenditure areas are critical, either because of recession-caused support demands or the need to develop competitiveness for long-term survival and prosperity, the provincial budget must pick up the slack.

Federal monetary policy, which keeps interest rates and the Canadian dollar artificially high by historical standards, is having a serious effect on the ability of Ontario manufacturers to raise capital and therefore to generate growth in jobs, as well as to compete in the export market.

The free trade agreement, while philosophically desirable in the long term, was implemented far too quickly for Canadian and, of course, Ontario firms to adjust and prepare for. This added pressure contributed substantially to the loss of Ontario jobs as firms moved south and to the bankruptcy rate as other firms knuckled under to southern competition. The future looks even bleaker as Mexico is added with its relatively cheap labour—hence the importance of investing now in improving Ontario's ability to compete internationally.

Finally, pre-existing Ontario expenditure levels, combined with a pressing need for capital expenditures, provides an inevitable deficit starting point—1990-91, a $3-billion deficit, which of course was not predicted.

Taken together, these three areas account for the inevitable portion of the deficit, a measurable $5.6 billion, plus any additional costs which are not so easily identifiable.

The balance of the proposed deficit may be attributed to the government's decisions to: support and assist the people of the province who are suffering now from the recession, as well as those who continue to suffer a long-standing disadvantage economically; fight the recession with targeted expenditures for research, manufacturing, agriculture and northern Ontario development; invest in the future with capital expenditures to adjust and enhance the province's infrastructure and with a significant investment in structural reform of the social assistance system.

I believe that Ontario's fiscal plan designed to fight the recession and build for the future, rather than reducing the public debt, is the only responsible approach to take. The alternative would leave the province with an ongoing and growing social assistance account and a workforce not adequately prepared to fill the high value added jobs needed for this province to be competitive in the emerging economic environment.

The government's fiscal management initiatives should provide some assurance that fairness in taxation and cost-effectiveness in program administration are treated as priorities.

1620

The Fair Tax Commission, established to advise the Treasurer on how to achieve a more equitable tax structure, has a diverse and intelligent membership and a mandate to consult broadly. The comprehensive review of our tax system is long overdue and I hope will contribute substantially not only to fairness in taxation, but also to proved understanding of the role of taxation.

The creation of separate capital and operating funds will highlight investment in the future, as distinguished from current maintenance expenditures.

Finally, establishing a Treasury Board to manage expenditures for cost-effectiveness and, importantly, to complement multi-year budgeting provides comfort that responsible planning and control mechanisms are being put in place.

The last topic I wish to deal with concerns the health care expenditures. The province's largest expenditure function, health care, which consumes approximately one-third of the budget dollar, is in desperate need of financial management. I applaud this government's initiatives towards gaining control through a landmark agreement with the Ontario Medical Association on doctors' earnings and stricter controls on drug prescription and on out-of-province health service payments. However, only a fundamental shift in focus from treatment of illness to prevention of illness will have any major impact on the health of the people and the budgets of this province.

Bill 43, the Regulated Health Professions Act, and companion bills broaden recognition of health care providers to include more of those who are engaged in preventing health and represents a move in the right direction. The recent joint venture of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, the Ministry of Health and the Office of Senior Citizens' Affairs dealing with long-term care reform is another.

As well, increased attention to poverty, wife and child abuse and the need for affordable housing will all contribute to shifting the focus from treatment towards prevention and help to bring down health care costs in the long run. Much more needs to be done, and it needs to be done soon.

In summary, the budget deficit is in part inevitable and in part the result of a purposeful approach to economic management that is sensitive to the legitimate current and future needs of citizens and recognizes Ontario's responsibilities to the rest of Canada, even during a most difficult period. Investment in Ontario's people and its infrastructure now will develop the productivity levels needed to compete effectively in the post-recession environment. It is then that we can direct our resources towards reducing the public debt.

I thank you for hearing my views.

The Chair: Thank you. We have time for one question from each of the parties, beginning with the New Democrats.

Mr Christopherson: I want to thank you, Ms Campbell, for your presentation. I would caution you to sit tight there. You are the second CGA that has been in today, and the first one, I would suggest, in my opinion, was insulted, grilled and cross-examined as to motivation as opposed to the particulars of what was presented. I can only hope you will not be subjected to that type of treatment also.

Let me ask a very direct question. Since you have supported the philosophy the government has adopted, without necessarily talking about all the details, what in your ation would be the result on people and the performance of our economy if Ontario had not followed the way we did and had just followed lockstep with the money approach and the Tory approach to running the economy during the course of this recession?

Ms Campbell: My opinion is that Ontario would have suffered substantially in terms of its industry. Certainly jobs were being lost at a fairly rapid pace on the way we were on. I think at best we would have ended up being able to simply maintain the people of the province without doing anything at all to build for the future, that is at best. I think at worst we would be unable to ensure the normal welfare, if you like, of the people of the province.

Mrs Sullivan: I am quite struck with your emphasis on your document on the importance you place on fiscal management and financial management. I am quite surprised at some of the things you applaud that have been included as part of the budget as examples of fiscal management that you see from this government.

I would like to give you three examples. You mentioned the OMA agreement. I wonder how you can justify that agreement as an example of fiscal management when arbitral arbitration is included, with no accountability to taxpayer for ultimate decisions of the arbitrator, which I personally believe is a rampant example of fiscal irresponsibility.

Second, I would like to ask you if you would comment on the viability of operating deficits, ie, putting into short-term deficit and therefore long-term debt the day-to-day expenses of government, which this budget does and which has not been the practice in the recent past, when indeed there has been fiscally responsible budgetary management. I would also like to ask you, since this is partly your professional field as well, to expand on your support for separating operating and capital budgets and ask you how you would therefore clarify existing public sector capital budgeting, and in a fiscally responsible way, not only in terms of reporting, but rather than writing off new capital over a period of 20 years, how you would see public accountability and a reporting operation from the government that would not be puffed up in terms of the capital reporting that is included.

Ms Campbell: I will deal with your first question first. I think I have pointed out the deal with the OMA not so much as an example of good fiscal management but more as an example of the way in which the government is addressing the out-of-control health care costs.

Mrs Sullivan: I do not understand that conclusion.

The Chair: With the element of fairness in mind, one session was allocated and you have asked three. If every member were to do that, then staying on time would be an impossibility. I have had direct instructions from the subcommittee to try to move these hearings along on time. So we can allow the presenter to give her answer and then on.

Mrs Sullivan: The question was one question using three examples for her to comment on, a question directly related to fiscal management, which was the point of Ms Campbell's presentation.

Mr B. Ward: What is your ruling there?

Mr Chairman: My ruling is that if you could answer the question, please, and we could ask these questions in a briefer manner.

Mr B. Ward: She did answer.

The Chair: Mr Sterling?

Mr Sterling: I am not surprised. In fact, I think we met before when you were president of the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada, and I think you were one of the few NDP supporters in the CGA movement. I think you also indicated to me you had served as chief financial officer to some NDP candidates. Is that right?

Ms Campbell: That is correct.

Mr Sterling: So I am not surprised by the—

Mr B. Ward: That is your question, Norm.

Interjections.

Mr Sterling: I would like to ask you, I guess unrelated to this, how are the negotiations going with the Attorney General with regard to CGAS? I know you are an executive director of the CGAs with regard to the importance of CGAs having the right to do public audits. When are we expecting an answer? Is there anything coming along on that at all, or is there some movement expected on that?

The Chair: That question has nothing to do with the—

Mr Sterling: She does not have to answer it. That is fine.

The Chair: If that is the preference, I would then thank you for your presentation this afternoon.

1630

BARRY W. HENAUT

The Chair: Our last presentation is from Barry W. Henaut. We have received a submission from him that was written in. If you would come forward, please.

Mr Henaut: I know in the face of $9.7 billion, a small statistic like this is going to seem petty, but that is what we devote ourselves to in scholarship at the universities.

I got back a letter from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada telling me:

"Dear Mr Henaut: We have reviewed your file for a post-doctoral fellowship. This year, for instance, the committee adjudicated more than 450 applications, but in the view of the limited funds available to the programs at the council, we were able to offer only awards to one third of the applicants."

Your chance of getting a post-doctoral SSHRCC in Canada at this point in time is one in three. Senior scholars review 450 files in order to send out a mere 148 1/2 grants. The rejection letters come in at the rate of 297.

I read this and I get frightened. People are desperate, looking for any kind of post in the university system, and then when I call about a little budget hearing and ask about the budget, "Oh, we're just about average, not too much, not too little." "Well, could you give me a ballpark figure?" "Oh, it doesn't matter if we are having these hearings at all on this amount of a budget, because we'd just be doing something else instead."

When Mr Decker finally provides his statistics, it is $120,000. There are four positions right here, four letters that could go out for 30 years of faculty renewal. In order to drop a filibuster, you decide you are going to spend four faculty positions, and you have got the Treasurer on the front page of the Globe and Mail saying: "Hey, we've done a backroom deal with Bob White and the boys and we're just not going to change it any more." But in order to break the filibuster and get on with the nice daily reality of getting speeches and doing a little photo op here, we are going to spend the money on this rather than this. That frightens me. It terrifies me, because it says to me you guys just ain't in control.

I pick up the newspaper. I realize I am taking time out of my thesis. I tell you, I have so little time already, but I see this in the Globe. They have got money. They are organized. They are out saying: "This is the Canada we want. Immigration—too little room. Get these people who want to come in here out. Keep them out." The only way you seem to come up with dealing with fundamental problems like this, which just will not go away—$120,000.

This is not learning. I tell you right now, if this was learning in the classroom at the university, I would rather be a janitor. I could respect being a janitor. I could respect being a janitor because my father worked as a miner before I was born, hoping that some day I would have a chance to do something a little bit more dignified. He felt no shame in going down into the mine. It was his deal with the future. I was not even born yet, but he was preparing for my future, going into the mine every single day, breaking his body, hoping that some day I might have something a little bit better.

There seems to be total apathy throughout the whole country. I send a letter off to Bob Rae. I know I am being a little bit unpleasant, cocksure. I cut out these nasty little ads and put them right there in his face, and I go, "No." The average dog in this country is more intelligent than the politicians, and that is a sad reality because we are spending too much money on this and we need to put a bit more in here. One in 10 positions in this country is shuffling paper in bureaucracies.

When Voltaire complained, "This country"—England—"is a nation of shopkeepers," that I could respect. There is at least a little decency in keeping a shop, but he thought maybe they should think: We can do a little bit better than being an entire nation devoted to nothing else but shops. If he were here today, I think he would say to you, "Canada has become a nation of bureaucrats," and the only way I can contact you and get your attention is to put a little PS, "Look out, trouble coming."

I know that I just have to go home and wait because I have already documented the paper trail that lawyers are so fond of, the letters that say: "Go away. You make me feel dirty just seeing a piece of paper from you. Why don't you go out and get a job?" I am trying. You are telling me I have got to compete against one in three chances and you already have a form letter on your little computer and splice in my name and then you stamp it and you "That's the public service. You should be thankful that we have so many bureaucrats here devoting thousands of hours so that we can send out personalized little form letters from the computer." You send us graduate students trying to teach the youth and the people of tomorrow are going to deal with the fundamental destinies of the country and you tell us that maybe we should try and be a little bit more competitive.

Maybe when you get a paper from your son or daughter you say:

"Dear Student: We have gratefully received your recent submission in REL 241YB and we have read it with interest. We think you are showing progress in the course and we hope that you will continue to show confidence in our university systems. We look forward to your most recent and future submissions and we think you are on track for a good record by the end of the term. Yours sincerely"—bar stamp—"Barry Wayne Henaut."

Any idiot can set up a computer file like that and send them off in record time. We have people trying to put a little bit more personality in the human dimension of learning in this country, and everyone seems to think, no, we should be spending $120,000 to drop a filibuster because Bob Rae just happens to think it is better than trying to figure out some way to embarrass Mike Harris on doing it. He cannot find somebody in this vast bureaucracy who has got a little bit of political history or philosophy who can find some way for Bob Rae to go before the cameras and say: "Well, there he is. He's going to filibuster this, filibuster that, filibuster this." After a little while even Glenn Gould on a one-note piano is going to sound a little like a water torture test, and the only way Bob Rae can figure out how to deal with it is to urinate all the money down the toilet.

I happen to think the university system is delivering a far better product for the money than you guys are, and I do resent it. Every time I pick up the Globe and Mail and look at all those public service positions being announced they just seem to appear out of nowhere. You decide we have a new crisis and run the numbers through. Let's create a few more positions here, and meanwhile take out a few professors from the humanities so that they can work a little harder giving personalized service at the university.

That is what this is about, and if you happen to think that the best way to run this country is to do this instead of this, you are failing the exam and the final is coming in four years and all of you are going to be out.

Mr Kwinter: Barry, I found your presentation interesting. I have a question for you. If you had been in one third that had been accepted, would you be here?

Mr Henaut: Yes, I would, because I happen to think even a one-third ratio is not good enough. After I submitted all of that material, do you think I do not think there is a number-crunch problem here? Is that what you are telling me? If somebody, after I signed a book, came back with that kind of poor reading comprehension, I would say "You are not going to pass this course. You had better study."

turn reading comprehension." I happen to think there a lot of people in the university system who think a third ratio is not good enough and a lot of them are the third that are up there high enough. Yes, I do. I would be even if I was that one in three.

Mr Sterling: It is getting late in the day and I cannot of a question which would be appropriate.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon. This committee stands adjourned until—

Mr Sutherland: Before we adjourn, I just want to, in terms of the subcommittee possibly meeting tomorrow to discuss the presenters for the different cities locations across the province we are going to, whether would be possible tomorrow at noon.

Mr Sterling: Not at 12. I have to fly to Ottawa tomorrow afternoon at 1. So I am going to be leaving around 11:30.

Mr Sutherland: Is it possible to do it in the morning?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: Are we starting at 9?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Sterling: I am amenable to meeting for breakfast

Mr Sutherland: Are you back on Thursday?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

The Chair: We could postpone it until Thursday.

Mr Sutherland: We could even do it Thursday, but it needs to be done so that we do not run into the problems that we have already run into for this week. Okay?

The Chair: Yes, Thursday at noon.

Mr Sutherland: Are we starting at 9 on Thursday as well?

The Chair: Why do we not do it right after the committees finish hearing their deputations at 12 on Thursday, and then we could do it right here? Is that agreeable?

Mr Sterling: It is going to take more than 10 minutes.

The Chair: We all have lists, correct? If you were to come in with the pre-designed or pre-conceived notion of whom you would like on those lists, then it is a matter of making the decision.

Mr Sutherland: It is still going to take more than 10 minutes.

The Chair: Should we come back at 12:30, go down and get our lunch, come back here and do it? Okay. Then the committee stands adjourned until 9 tomorrow morning.

The committee adjourned at 1643.

1991-92 BUDGET

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Chair: If there are no objections by the members I think we should begin. We have a full agenda for this morning and should attempt to stay on track as closely as we can.

ASSOCIATION OF MUNICIPALITIES OF ONTARIO

The Chair: I would like to begin this morning's proceedings with the Association of Municipalities of Ontario. Mr. Harrison, president, and Grant Hopcroft, past president, welcome to the committee. You can begin your general remarks. You have half an hour, and whatever time is used in your presentation will be divided equally among the three parties for questioning at the end. If you would begin, please.

Mr Harrison: Thank you, Mr Chairman. As you indicated, the deputation this morning is composed of myself, a member of council for the township of Delhi down in southwestern Ontario and current president of the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, and Grant Hopcroft, our immediate past president, who is a councillor from the city of London.

We are here to speak specifically to the issues arising out of the budget which impact directly on the municipal sector and the functioning of municipal government in the Province of Ontario. We have provided members of the committee with our brief. I realize you have just received this morning. I would like to take the opportunity of highlighting the brief, if I may, and as you said, we would be happy to make ourselves available for questioning by members of the committee.

As a general comment, the reaction of the municipal sector with regard to the budget has been cautiously positive. I think that is the best way to phrase it. For the first time in many years, there is really very little direct impact on the municipal sector contained in this year's provincial budget. With regard to those areas where there is an impact, our analysis to date has identified nothing of a negative nature, but a few positives which we will touch on as we go through the brief.

A further general comment would be that if we have any problem with the budget and the way it has been brought forward to date, it is in terms of issues of timing and thus far not giving sufficient detail to be able to do an in-depth analysis with regard to some of the impacts. As a general disclaimer, to begin with, I should say we retain the right in the future, when we see more detail with regard to the impact of the budget, to change our view about some of the issues we are going to raise with you this morning.

We did appear in front of this committee in deputation at the end of January of this year with regard to a pre-budget consultation. You will see at the bottom of the first page and the top of the second page of our brief nine issues we raised regarding what we hoped we would see in the budget when it finally was brought down. Some of these issues are being worked on, in an ongoing fashion, between my association and the appropriate cabinet ministers.

Two of the recommendations we made at that particular time were contained in the budget, in sort of a backward way with regard to at least one of them. We had requested that there be no new cost-shared programs included in the budget, and in fact none were; and that the unconditional transfer payment announcement, which had not been made at that point, be an across-the-board increase to every municipality at least to the level of inflation. That took place.

To move from the general to the specific, the first issue we are dealing with in specific terms starts on page 3 and is with regard to social assistance. This is the largest part of our brief and the issue we go into in most detail, again largely because more of the details regarding the implementation of these particular provisions are available than those regarding some of the other provisions in the budget.

The social assistance reform package included in the budget includes about 59 reforms to the welfare system, at a cost of $215 million to the province. Included in that package is what the budget sets out: $25 million in aid to municipalities. That aid to municipalities is divided almost equally between reforms to the general welfare assistance program arising out of what is called the Back on Track report. This makes various changes to welfare benefits. A significant number of those changes cost municipalities money because we cost-share those programs. However, there are some changes that save us money, specifically the shifting of sole-support parents from the GWA rolls to the FBA rolls.

The second initiative that is intended to save municipalities money in the budget is a shift of what I have come to call the 4% solution to a 3.5% solution. Basically, this is an effort to give assistance to municipalities where more than 3.5% of the population of the municipality is on general welfare assistance.

The position of our association for many years has been, and still is, that rather than doing what is included in the budget, the government should be giving a clear signal and beginning to move toward paying 100% of the cost of general welfare assistance, both with regard to allowances to recipients and to the administration of the programs. This clearly did not happen in the budget.

We further requested, in our pre-budget consultations, some immediate interim relief for municipalities hit hard by growing welfare rolls and consultation with the government with regard to implementation of reforms. After the reforms were announced, we set up a mechanism for consultation with the Ministry of Community and Social Services in terms of implementation and we are pleased with it.

We are less pleased with the issue of interim relief. We acknowledge the fact that there is some relief in the budget, but it amounts to about 5% of the municipal cost of GWA in the province at a time when our municipal costs of GWA are increasing by about 62%.

Our other comment regards the change of the 4% solution to a 3.5% solution. We do not believe that is an appropriate way to aid municipalities that are the worst hit by welfare increases. It affects only a few municipalities in the province, and there are a significant number of municipalities, where the welfare rolls have increased by more than 100% between 1990 and 1991, which will not benefit at all from that particular provision.

If I can pass to waste management, the budget provided an additional $28 million with regard to assistance with the 3Rs, 4Rs or however many Rs you want to say there are. We say there are four and the government says there are three. Again, our problem regarding the expenditure of this money is that we acknowledge the fact that this is a more than doubling of the provincial government's commitment to waste reduction. At the same time, since the budget was brought down, we have received no details regarding the implementation of any new programs and no indication of how that money is to be spent. Our contacts within the Ministry of the Environment indicate that the money is to be spent largely in enhancing the blue box program. We have considerable difficulty with that. We think the money should more appropriately be spent in reduction and reuse initiatives. After significant consultation between the government and the municipalities, we feel the blue box program deserves a complete overhaul.

With regard to the announcements that are made, conditional transfer payment announcements in the budget in various service areas appear to be satisfactory. There does not appear to be any shifting of government commitment to conditional transfer payments from the programs we have seen here. Our problem is that the details regarding these fundings are coming slowly, if at all, to municipalities. We are now more than halfway through a budget year, because we run on a calendar year, and our information regarding conditional transfer payments just is not coming forward in the way it should.

Over the past number of years, we have consistently asked for conditional and unconditional transfer payment announcements to be made by the middle of November of each year for the succeeding year. We understand the government had a problem, in terms of when it received its mandate, making those announcements in that timely a fashion, but in the future we certainly urge this committee and the government to attempt to adhere to that particular schedule.

We also acknowledge that the budget identifies the fact that northern Ontario is perhaps the area of the province hit hardest by the current recession and is undergoing structural changes to its economy. This acknowledgement has led to the targeting of a significant package of money into northern municipalities. We are pleased with that and prove of that particular position taken by the government.

Labour relations are perhaps one of the stickiest issues for me personally, but I will attempt to keep my AMO firmly on, at least for the moment. In his February announcement, the Treasurer indicated there would be $1 million for the transfer partners to assist in paying for equity initiatives. That was six months ago. No details regarding how that money is to be spent have come forward. We do not even have any indication of how the $1 million is going to be allocated among the various transfer partners, and we certainly do not have any indication whether that money is to go for administration, for special assistance to transfer partners to pay for implementation, pay equity or where that money is going to go. From my personal experience leads me to think that pay equity is still a ticking time bomb out there, in terms of the impact the transfer partners of the implementation thereof. We need to know yesterday, if not sooner, how this money is to be spent and allocated so that we can have some idea what assistance we will be receiving from the government with regard to implementation.

In conclusion, we and our association think the municipal sector in general is cautiously positive with regard to impact of the budget on the municipal sector, with the proviso that we are still waiting for significant details regarding implementation and reserve the right to make further comments when those details become available to us.

The Chair: Thank you. We have five minutes left of the party and the questioning will begin with the Liberal Party.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much for your presentation. I was really impressed with the time and effort put into it.

I notice that in your pre-budget consultations you made nine recommendations, two of which were taken up. One of them was sort of a non-recommendation, "Don't do anything to us," and they did not. The other one had to do with the whole area of minimum across-the-board increases.

I notice that 25 municipalities were promised a 5% increase in the unconditional grant transfer payments, because of the equalization factors, they did not receive that amount. What is that going to do to them? How is that going to impact on those municipalities?

Mr Harrison: Our understanding is that the difficulty there is a technical one in terms of calculating the amount of the transfers and that in fact there are still some ongoing discussions between the ministry and those municipalities with regard to the appropriate calculation.

Certainly if there are municipalities that eventually do not receive a 5% increase in their unconditional transfers that will have a negative impact on their budgetary position for 1991, and certainly if they have budgeted based on the Treasurer's announcement of a 5% increase to every municipality and they do not receive that amount of money, they would be looking at the potential for a deficit.

Mr Kwinter: Another area I would like to get some comment on, if you have the ability to comment, is what is happening in various municipalities across the province. As part of this anti-recession package, there are supposed all sorts of public works, infrastructure projects under Do you have any indication of any of them that are g place in any of your municipalities? Have you seen results of that coming into line?

Mr Harrison: I can only speak for the two municipal- where I am a member of council. Both of those mu- alities have received anti-recession money at the nal level in Haldimand-Norfolk region. In both areas s transportation, it was roads money that we received f the anti-recession package. At the regional level it ed us to do a moderate amount of extra paving work ould not have been able to do otherwise with our al transportation allocation.

rankly, the amount of money received by my town- out of anti-recession funds was approximately ,000, which was a nice chunk of money, but it came hat I thought personally to be a very strange form in s of a grant to the municipality to allow us to purchase d grader. I did not quite see how purchasing a road er was going to be an anti-recession item in terms of ng people to work in Ontario, particularly when we tually purchased the road grader out of Michigan.

o yes, we have received some money; yes, it is helping e places. Some of the administration of it has been a strange.

Mr Kwinter: To follow up on that, were these moneys received for projects you would have expected to be e in the normal course of events anyway?

Mr Harrison: Municipal roads projects are like a mless pit. Roads engineers could spend an infinite unt of money on a prioritized basis. What you do is a long list of the projects you want to do, and start at beginning and go forward and get as much done as r budget allocation is for this year, and then start there move forward in the subsequent year.

The projects would have been done anyway, yes, but they ld have been done later than they were because the extra ey was made available to us. Some projects have been ed forward from what would have been anticipated to 1992 implementation into a 1991 implementation.

Mr Kwinter: If that money had not come forward, uld that have impacted at all on any of your staff num- s?

Mr Harrison: Again, I am just talking about my mu- pality. In terms of the projects we were able to do, my municipality hires out that work. So it did not have a direct pact on our internal staffing, but we provided more k to a contractor within our region to do more paving k than we would otherwise have been able to do.

Mr Hopcroft: That is certainly consistent with what is pening in the area of my municipality. It has enabled us accelerate some works that would not have made it on he list this year. Generally what it is doing is creating re work in the private sector among those contractors o bid on municipal capital works.

Mr Sterling: I assume, from reading your brief and ur comments, that you are directing your brief and your comments to how it affects your members. You have a fairly narrow focus on the budget; you are not commenting on the overall fiscal impact of that budget on your communities. Is that correct?

Mr Harrison: Yes.

Mr Sterling: In terms of your praise for northern On- tario special assistance—and I think that as a member of an eastern Ontario area and having been a long term member of not only an area within Ottawa-Carleton which seems to survive the bumps and hollows of recessionary times, but having represented the county of Grenville at one stage prior to the 1987 election, I understand they do not have the same kind of smoothness in terms of their economic outlook—do you at all try to guide or suggest to the Treas- urer that perhaps special assistance might be appropriate to other areas of the province? There seems to be a brush, which I have always had a problem with, painting northern Ontario as needing assistance, whereas I understand from some kinds of statistics that you can show certain parts of eastern Ontario, particularly outside of the Ottawa-Carle- ton area, which I no longer represent but still have a great concern with, need economic assistance perhaps even more than some of the northern communities. Do you ever attempt to try to direct the Treasurer that way?

Mr Hopcroft: In terms of some of our broader policy documents we have certainly indicated that to this govern- ment and previous governments as well, that to some ex- tent any geographic distinction is an artificial one and you should really be in the long term trying to develop a fund- ing formula that recognizes the actual need, as opposed to whether they happen to fall on one side or the other of a geographic boundary.

Mr Sterling: I think of Cornwall now, for instance, which is having an extremely difficult time and needs as- sistance very badly. I would urge AMO to try to track in some way how the economies of its member municipalities are doing so that it can help the province when it is willing to help out particular municipalities.

Mr Hopcroft: One of the great difficulties we find in trying to make those kind of assessments is that there are just so many different factors coming to play on our local economies that it is extremely difficult to pinpoint any one particular issue. There is free trade, there is cross-border shopping, there are a number of other structural issues in terms of the manufacturing sector, and to pin it on just one is difficult from the resource aspect.

Mr Sterling: I realize that, but household incomes and unemployment figures I think are key to the ability of a municipality, and I think that is really the way provincial governments should decide on extra help when they are willing to give it.

Mr Harrison: Can I speak frankly to that question? We have approached the Ministry of Municipal Affairs to do a project of finding some objective way to quantify the economic stability of particular municipalities in order to target unconditional transfer payments. So we do have a project ongoing to attempt to put that in place. We are having a significant problem with collection of the appropriate data, but we are still working on that with the province.

Mr Sterling: The other part is that you asked the province to pick up 100% of the welfare system, and I understand the reasoning for that. One of the problems I have with that is that I think probably regional governments, county governments, are best able to run the system. How do you go to 100% financing and then permit another part of government to run the system, or are you suggesting the province run the whole system and just leave the municipalities out?

Mr Harrison: Our recommendation has been that the province, if you will, farm the administration of the system out to local municipalities, by which I mean upper-tier municipalities, regions and counties, on a fee-for-service basis, that they reimburse us the cost of administration on a fee-for-service basis, allow us to continue to operate the system on a local level but on a fee-for-service basis. That would give municipalities that did not want to do that, and I do not think there would be very many of them, the opportunity to opt out of that, in which case the province would have to administer the system provincially in those areas.

There is already half the system that is administered provincially; the family benefits system is administered provincially. I think what we would like to do is stick the administration of those two systems together and then, as I say, probably farm that out to counties and regions to administer on a fee-for-service basis.

Mr Sterling: Then would the county council or the regional council have any say as to what was going on?

Mr Harrison: Under that system there would be certainly a county or regional council say. I would assume that the province would establish minimum levels of administration and then there would be a number of other things that the county or region could do to top those levels up.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Sterling. It is time for the New Democratic Party.

Mr Christopherson: John, Grant, good to see you both again. It is always nice to see my former colleagues from the municipal governments coming forward. I appreciate the words you had to say and I think your document is very fair and very balanced.

I would like to ask you specifically what the impact would have been on municipalities in terms of services provided vis-à-vis cutbacks or property tax increases that would have been necessary had the provincial government not been forthcoming with the funding it did for our transfer partners, particularly the municipalities. And no games; I ask that in the context of the amount of heat the provincial government has taken from some quarters with regard to the deficit. As an entity that was one of the priorities we were recognizing in structuring the budget and which in many ways drove the deficit, although it was not just municipalities, I think your answer would be very important to these hearings.

Mr Hopcroft: Clearly, if we had been faced with the situation we had, for instance, in previous years where the transfers, particularly the unconditional transfers, were constrained, we would have seen either significant cutbacks or much higher tax increases in property taxes for 1991. I know that getting an inflationary increase did have a neutral impact in terms of municipalities trying to budget based on previous years' activities. If it had not gone up at that rate, there would have been a great deal more anger than we already had at the municipal level in trying to balance our budgets this year. As you know, a number of us had difficulty at any rate, given the economic activity slowing down, given the number of our constituents who are facing employment difficulties and so on, so the fact that we got the inflationary increase that we had requested made our job easier this year.

Mr Christopherson: Maybe when John responds, because I see him eager to jump in too, could we get some specifics? I know you cannot judge for each municipality but what sort of things would have to be looked at by council in terms of cutbacks?

Mr Harrison: You have played the game, David; you know how it works. Frankly, my feeling is that most municipalities this year, particularly upper-tier municipalities that were dealing with the welfare increases, dealt with the budgetary problems this year by dipping into reserves. There were significant cutbacks in a lot of places, but I do not know anybody—Grant may disagree with me—who did not when the final decision came, look at dipping into reserves.

Frankly, that is going to leave us in a terrible position for next year. I am going to run for council again in the fall, but I have sometimes wondered whether I actually want to win in terms of the problems municipalities are going to have at budget time next year. We have cut fat, we have cut some of the muscle, and many of us have put ourselves in a position where we are not going to have the options next year in terms of cushioning the blow with the reserves we had put together in prior years.

Mr Hopcroft: I would certainly agree with what John said in terms of the ongoing demands that the welfare system is placing on our municipal budgets. London's did not go up at the rate of 100%, but we have seen over the years, 100% over our 1989 levels, so that has had a significant impact. We have found we have had to cut back services in a number of areas. We had talk of closing library branches, closing recreational facilities for certain periods of time, and we are simply not going to have the same flexibility next year as we did this year unless there is some structural change to the way social services are delivered and, more particularly, funded.

Mr B. Ward: During this budget, our government made the decision to battle the recession, and part of that battle was to attempt to provide as much job creation as possible. Part of that job creation was through grants, whether it was through transportation, whether through the Ministry of the Environment or through the program for renewal, improvement, development and economic revitalization to municipalities, and I think I heard you say that a majority of the work for those programs would have been completed by the private sector. I used to be on city council in Brantford and I know we do not do much of that construction in-house. Primarily it is let out in tender to the private sector receives the benefits. In your experience, AMO, is that common throughout Ontario, that prima-ivate sector would be doing the construction work allowable under these grants through our attempts to the recession, over and above what normally would been given? Is that a fair comment?

Mr Hopcroft: Certainly based on my local experience area surrounding my municipality, that is the case. If want an anti-recessionary impact, putting it into those of capital works that are tendered out to the private is a great way to do it.

Mr B. Ward: I think it has been a position of AMO site a few years that our infrastructure in Ontario, as as throughout Canada, through the Federation of Can Municipalities, is badly in need of attention. We ne three-tier funding system that was agreeable at the) and FCM levels. So you think that this was a proper for our government to pay attention to during these times.

Mr Harrison: As I have said, every little bit helps. If re talking about job creation in the municipal sector, is at least as good a place to put it as any, if not better most. With regard to Mr Ward's earlier question, there places where it is done in-house rather than by the te sector. My experience is that in a lot of the more areas where there is not a major urban centre, there not be the construction firms available locally to do type of work, and in that type of area you often see the r-tier government, the county, with a significant con- tion component in its roads department. In that case, than going out to the private sector, the money prob- would have been used by the county to hire the neces- help to do the construction work in-house.

Mr B. Ward: And one last question—

The Chair: No, I am sorry, there is no time left. nk you very much for your presentation this morning.

Mr Harrison: Mr Chairman, I wonder if I could take minute of the committee's time just to take my AMO off for a very brief moment and make it very clear that n not speaking on behalf of my association but on alf of my municipality. I am very pleased to see Mr ison and Mr Sutherland on your committee, and I see you have Mr Gillies coming in to speak to you later Just let me say that from the heart of the tobacco ntry in southwestern Ontario, my municipality very ngly feels that if the upper tiers of government in this ntry are going to continue to put confiscatory taxation tobacco products and, as it appears, attempt to eliminate domestic industry, then surely you have to find some y to compensate our farmers.

Mr Kwinter: Listen, I have the greatest solution. The a was to pick the farmers who are growing tobacco and e them fish farm, and when they get finished, they uld have smoked fish, which ain't bad.

Mr Harrison: Many of us are already doing that.

The Chair: Unfortunately, as the Chairman, I cannot nment on that, but I thank you for your added com- ents and for coming and sharing with us this morning.

LABOURERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION OF NORTH AMERICA ONTARIO PROVINCIAL DISTRICT COUNCIL

The Chair: Our next deputation is from the Labourers' International Union of North America, provin- cial council, Dan McCarthy, in-house counsel.

Our format will continue to be a half-hour presentation. The amount of time you take for your presentation will be subtracted from that half-hour and divided among the par- ties equally for questions. The party that will begin the next round of questions at that moment will be the Pro- gressive Conservative Party.

Mr McCarthy: Good morning. My name is Daniel McCarthy and I am speaking on behalf of the Ontario provincial district council of the Labourers' International Union of North America. I am in-house counsel with Local 183 of the labourers' union here in Toronto, and we are the largest construction local in North America. The labourers across the province appreciate this opportunity to express our views on the provincial budget.

First, I would like to place our comments in context. The major factor for us, of course, is the severe recession. This is the worst recession Ontario has experienced since the 1930s, and from a construction point of view, it has been devastat- ing. In what should be our peak season, one half to two thirds of our members are unemployed or underemployed.

I spoke yesterday with the person who runs our hiring hall, and of our 12,000 members in Local 183, we are down to—they have just gone out of province; they have returned to other places, to the Maritimes or west—ap- proximately 4,000 are out of work, at least a third in To- ronto, and that has picked up in the last month. We are still a third unemployed. Those who have been unable to find work have exhausted their unemployment insurance bene- fits, and this winter when the regular seasonal layoffs occur, many will not qualify for unemployment insurance.

In addition, the major industrial restructuring occurring simultaneously with the downturn in the economy has im- plications beyond the manufacturing sector. It directly af- fects construction. One needs only to look at the housing market and the fact that the government has less money to maintain and improve the infrastructure. I would suggest that the housing market is often the weather-vane of the construction industry.

The federal policies also are a part of the context. The major cutbacks instituted by the Mulroney government have increased provincial responsibilities for the public good and decreased its financial ability to meet these responsi- bilities. I should reiterate that this is a made-in-Canada recession, as we have all heard, that high interest rates and the high dollar caused the recession to hit Canada first.

The federal government has chosen to focus its atten- tion upon the deficit. The deficit is a convenient abstract set of numbers. It shifts the eye away from the plight and suffering of everyday Canadians.

I propose to examine one particular piece of federal legislation, the recent changes to the Unemployment Insur- ance Act, to show its pernicious effect upon social assis- tance and our members. I am speaking from experience. I am director of the social services department of Local 183 and, as a service to our largely non-English-speaking membership, we complete their UI applications or, increasingly, advise them they do not qualify.

The usual objections to the changes in the UI have been the increases recently that employers and employees must pay, and a lot of focus in the press has been given to the lack of training which was supposed to accompany these changes in the diversification of the funds.

But there is an impact that was in the act that I do not think anybody has spotted, and I have not seen it in the press or any other form of reporting, and that is that the Unemployment Insurance Act was drafted with the unacknowledged assumption that recessions never occur. It was constructed to be responsive to a degree of unemployment in a particular geographical area and anticipated that the degree of unemployment would be relatively stable in that area. The higher the unemployment, the lower the number of weeks for eligibility and the greater the number of weeks of benefit. For example, when unemployment is under 6%, the eligibility requirement is 20 weeks; the benefit period is 17 weeks. When unemployment is over 10% to 11%, the number of weeks for eligibility is 15 and the number of weeks of benefits is 30. At the beginning of the recession, the figure in Toronto was just over 6% and required 20 weeks to qualify.

At the beginning of the recession, where the eligibility period is at its longest and the benefit period is its shortest, the first people to be laid off when the recession occurs are the most recently hired. Therefore, the workers who are laid off at the beginning of the recession have the least number of weeks worked and will receive the shortest number of weeks of benefits, whereas the workers who are laid off at the worst point in the recession will have the greatest number of weeks of eligibility and will receive the greatest number of weeks of benefits.

This means that when the recession continues to be at its worst, those people who were laid off first are having their benefits expire. The chance of obtaining a job at that point is minimal. Thus they are forced to go on social assistance, whereas the workers with the greatest number of weeks of eligibility who are laid off much later will have weeks in excess of benefits when they will not need them because the economy will recover.

We are now advising our members on how to apply for welfare. We field desperate calls from members who are losing their homes. This places an enormous burden upon social assistance by people who previously never required it. One must realize too that I am speaking for a construction union that is largely seasonal and that having enough weeks of eligibility is a standard way of riding through the off-season.

Therefore, we are very pleased that the provincial budget addresses these issues abandoned by the federal government. Given the reality of the recession and federal government policies and their effects upon construction workers, we agree that the government had to fight the recession in its budget. The NDP had to make a responsible choice that best addressed the interests of all Ontarians. We are quite pleased that the NDP did not abandon its responsibility to working people, their families and their communities.

In commenting on the budget itself in this context though we will be focusing our comments narrowly upon budget initiatives which most affect construction workers, does not mean that we do not applaud the government's efforts to address the needs and interests of low-income earners, native Canadians, women and visible minorities.

The development of another 10,000 non-profit housing units has a tremendous and positive effect on the construction industry. Building statistics indicate that, for every slightly over two jobs are created. In addition, one must see the initiatives in housing as having a ripple effect on the economy. It creates a demand for building materials for construction of roads, sewers, watermain, etc. Our members are already benefiting from this measure. It is a bright spot in an otherwise dull housing market.

We also agree that by putting spending power in the hands of the public by not imposing the provincial sales tax on the GST, $470 million will be available for consumer spend in 1991. This kind of economic stimulus, when coupled with the sustaining and creating of 70,000 jobs and an aggressive anti-recession effort, instils confidence in the private sector. It acts as a catalyst for further investment and helps to level out the worst of the effects of the recession on construction.

Specifically, as you heard from the previous speaker and the municipalities, part of the anti-recession package is road work. This has been of great assistance to our union.

The NDP budget speaks of long-range, sustainable prosperity. The construction industry has long been vulnerable to the boom-and-bust cyclical nature of the economy. This effort to commence long-range planning in which the government can intervene to reduce the effects of a recession will be most advantageous for construction workers in Ontario. We hope that one appreciates sustainable prosperity as a truly important part of this budget.

It was only two years ago that we could not supply enough construction workers for the construction that was going on in the province. The size of the union was expanding. It was not a case of trying to police the various construction sites for non-union members, because we could not supply enough people. A short 18 months later we have an enormous surplus and we cannot take on any body new.

We are not suggesting that it is the duty of the government to recklessly try to spend its way out of a recession. In fact, we agree that the deficit is modest, especially when one considers the pessimistic figures utilized in projecting the ongoing deficit over the coming years. As you know and have no doubt heard in other presentations, most of the deficit comes from the financial reality of the recession: falling revenues, increasing costs in health care, social services and education.

If one considers the Ontario deficit comparatively in terms of total spending, gross domestic product and in per capita terms with other provinces and with the federal government under Conservative governments, the present deficit fares well.

The reaction to the budget overall I would say has been good, even at a corporate level. It has been lauded by Kenneth Galbraith for reviving the economy and acknowledging the role of government as guardian of the public being. The Toronto-Dominion Bank expressed added support for the Ontario budget and acknowledged cautious projections for economic growth compared to those of other forecasters. Should the growth be stronger, the budget would be reduced dramatically and quickly.

I am sure everyone has heard the Conference Board of Canada's description of the budget as a confidence booster. I heard here before you today from the construction industry, in particular from the labourers—we hope the view we hear is the view of working people. Our people are hurting. Unemployment is high. Every government initiative focusing on housing, in maintaining and improving the infrastructure and in maintaining the social welfare net and providing health care and education is welcomed.

For many construction workers, the budget has already translated into jobs. We hope the members of the standing committee measure the budget not by abstract numbers, but that they put a human face on the consequences and human tragedies of the recession. Our members appreciate a budget which attacks the recession, the cause of our suffering.

In conclusion, we would like to thank the government of Ontario for allowing us to present our view on the economic situation at this public hearing. In conversations with our members, it is clear they know that the recession is their enemy. They complain about the boom-and-bust cycles. They would like steady work, sustainable prosperity. They want an economy which is highly productive and environmentally sustainable. In our opinion this budget has made a proper and reasonable choice. We applaud the government for making the decision to attack the recession.

We recommend that the government stay its course. By providing a reasonable amount of stimulus in the recession and holding the line on spending during the boom periods, we can provide Ontarians, and in particular construction workers, with a more stable existence.

The Chair: Thank you. We have 15 minutes, five minutes for each party, beginning with the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr Sterling: Thank you very much for coming in front of our committee, Mr McCarthy.

On page 6 you indicate, "The Conference Board of Canada described the budget as a confidence booster and stated that only $640 million of the $9.7 billion deficit consists of new spending." You are quite certain that the conference board has stated that, is that correct? I know Mr Frank has talked about this as an individual, but he made it quite clear that he was not speaking on behalf of the conference board. I know you are a counsel and you would not mislead us intentionally in terms of what you are saying.

Mr McCarthy: I was quoting Mr Frank.

Mr Sterling: Okay. Mr Frank was speaking as an individual, as I understand it. We are having this conference board mixed up with Jim Frank on a number of occasions in front of this committee, and I think it is important that we get that distinction straight. If I am incorrect, if somebody wants to give me some kind of knowledge of which I am not aware—

Mr Sutherland: We will correct you if you are incorrect.

Mr Sterling: I would appreciate that.

Mr B. Ward: Just for clarification, what is Jim Frank's position? What does he do?

Mr Sterling: He is their senior economist.

Mr B. Ward: For the Conference Board of Canada.

Mr Sterling: But he made it quite clear that he was speaking as an individual.

Mr B. Ward: In that opinion column, right? Was it not an opinion column or something?

Mr Sterling: No, it was just to the press, I believe.

Mr McCarthy: It was an article, I believe, in the summer issue of the Canadian Business Review. So I rephrase my comments to say, "Mr Frank of the Conference Board of Canada."

Mr Sterling: Good enough. Yesterday we had in front of this committee a group of workers—perhaps part of your union; I am not certain. I believe they were from Hamilton, so they would probably not be members of your labour local. But they were very, very concerned, not with the budget, but with Bill 4 and the rent review legislation.

What are your views of that legislation? Do you think it has had any impact in terms of the amount of work your people have been able to get?

Mr McCarthy: We do work in that sector. Our position, and it is a position we have made clear to Mr Cooke, is that reasonable costs—and by "reasonable costs" we mean those that would affect the integrity of the building—for example, it is my understanding from speaking with others in the union that a lot of the concrete used in the structure of basements, especially in the 1950s and 1960s, was not as resistant to salt. Our position is that those kinds of costs should be passed on, because if you do not address those in the short term, you are going to take all that housing off the market.

Specifically answering your question, we can live with that compromise in terms of the jobs it will provide. We do not feel the compromise will take away or restrict the number of jobs we get. It may put them out over a longer period of time so that there will not be a mass of renovations all at once, but it will provide steady employment for our members.

Mr Sterling: We have heard from a number of people who are obviously members of the same unions that you are associated with who disagree, but that may be your official position.

In the Ottawa area, which I represent, we have a problem which has been there for some period of time, in that Quebec legislation prevents Ontario workers from crossing over the provincial boundary and having the same status as workers who reside in the area where a contract is being undertaken.

Has your council been attempting to deal with that issue? In effect, what it says is that if there is job in Hull, a resident of Hull has first chance at that job. However, when a Quebec worker comes across to Ontario, there is no distinction between him and a person who might live in Ottawa, if the job is in Ottawa. It causes a great deal of feeling in construction workers of unfairness. Is there any attempt to deal with that issue?

Mr McCarthy: I am aware of the unfairness. Unfortunately, they go a lot farther west than simply crossing over into the Ottawa area.

Mr Sterling: That is where I am familiar with.

Mr McCarthy: My understanding is that our union is addressing it through the provincial building trades council, which is taking action on that. My understanding is that they will be addressing this standing committee at a later date, so they would perhaps be the better organization to address that question.

Mr Sterling: Okay. I think it is an important issue and I urge you to do a lot of work in that area.

Mr Jamison: Thank you for your presentation. I found it very interesting. I would just like to touch on something with you. You seem to recognize in your presentation that there was a major deficit and a limit in new spending. That message has not really got out to the public the way it should, because opposition parties, and one party in particular, would be saying, "Cut back, cut back, cut back," in many different areas. That has been the point of view, especially from the third party.

It is interesting to hear you say that the added spending in this budget, especially the anti-recession and housing programs that are being put forward, have really been a stimulus to your organization as far as providing ongoing employment through a tough time, although your employment is still down, I understand.

Without that input, without that boost—could you describe to me what position you would be in without the housing starts, without the anti-recession money for roads and construction and so forth?

Mr McCarthy: In the month of May, which is normally a month or a month and a half into the buildup of the construction season, Local 183 was approximately 70% unemployed. Some people were estimating higher, but I think a conservative estimate was that 70% of our members were unemployed. In the two subsequent months we have reversed that, so close to 65% or 66% of our members are employed. The only thing that is really happening in the housing market is the not-for-profit, the co-op.

In terms of the other anti-recession measures, the transportation has had a really good effect for our members. A lot of road crews are building. A lot of private contractors are going again. We are getting calls into the hall.

I am not an economist, but I am attributing the reversal from 70% unemployed to close to 70% employed to those initiatives. I would consider that we would have kept on at the same high, high rate of unemployment had it not been for the initiatives.

Mr Jamison: You talked about the cyclical approach to housing and to construction in general. What you and the people you represent are looking for, and you have said again in your document and echoed the government's position, of course, is to try to find that sustainable prosperity.

In times that are difficult, I appreciate hearing that feel it is important for the government to play a role ensuring where possible that employment is helped that employment rates are kept up, but in doing all this have provided the groundwork for what we consider coming out of the recession earlier, and also building that infrastructure. Do you feel the same about that?

Mr McCarthy: I think the building of the infrastructure is critical to construction workers in terms of employment. To use the subway as an example, we tend to build a lot of stops at once and then do not build anything for years. It would seem to me that if construction that is largely publicly financed, such as a subway, was at a very low level during the boom period as opposed to booming with private development, then in a recession instead of building one stop a year, three stops could be built, but we would maintain a lower level of infrastructure work during the boom periods. That is the kind of thing I was getting at. Those are the kinds of things I think you are indicating and we are saying, yes, that is important.

Mr Kwinter: Mr McCarthy, what is the relationship of the Labourers' International Union of North America with you? Say, a union like Local 27 of the carpenters and joiners. Do you have any relationship?

Mr McCarthy: Very peaceful.

Mr Kwinter: But do you have any kind of relationship with them at all?

Mr McCarthy: We just have an agreement as to jurisdiction, who does what in the various industries.

Mr Kwinter: So you are familiar with that particular local.

Mr McCarthy: Yes, very familiar.

Mr Kwinter: I have met them. It is my understanding that they represent carpenters and joiners virtually around the Golden Horseshoe, the industrial heartland of Ontario.

Mr McCarthy: I think District 8 of the Ontario Labour Relations Board is pretty much that.

Mr Sterling: How many are in Local 183?

Mr McCarthy: Right now about 12,000.

Mr Kwinter: What I find surprising is that I met with them, I met with all their executives, I toured their facilities up in North York on Signet Drive—this was just a few weeks ago—and they were absolutely despondent, saying that not only were their workers not working, but that they saw nothing on the horizon, which is really upsetting them. They said, "If anybody is going to work in the construction business, it's going to be the carpenters and joiners." They have to set the forms. They have to have those guys do whatever matter what they do.

They have an apprenticeship program and they say there are people in there, but that they are only in there because they have no work, so they feel they might as well upgrade their skills while they are waiting to get some

These are people who are allies of yours. They have reason to tell me something that is not so. They were saying that they see absolutely nothing on the horizon, that there have been no benefits at all to them in the way of public works or government seed money to get their people going. What I do not understand—I am not being critical; I would like to understand it—is why are they telling me that when you are telling me that you have switched it from unemployment to 60% employment in your sector?

Mr McCarthy: The answer, I think, is very simple. Carpenters are a specific trade. The labourers are a much broader organization. We do sewers and watermains. We do landscaping. We even have a bit of an industrial sector. We do all road construction, whereas carpenters, as you say, do carpentry. We have some carpenters who do rough form work and roughing in housing and certainly they are still hurting, because there is no private development of housing, so one sector of our union that is doing very poorly is the house building sector. We have over 600 members who work in that and there is very high unemployment in that sector.

I think the answer to your question is that the labourers have a much broader membership and a much broader area of jurisdiction, where carpenters, like ironworkers or electricians, have a specific trade. If things are booming in that specific trade, then they do well. We are responding to initiatives in roadbuilding from the Ministry of Transportation in a way that carpenters cannot, so some of our members are getting work, but one of our sectors that is doing poorly is private housing.

Mrs Sullivan: I recall your union appearing before the standing committee on resources development on Bill 162, making some substantial contributions to that debate. I am very interested in your analysis that this budget has been slanted into jobs already, because I frankly do not see capital investment at the municipal level in water and sewerage. In fact, in this budget there is no increase over the previous year for water and sewerage, and a real opportunity to lever more capital investment in those areas through the water and sewer corp has been set aside.

I also do not see, from the private sector, the stimulus out of this budget for new capital investment in infrastructure, whether it is building new plant or whether it is expansion of plant or whatever, where some of your people would be affected. Ten thousand units of public housing, or non-profit and co-op, over a period of time is not going to provide sustained work for your members who are involved in the home building sector.

I just do not see why you are so positive about the long-term stimulus that this budget provides. It seems to me that it is not there. Short-term job creation was done through projects that were already on the table at the municipalities, already moving forward.

Mr Christopherson: No.

Mrs Sullivan: Darn right they were.

Mr Christopherson: No, darn right they were not.

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly they were. The municipalities had those projects ready and available to go.

Mr Christopherson: That is not moving along.

Mrs Sullivan: They are over very quickly, and your people will feel the brunt of that.

Mr McCarthy: I am on the board of directors of the Local 183 non-profit housing. Since the recession has occurred—before, there were many allocations given, as you know, for non-profit housing, but no land in the city was available. We are currently sponsoring a 221-unit building at Duncan Mill Road and Don Mills Road that will be a co-op. Right beside it the operating engineers are sponsoring a 220-unit non-profit building.

The developer who owned that land had already paid all the architectural fees and had gone through the Ontario Municipal Board and had all the drawings for luxury condos overlooking this conservation area. Suddenly the market is not there for condos. They turned to non-profit and said: "You have the allocations. Let's get together. We will give you this land." We have also had feelers for a sizeable chunk of property in Mississauga, in two different sites in Mississauga.

I think what is happening, and I know that other unions are doing the same thing, is that on the non-profit front for the allocations we had we are suddenly getting offers of land from developers who can no longer afford to hang on to it, or the market will not bear building more condos they had already planned.

Mrs Sullivan: I understand that. It has happened in my community as well.

Mr McCarthy: What I am saying is that these kinds of things are providing—you are right that it is short term, but take a look at what it means to the builder who is now getting 400-plus units built on land that was costing him money and is making a profit at it.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chairman, just before Mr McCarthy leaves, I have a copy here of the article by Mr Frank. It is called "Frank Talk on the Economy". It appeared in Canadian Business Review, the summer edition. He is highlighted as James G. Frank, vice-president and chief economist, Conference Board of Canada. It also talks about an analysis from the chief economist, and the text is also available on-line from the Conference Board On-Line Service. I think Mr McCarthy's assertion that he was speaking on behalf of the Conference Board of Canada would seem pretty valid by the way this article has been written and how he is identified that way in several ways.

Mr Sterling: Mr Chairman, I raised the point. I think the conclusion you might draw is—first of all, it is all written in the first person, saying "I believe," etc. There is no statement in the article that the Conference Board of Canada believes the views of Mr Frank.

The Chair: Could I offer a suggestion here.

Mr Sterling: I think it is very important. It is in other papers. I have seen the article.

The Chair: We should phone The Conference Board of Canada and have this clarified later.

Mr Sterling: I think that is a good idea.

Mr Jamison: The truth hurts sometimes.

Mr B. Ward: Before Mr McCarthy leaves, this is kind of off the topic, but I would like to commend Local 183 for the leadership it is showing in retraining and providing skills development for its workers as well as other services. I think they are very progressive.

Mr McCarthy: I appreciate that.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION OF INTERVAL AND TRANSITION HOUSES

The Chair: Our next presentation is by the Ontario Association of Interval and Transition Houses: Lisa Duggan, vice-president; Trudy Don, executive co-ordinator. We have half an hour. Since you have been here a while, you know the process. The Liberals will lead off on the questions at the end of your presentation.

Ms Duggan: My name is Lisa Duggan and I am vice-president of lobby of the Ontario Association of Interval and Transition Houses.

During the 1990 Ontario election campaign, the NDP developed An Agenda for People, which incorporated into the policy platform many of the demands and needs that people identified and reiterated time and time again to the previous Progressive Conservative and Liberal governments of Ontario. This agenda promised to bring improved changes and renewed hope to the lives of the average citizen.

Clearly, promises and policies need to be secured with finances, and in a period that is being described as a recession, we are told that fiscal realities impact the decision-making abilities of government.

The Ontario Association of Interval and Transition Houses, which is an 82-member provincial organization working to improve the lives of abused women and their children, would like to commend the NDP government on its courageous stand to allow for a greater deficit in the 1991-92 budget.

During tough economic times we believe it is imperative that spending on social programs be increased, not reduced. We are pleased that the NDP government decided to pay less heed to the warnings of doom echoed by the federal government, big business and the corporate world. However, we would like to express some concerns about the budget and the gaps that exist which affect the lives of abused women and their children.

OAITH, shelter workers and abused women recognize and fully understand the fiscal realities of recessionary and non-recessionary times. We have listened to and experienced at first hand the promises made to us by government and then the rationale used to limit spending on those promises on the issue of violence against women.

On January 22, 1991, OAITH presented to this committee a brief overview of the funding history of interval and transition houses, including the recommendations of the standing committee on social development in 1982, the implementation of bail-out and stabilization funding in 1985, the Brian Lowe review of shelter funding in 1986, the five-year initiatives announcement in 1986, the draft of the Ministry of Community and Social Services funding formula and the subsequent development of OAITH's alternative funding formula. For the details of that presentation, we would refer you back to Hansard, and of course we would be prepared to restate our concerns.

We mention it today to remind you that the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, in recommendation 53 of the 1991 pre-budget consultation report, stated, "The funding formula for interval and transition houses should be reviewed with an attempt to instigate block funding in 1991-92."

OAITH was pleased to see your recommendation that we believed that future changes in funding for shelters could be possible with the 1991-92 budget of the new government. Our hopes were raised further as pre-budget consultations with MCSS, regarding the latest version of the funding formula for shelters, were cancelled until after the budget had been announced. We were told that substantial changes were being considered in this year's funding for shelters. We could only assume from these events, clearly naïvely, that the 1991-92 budget would incorporate funding arrangements that would recognize all the services provided by interval and transition houses.

Block funding for all shelter services has been consistently supported and proposed, in the reports mentioned earlier, for the last 10 years. However, the direction of policy through MCSS policy and practice and the 1991 budget announcement still focuses on the same inadequate and insecure funding models. In our 1990 November lobby of the members of provincial Parliament, and in our pre-budget presentations to this committee and to the executive assistants to the ministers—most ministers have been inaccessible to OAITH; that is why we met with the executive assistants to the ministers—we pointed out that shelters continue to struggle to provide adequate and consistent services.

One in four women in Canada are being abused by their partners and, as public education supports women's rights to obtain assistance and live a life free from violence, demands on shelter services are diversifying and increasing. The detailed announcement in May of $12 million new dollars was welcomed by our organization, but the demands identified and reiterated by assaulted women and their advocates continue to be unrecognized financially by the government. MCSS has still not rescheduled a meeting with OAITH to discuss the funding formula. Funding for ongoing shelter services is falling far behind the demands for service. Shelters are at a breaking point.

Several municipalities are still refusing to recognize the provincially recommended level of per diem funding and some shelters are still being forced to limit the length of stays and charge user fees. Approved ministry staff ratios are low and shelter workers have to work long hours and many hours of overtime to consistently meet the needs of abused women and their children.

When it was announced that pay equity would be implemented in the 1991-92 budget, we expected shelter workers could finally look forward to equitable wages, rather than the present average of slightly over $25,000 per year with very few benefits. We were deeply disappointed.

When the new budget was announced we did not criticize the increase in the deficit, as we recognized the increased social needs of everyone in a period of recession. OAITH zes that the responsibility of government to financially everyone's demands is a thankless and difficult task, we were glad to hear of the expanded commitment to address the issues of wife assault and sexual violence. However, the gap is widening between the services shelter provide and the public commitment to services for assaulted women, as well as between the problems public policy has identified and the actual changing needs of abused women.

Women's lives continue to hang in the balance while government decides if their issue is a priority that should be adequately funded. The assault of women is a human rights issue and money is needed to protect women and give them back their freedom, not study the problem. OAITH has been told repeatedly that funds are limited, but when we hear of new projects being funded, for example, the Hamilton mediation project through the Attorney General's office, the ongoing consultations that lack meaningful action, and a hostel review which will look at hostels funded under the hostel agreement of the General Welfare Assistance Act, which we fear may not recognize existing inappropriate funding approach, it is difficult to embrace the new budget with enthusiasm. So we are not today not to criticize the deficit, but rather to criticize the lack of response to the stated demands of abused women and their children. Action is long overdue.

The following is only a partial list of the immediate needs that require funding: the financial recognition of all services provided by interval and transition houses as identified in OAITH's alternate funding formula; the removal of services for assaulted women and their children from the GWA Act; the development of new legislated funding for services for assaulted women and their children which does not discriminate on the basis of eligibility criteria; the implementation of pay equity for all interval and transition house staff, based on salary levels comparable to the public service; the immediate increase of the salary levels of shelter workers to $38,500, as stated and prorated in OAITH's alternate funding formula; the immediate increase of the provincially recognized staffing ratios in shelters to address the issue of safety for both shelter residents and staff.

We have not had time to even touch on the other areas affecting funding which address abused women's safety, for example, the criminal and family law court systems, community counselling programs, children's programs, housing, education, economic support systems and so on. For more details of this list we would refer you back to the 1990 OAITH background report which you all received in November. We thank you for this opportunity and look forward to participating in meaningful consultations and discussions about the 1992-93 budget.

The Chair: We have seven minutes per party, beginning with the Liberal Party.

Mrs Sullivan: I appreciate this brief. It is direct, to the point and very clear. I wonder if you would expand on two areas. You have spoken a lot about the funding formula on the operating side in particular. One is the capital needs you are facing and how they are being addressed; second-stage housing as an issue. Once again, moving back to the operating side, the specific effect you are feeling because of the lack of pay equity action. How you are seeing those needs addressed, if at all?

Ms Don: I will tackle this one, the second-stage housing issue. I take it there is a great confusion about the term "second-stage housing," what is meant by it. We did some research throughout the province and there seemed to be as many interpretations as there are such projects. They range from an old house with two or three separate apartments with common living space, etc, to multistorey apartment dwellings where there are a few apartments set aside for battered women and children who come out of a shelter. As a result, we found it very difficult to come to some common understanding of what there ought to be in place.

We did develop some recommendations of what at least we felt should be there, but as such there really has not been any common research on the best way to go. Personally, I have some concerns about racing ahead with developing second-stage housing without knowing what the ultimate goal of that is. If it is simply another place where a woman and children will be temporarily until she is uprooted again and moved into some other accommodation, then I cannot support that. If it is only for those women who need longer ongoing support and counselling, I think it is a great idea. But my fear is that because of the housing shortage and the shortage of beds within transition houses, this "second-stage housing" will simply be used as the next stopgap before the woman finds permanent housing.

Ms Duggan: In terms of pay equity, there is a lot of talk about proxy comparisons. We have concerns about proxy comparisons because, for example, they would take as a proxy comparison a man working in counselling and then they would look at the woman working in the office with him doing counselling per se and compare their two salaries, and then see the difference between those two salaries. They would up her salary to the level of his salary, and in terms of shelter workers, they are looking at the difference between her salary and his salary instead of looking at the direct comparison between shelter workers and his salary, for example. We have real concerns about that. It is also not clear what they are going to be using right now as a comparison, so there has to be more discussion around that.

But at this point, shelter workers are really underfunded in terms of their salaries, they are working long hours and a lot of overtime, and it is really unclear about what is going to be happening with pay equity. There has not been any mention in terms of the budget of shelter workers per se, and what we are asking for is real comparisons to public service and being consulted, identifying what those comparisons should be. But we do not support a proxy comparison because it does not bring shelter workers' salaries up to an adequate level.

In terms of capital needs and how they are being addressed, I pulled out the announcements. In terms of the breakdown of the announcement out of the new budget, we are not clear exactly how it is going to be broken down further. So we have this broken down into special enhancements to approve access and shelter services ongoing. The money to improve access to shelters is over $4 million and the money for ongoing services to shelters is close to $2 million. The demand on shelters is incredible at this point. Increasing access to shelters is really needed, but the problem is there is no money for ongoing services. You have at least double the amount for improving access to shelters, yet less than half of that is for ongoing services. It is going to really put an increased demand on shelters which we are already facing as it is.

In terms of capital needs of shelters, there are lots of services at shelters right now that are not being funded and are not recognized. That is why I keep referring back to the ultimate vision. As I said in the presentation, we still have not met with MCSS about the funding formula and the breakdowns of those moneys even further, and we have real concerns about the money shelters have right now to actually operate. I know you are talking about capital costs, but there are several costs in shelters not being funded that need to be addressed.

The Chair: Two minutes.

Mr Phillips: In terms of the demands placed on your services, is there any effect by a recession or is that irrelevant in terms of the demands? I just do not know.

Ms Duggan: There is always a question asked, "In recessionary times, do you see an increase in violence against women?" But I would like to repeat, and you have heard us in our presentations before repeat, that the root cause of violence against women is a power and control issue and it has nothing to do with stress, anger or recessionary times.

Shelters, for the past while now, have certainly been operating at full capacities, and overcapacities in many situations, and you often hear those kinds of questions about whether a recession causes an increased demand on shelters. The demand on shelters is constant. We certainly get a lot of calls and that sort of thing because, in terms of recessionary times, their partners may be home more. So women's abusive partners are around more to be more abusive towards them because they are not working. Women do not get those breaks from their partners at all and so they are there a lot more. But that does not cause the violence and certainly the demand is consistent.

Mr Phillips: What reason does the Ministry of Community and Social Services give you for not meeting with you?

Ms Duggan: They have not answered that question. We asked them at a recent meeting in Toronto where they were in terms of the funding formula and when they will be meeting with us, and that question was not answered.

Ms Don: One of the concerns voiced to me by some of our members is that because of the hearings on the budget, some of this new money that had been announced is being held up until the end of the hearings, which would also explain why a few of these new projects have been started. I have not got the answer to that, but that concern has been raised.

Ms Duggan: So I guess our question would be, are the announcements of the new budget being held up until after these hearings?

Mr Phillips: I am shocked that you cannot—speech from the throne was very much around openness and accessibility.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Phillips, your time is up.

Mr Jackson: Lisa, Trudy, welcome again. I appreciated your brief. Although I was a little late, I tried to get here on time to catch all of it, but I have had a chance to scan it as well. I am concerned about the fact that most of the provinces in Canada currently have under review of place an adjusted funding formula to recognize the need there are a lot of provinces moving in this direction, but do not seem to be making much progress here in Ontario.

Although we have seen some improvement in staff funding rates, modest ones, they are not as great as they are in some other provinces. Can you give any reason for our relative position to other provinces may not be as good in terms of positioning on this issue?

Ms Don: I am not quite certain. I also have another organization which is the chair of the steering committee for a national organization. I am not certain that in fact in other provinces the shelter workers are being better paid. In fact, I had a report from Alberta that they think we are wondering.

Mr Jackson: I am sorry, Trudy, I did not mean simply the better payment. I know, in terms of per capita accommodation rates, other provinces have done better, or the uptake of the national program was a little better in other provinces. Recognition of the need for double staffing, after hours in evenings, I should say.

Ms Don: The only real advantage we have found is that some other provinces have gone to block funding. My question continues to be that when I hear from other provinces that they have been able to do that under the cost-sharing agreement with CAP—which has always been the excuse have been given by the provincial government, that it cannot do it because under CAP cost-sharing you cannot have block funding which does not apply any kind of eligibility requirement. That is why, as an organization, we have been asking for some special legislation over the years.

Under the legislation, I do not know why this cannot be done under cost-sharing, but that is something I would like to find out. It is the same question I asked back in 1981, so I have not got the answer yet. But I do know, for instance, Newfoundland has gone to block funding a long time ago. Quebec, I gather, is not part of the cost-sharing system with the federal government for its welfare programs. I know Alberta has gone to some kind of block funding system. Now, British Columbia is in bad shape, but Manitoba is not doing that much better either.

I would not necessarily say we are falling behind other provinces, but I do not understand why this province has not been able to go over to some kind of legislated block funding. That I do not know.

Mr Jackson: Certainly we have indicated our support for that and we are hopeful we can stabilize and change the formula, which are the two issues, recognizing the broad base of costs, including not simply supervision of children but the psychometric requirements of some children who have the es been the victims as well of family violence and are lent with the mother in an interval or transition home.

 n my own region of Halton, both Mrs Sullivan and I aware that we had made applications for a second trann home because of the waiting lists. I have a letter 1 people in our transition home that says they feel they e been misled by the Minister of Housing, because they e been led to believe they should apply under one pron and then told that they were ineligible after they had it considerable moneys preparing for that. Are you ing that this has occurred in other areas within the vince, or is this unique to the Halton experience? They very angry that after a year's work, they are now back uare one. We are starting all over again now, going to fferent minister, when we were told by Mr Cooke, the ister of Housing, that that was the ministry to apply to.

Ms Don: It is hard for me to comment. If they origiy applied under Project Haven, maybe they missed a dline. That was a federal CMHC proposal.

Mr Jackson: No.

Ms Duggan: That is not something we have heard oss the province.

Mr Jackson: Okay. I figure from your umbrella organation you would be able to pick up on that. Maybe it is ue to Halton. There are some level-2 disappointments Hamilton and other communities that we have been nitoring, but certainly not a proper interval and transi-1 house.

The statistics you shared with a similar committee to two years ago were that between 10,000 and 12,000 men are turned away. Given the increase in the last few rs in publicity, advertising, just exposing the criminal ivities of family violence and the reporting requirements, those demand figures still consistent? I certainly know are not seeing the expansion in the beds to meet any-ere near that, but certainly I wanted to get a sense from u if you are getting the same sort of demand figures.

Ms Duggan: There are certainly increasing demands shelters and there is never enough space for women in elters. I think the other things that shelters do also need to recognized. Specifically, I am thinking of non-residential elling as well. My other hat is that I work as a front-e shelter worker in Hamilton, and we see a real demand non-residential counselling in our crisis lines as well.
 I think shelters do more than just give space to women d their children. There is ongoing counselling, there are nnections to other services, advocacy, all kinds of ings, and there certainly is not enough space in shelters d also not enough money for the other services that elters provide.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. You ognize in your brief that public education has led to ore demand on your services. I would like to ask you hat you feel the effect would be on your client base out-ere if we had followed the advice of some of the opposi-on, the Progressive Conservative Party and some of the usiness figures, such as Conrad Black, I guess we could ame, and eliminated the deficit or held it at $3 billion.
 What would be the effect on community services? I think we have to recognize also that there are a lot of other services out there that are the front line in identifying the need for your services and directing people to them, where they are available.

Ms Duggan: Our position, as we stated earlier, is that we do not criticize the deficit. Actually, we would probably say the deficit is not high enough, because there are so many services that shelters provide that have not been recognized in the new announcements. We are not going to say you should have maintained a lower deficit. That is not our position. Our position is that it should have been a higher deficit because there are so many services that need to be provided for women.

In terms of education, there is a constant need for ongoing education about these issues. Society needs to take a responsibility to educate everyone that this is a power and control issue and that things need to be done to stop this, because wife assault is a human rights issue. But there are lots of services that are not funded, and we would prefer to see a higher deficit.

Ms Don: If I may just add to that, I think among the many other issues are also social need issues such as day care, housing, upgrading, retraining, etc, which are all the issues that keep women in the position they are in and why they cannot get out of violent relationships.

We certainly recognize that these are all issues that need to be worked on. I would like to think that at least my grandchildren will not have to deal with transition houses.
 I know that in my lifetime it will continue to happen. If we do not look at all the other issues that affect the position of women in our society, we are going to continue to build new transition houses, which surely is not the answer.

Ms M. Ward: That is what I was speaking of there, of people's service providers in my riding. Neighbourhood service agencies and so on have told me that frequently someone comes to them looking for housing, in a housing registry and so on. That is not their only problem. Very often their need for housing is related to the violence issue.

Ms Duggan: As we mentioned in our brief, there are lots of issues that we did not discuss in this. I would refer you to our background report from the November 1990 lobby. All of the issues are addressed in there.

Ms M. Ward: I just want to leave time for a question by someone else, but there was one of your recommendations
 I wanted to ask you about. In the third one, you are talking about "funding that does not discriminate on the basis of eligibility criteria." Is that related to income levels?

Ms Don: It is related to income levels; it is related many times to the discretion of the welfare administrator.
 In some cases it will be decided that because the woman has $500 in her savings account, she is not eligible.

Ms M. Ward: Or her husband or her mate has a high income—

Ms Don: That is right, the husband may have a house.
 To us, to base the services for a woman whose life is in danger on whether she is eligible is totally ridiculous.

Mr Sutherland: Again, thanks for your presentation.
 It is very thoughtful and directly to the point. I have a very special friend who works in one of these shelters and keeps me aware of what the problems are, and the demands, and the fact that they are constantly growing. You made reference here to the fact that you have talked to executive assistants to ministers and that most ministers have been inaccessible. You are talking specific individual meetings, are you?

Ms Duggan: Yes. After the November lobby we set up meetings with ministers of cabinet so that we could meet with them specifically, all the ministries that affect the issues of women abused by their partners: Housing, MCSS, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, etc. They have been inaccessible. We have met with, I believe, three ministers out of many ministers who cover the issues of violence against women. So what we had to do was meet with the executive assistants prior to the budget so that we could talk about our concerns and reiterate some of our concerns, because they have been inaccessible.

Mr Sutherland: Talking to the local people, while there is general support for the increased funding that has been announced, the question I keep getting asked is, how are we going to access that locally in terms of the distribution of the funds? I think we have heard that and a couple of the other areas, I believe, with the announcements generally in the public service about pay equity and getting their money out there. Is that what you are hearing? The money is there, but you are not sure where it is going to meet the staffing needs?

Ms Duggan: Yes, absolutely.

Mr Sutherland: In some ways, then, you are reserving judgement until you see where that goes, how it distributes, whether it goes to deal with staffing needs or other issues.

Ms Duggan: We can reserve judgement, and I will keep reiterating over and over again that there is not enough money, yes, absolutely, because we do not know what those breakdowns are in the specific areas.

Ms Don: I think that refers to my question earlier that we did not know whether in fact some of these breakdowns were not being announced until such time—

Mr Sutherland: I should say I do not think that would be a deliberate thing, to withhold the money. I do not think that is to our advantage.

Ms Don: I do not know how that works.

Mr Sutherland: I do not think it is to our advantage not to get the money out there. I think we want to get it out there as quickly as possible to help as much as possible. You are still looking for block funding, though.

Ms Don: Absolutely.

Mr Sutherland: You said you believe there are two other provinces. Newfoundland has it and Quebec, most likely, will be going to it?

Ms Don: Yes, Quebec. But I believe Quebec is under a different cost-sharing arrangement with the federal government. I do not know. Again, that is what I heard. Alberta has some kind of cost—

Mrs Sullivan: Alberta does not get CAP, does it? berta is not funding under CAP, I do not think.

Ms Don: No.

CANADIAN AUTOMOBILE ASSOCIATION ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Hamilton Auto Club, CAA Ontario, Catherine Newell, director of government and public affairs. If you could begin, please.

Ms Newell: Good morning. I do work at the Hamilton Auto Club, but I am here representing our 1.3 million members for all the clubs of Ontario that are affiliated with the Canadian Automobile Association. In Ontario we go under the heading of CAA Ontario for public policy purposes.

At the outset, we in CAA Ontario recognize the recession that Ontario is experiencing and the deficit the government was faced with upon assuming office. However, taxes still comprise the largest single segment of gasoline prices. For regular unleaded gasoline, the Ontario average was 17.7 cents per litre in federal tax and 15 cents per litre in provincial taxes. Combined federal and provincial revenue shares from gasoline were 59% of the pump price when the pump price was 46.7 cents per litre. These figures were prepared by Canadian oil markets and emergency planning division, EMR Energy, in its revenue distribution breakdown report for February 1991.

With the budget, as of midnight April 29 the provincial gasoline tax increased to 13 cents per litre, with a further increase to 14.7 cents per litre to take effect 1 January 1992. The wellhead share is 3.7 cents per litre, for a combined total of 16.7 cents per litre in provincial share at this time, increasing to a total of 18.4 cents per litre January 1, 1992.

The unfortunate political reality is that government regards gasoline taxation as a cash cow and ignores its responsibility to ensure that within its jurisdiction the tax burden is fairly distributed and not concentrated on a particular group. The automobile should not be viewed as a revenue producer for the purposes of contributing to the government's general coffers and should not be lumped with the "sin tax" group of alcohol, beer, wine and tobacco. However, continued increases in gasoline taxes are a punitive and an insidious attack on all those who must drive their cars because they have no viable alternative method of transportation.

There are fundamental differences in the three categories of product and they should be treated differently by the tax system. With respect to alcohol and tobacco, both are luxury items. Neither are necessary for the maintenance of a strong economy or personal wellbeing.

Prior to the budget the government had suggested that it might implement a "conservation" or "carbon" tax on gasoline. The reason for using these terms is simple. The most exalted argument for gas taxes is environmental: higher taxes will encourage people to use their cars less, thus conserving energy and the ozone layer. Sure enough the Treasurer indicated in his budget speech that he raised the price of the gas tax in the name of the environment.

This is simply not an appropriate approach to taxation of the motorist and to energy conservation. It penalizes anyone who is required to use a car, including those for whom there is no public transit or no practical alternative. Across-the-board taxes of gasoline are regressive and violate any standard of fairness. They quickly become a burden to seniors; single parents, 85% of whom are women; the working poor, the lowest-income car users; and, indeed, a majority of middle-class Ontarians who are required to use their cars to get to work.

Gas taxes have little beneficial effect on the environment. Only if these taxes were outrageously increased could there be any real change in people's behaviour that would impact on the environment. As reported by Terence Coran in the Globe and Mail:

"A rule of thumb used by a Canadian oil company says that every 1% increase in the price of gasoline produces a decrease of one tenth of 1% in consumption. When Ontario's gasoline taxes rose 1.7 cents, an increase of about 3% in the price, the reduction in consumption can be expected to be 0.3%. Since Ontario consumes 34 million litres of gasoline a day, the reduction in gasoline use could mean about 100,000 litres. As a result, there might be the equivalent of 2,000 fewer fill-ups a day in Ontario as a result of the first tax increase. Environment impact: not measurable."

Approximately half the pollution generated by motor vehicles is produced by 10% of the fleet that is improperly maintained and tuned. Most, although not all, of the pollution-generating cars are older cars. New cars on the road, like those with new, cleaner and more efficient engines, generate only small fractions of the automobile pollution in the province. If the real objective is to clean up automobile emissions, and 10% of cars cause 50% of pollution, then efficiency dictates that 50% of the pollution could be sharply reduced, if not eliminated, by targeting the 10% who are responsible for it. In many cases, a simple engine tune-up could eliminate most exhaust pollution.

Instead, the government should be encouraging private sector initiatives like marketing an electric car or ensuring that government targets aimed at eliminating carbon pollutants. In this type of area regulation and enforcement, market forces work best. For example, it was regulation that produced better engines, cleaner fuels and less auto pollution, not higher taxes on gasoline.

Higher taxes on fuels, by taking money away from consumers, could in fact cause pollution if fewer new and cleaner cars are bought. Gas taxes are simply a means of raising revenues. If the government thinks it is resolving environmental problems associated with automobile emissions with this increased tax, it has not done its homework. If its object is simply to raise revenues, it is deceptive to tell the public to say it is doing so in the guise of the environment. Without the label of the environment the imposition of this additional tax would be much less acceptable to the public. Furthermore, we have an excellent example where the Liberals, when in government, imposed a tax in the guise of the environment and misled the public into thinking that the moneys raised were being used to find environmental solutions to the scrap tire dilemma.

As of June 1, 1989, the Liberal government implemented a tire tax of $5 per tire on all new tires sold; provincial sales tax and the GST are added for an actual cost per tire of $5.75. The tire tax brings in an estimated $48 million per year. To date, the revenue raised from this tax is in excess of $100 million. However, only $17 million has been used for scrap tire projects. When the tax was imposed the government indicated the moneys would be spent on paying for research into recycling programs and the safe disposal of tires. Unfortunately, the tax is going into general revenues and has not in fact been dedicated to finding the environmental solution for recycling and management of the safe disposal of tires. When he was Leader of the Opposition, Bob Rae said, "What's dishonest about what the Liberals did is they used the environment as an excuse to raise the tax and then failed to deal with the environmental problem."

We recommend that all tire tax revenues raised to date should be placed in a trust fund to be dedicated to scrap tire management only and the government should provide a full accounting annually. If the government fails to dedicate the tire tax to pursuing an environmental solution and fails to place the moneys already raised into a trust fund with full accountability, we would strongly urge that this tax be discontinued.

In our pre-budget consultation with the Treasurer we strongly urged the government not to increase the gas tax or place a conservation tax on the motorist. It is totally unreasonable that motorists should be confronted with an increased burden, especially when a car cannot be considered a luxury but an essential and primary component of the transportation system and a mainstay of the economy.

The considerable increases in federal and provincial gasoline taxes of recent years have had very little impact on consumption primarily as a result of the essential nature of the automobile. A recent survey indicates a tax-weary public is no longer willing to accept them. Further, increasing gasoline taxes only compound the difficulties faced by businesses in competing with their American counterparts. We indicated that recognition of the vital role of the automobile necessarily rules out the imposition of those punitive taxes on auto use.

The burden of increased gas taxes came at a time when the recession we are experiencing is being felt by all sectors of the economy and is affecting employment opportunities for many. In addition, the government will implement an amended gas guzzler tax to take effect August 1, 1991.

The Treasurer's recent change to the gas guzzler tax from the tax as originally proposed appears to be designed to simply raise revenues. Whereas the original tax would have applied to about 10% of all new vehicles in Ontario, a $75 tax will be applied to any car that consumes between 6 and 8.9 litres per 100 kilometres, which includes 90 per cent of cars sold in Ontario. Most smaller cars, including the Honda Civic, Toyota Tercel, Chevrolet Cavalier, Plymouth Laser and Ford Festiva, fit into this category.

Though the amendments to this are seen by the Canadian Auto Workers as much less damaging to the bottom line of the auto industry in terms of how it would skewer the sales of certain models, the government has failed to understand the environmental problem, if the intent of this tax was to reinforce an environmental message.

We feel the appropriate way to conserve fuel and ultimately protect the environment is not to impose a tax on consumers when they purchase a vehicle, but to regulate fuel efficiency standards that must be met over a period of time by the car manufacturers. The trap of market-based solutions to environmental problems is that they raise revenues and give governments more money to spend but do not solve the environmental problems.

In the CAA Ontario submission to the Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation, the following statistics were presented: 94% of all personal travel in Ontario is done by road; it is estimated that Ontario drivers travel about 71 billion kilometres every year; virtually all trips made by other modes—plane, train, marine—are intermodal, involving some use of the road system.

Road maintenance and construction should have been given a higher priority. A significant capital commitment that will increase road capacity and improve declining arteries is absolutely critical. In order to undertake this task, there must be a workable funding mechanism which will not penalize any particular group of users. The present method of funding roads is both unfair and ineffective.

It is unfair in that users pay a far greater amount in taxes than is spent on our roads and highways. It is ineffective in that the road system is deteriorating despite these excessive taxes. A new funding mechanism must be established that distributes the cost of improvements to the system equitably among those who benefit.

For the 1990-91 year, the Ontario government collected $2.7 billion in revenues from direct vehicle user taxes—fuel, licences, permits—and $1.3 billion in revenues from sales tax for new and used vehicles and parts. The Ontario government will spend $1.8 billion in road expenditures.

Truck traffic is responsible for an enormous amount of wear and tear to the surfaces of our highways throughout the province. One large truck can cause more damage to road surfaces than 29,000 cars. We encouraged the government to examine the contribution that the trucking industry is making through the province's taxation policy to the construction and maintenance of our roadway infrastructure.

Better public transit is necessary. But it is only a part of the programs and it is far too simplistic to suggest that transit alone can reduce congestion. In most Ontario cities, the principal form of public transit—the bus—travels on crowded arterial roads. Even commuter rail lines, which rely on roads as a passenger feeder system, are negatively impacted by plugged roads. There must be a balanced approach between public transit and the use of the automobile which continues to be the most favoured choice of people to transport themselves to and from work and for shopping, recreational and social activities.

Innovative steps to reduce gasoline taxes would help sustain and increase the positive impacts of the motor vehicle on our economy. These long-awaited measures would also reflect the first vital steps to tax reform. This would, in turn, send clear and positive signals to the marketplace that would lead to further economic wellbeing. We believe strongly in the principle that gasoline taxes should be allocated to road building and reconstruction.

Another tax we feel would be absolutely inappropriate to impose would be road tolls. In the spring of 1990, federal government suggested the implementation of roads to help raise $13 billion over the next 10 years to upgrade the national highway system. We feel this is totally unjustified as they collect $4.5 billion annually in gasoline taxes in Canada. At the same time, they spend nothing on roads in Ontario.

We strongly urged the federal government to use the money for the upgrading program and stated that it could set aside this tax money in less than five years without putting in road tolls. This punishes motorists by making them pay twice for the same commodity, in this case, the road. If road tolls were implemented, as the major user group, motorists would have paid for this road by the gasoline taxes and, further, by road tolls. To consider such a tax would be unjust. We strongly urged the Treasurer to consider implementing toll roads.

The hub of our tourist industry has been and will continue to be automobile travel. Canada's primary foreign tourist market is the United States and the primary means of transport to our country is the private automobile. Over the quarters of all Americans who visit Canada arrive by car. Virtually 100% of all travellers use our roads and highway system during their visits.

The federal policy for the development of Canadian tourism potential, Tourism on the Threshold, states that two thirds of our international receipts are derived from American visitors who stay one or more nights. It states that in 1988 Canada's market share of outbound US tourists hit an all-time low. Furthermore, it states that the US market is by far our largest and even modest growth there means huge income gains for the industry. It also states that an improved highway system would be worth $1 billion to $17 billion to users in time saved.

The national highway policy study for the Canadian steering committee's report on phase 2 also recognized the importance of an improved roadway system for tourism and stated: "An improved national highway system would likely attract increased foreign, mainly American, tourists to travel in Canada. As well, some Canadian who might otherwise travel in the United States could be prompted to increase their travel in Canada. The impacts of increased tourism to the hospital industry could be substantial."

Not upgrading and improving Canada's roads is one of the major deterrents to Americans who would otherwise drive to Canada as tourists. Statistics Canada reported that in 1989, the first year after free trade, Canadians made 10 million visits by car to the US, an 18% jump over the previous year. However, our American neighbours did not have the same enthusiasm about visiting Canada. Their auto visits declined by 4%, or approximately one million. This is simply an extension of the downward trend seen since 1987, just as the United States dollar premium entered into a steep decline. In terms of Canadian dollars, this made purchases in the United States significant er-priced with each successive year, as reported in the Travel-Log by Statistics Canada.

In fact, during 1989 there were close to 25 million more Canadian auto visits to the US than American visits to Canada. If automobile travel is the hub of tourism in Canada, it follows that gasoline is a necessary commodity that plays a critical role in tourism.

Statistics Canada reports that the relationship between the prices of gasoline in Canada and the United States in the late 1980s was significant. In 1979, Canadian gas was actually cheaper. By 1989, the price gap was the widest of the decade. Canadian consumers paid 49.8 cents per litre of gas in 1989 compared to just 31.3 cents in the United States.

The Canadian auto traveller thus had a pressing reason to cross the border in 1989. Assuming an average fill-up for gasoline in Canada was $20, the same volume of gasoline was costing only $12.57 in Canadian dollars in the United States.

When gas prices have been significantly higher in Canada than in the US, Canadians have had a powerful incentive to travel in the United States and Americans have had good reason not to travel in Canada. Today Canada is in a bad place as a foreign tourist destination for Americans, and Mexico and overseas destinations, yet the federal and Ontario governments continue to practise fiscal policies that punish motorists for using an essential commodity—gasoline. Over the last few years, the disparity between Canadian and American gasoline prices has continued to grow, fuelled by our higher taxes. The solution is to reduce gasoline taxation to an equitable level which recognizes that in Canada transportation is not a luxury but a necessity that stimulates Canada's $22-billion tourist industry.

The Chair: We have time for one question per party beginning with the New Democratic Party.

Mr B. Ward: Part of our efforts in this budget to battle the recession included a number of capital work projects, primarily focusing on one aspect, road construction, as we talked about in previous presentations. During these tough times, would your organization support the initiative to rebuild our infrastructure? As you mentioned the importance of roads have in our transportation links and system, is your organization supportive of this initiative during these tough times?

Ms Newell: Absolutely.

Mr Kwinter: I read your submission with interest and noticed there was one glaring omission. You made no comment on the whole issue of cross-border shopping and the relationship of the increase of gasoline taxes, which means higher gasoline prices. Do you have any comments on that?

Ms Newell: Certainly, as far as we are concerned, cross-border shopping is being driven by such a thing as the disparity between the gasoline prices as one issue, as I mentioned in here. It is nothing for people to drive across the border. In Hamilton, the community I come from, the statistics are coming out showing that perhaps it is much harder hit than we even begin to realize, with people thinking nothing of travelling over to the United States and filling up there because it is so much cheaper, given the gas tax difference, and doing their additional shopping as well. We feel that the fiscal policy, where we are continually raising gas taxes as a means of raising revenues, is hurting shopping and causing people to go across the border.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this morning.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presentation is by Penny Bethke, president of the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario.

Ms Bethke: I would like to thank the committee for the opportunity to talk today about the needs of Ontarians for the kind of affordable housing co-operatives can provide.

The Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario was formed four years ago to represent the interests of housing co-operatives at the provincial level. Our organization is composed of the 12 resource groups that develop co-operatives across the province, the seven co-operative housing federations that operate in various communities across the province and a staff association that is formed in Toronto at present.

There are several things in our brief I would like to draw your attention to. We were very pleased with the kinds of initiatives taken in the Treasurer's budget this year, and in particular I want to highlight three things.

The first is the new initiative for a 10,000-unit program for non-profit housing. This is the first new provincial housing initiative since the announcement of the Homes Now program in the 1988-89 budget. In addition, the government looked at ensuring that the target of 30,000 units established in the Homes Now program would be achieved in two ways. First of all, it extended the deadline for the commitment of those projects from 31 March of this year until 30 September. That would enable those projects that perhaps were having difficulty with their municipal approvals to meet the deadline of the program. In addition, for those projects that could not make even a 30 September deadline, those units were reallocated to other projects that could go ahead in that time frame.

Second, we would like to draw your attention to the fact that the increase of 39% in the budget of the Ministry of Housing, from $549 million to $764 million, is to accommodate the beginning of the payout of the subsidy requirements that have come as a result of the Homes Now commitments that started a couple of years ago. Generally speaking, while you may announce the units in a budget this year, you will not see an eventual impact on the provincial housing budget until subsequent years. In addition, over time, because the government subsidies draw from these programs and this bridge subsidy is repaid to the government by non-profit co-operatives, there is a way of reducing the cost over time.

We are also looking at a situation in the current recession where the production of 20,000 units of non-profit housing will represent close to 30% of all the new housing starts in Ontario. This is a unique position for us to be in, but certainly reflects the current significant impact of the recession in the housing market.

Third, the 1991-92 provincial budget provided a specific mechanism whereby the financial gains from the sale of provincial lands would be dedicated directly to the purchase of other housing sites. Previously, the proceeds from such sales or leases went into general revenues that might have gone for dealing with issues related to road construction and other infrastructure spending, but we are pleased to see that the proceeds of these sales will now more be directly applicable to affordable housing sites.

We have seen that there have been significant public benefits from these 1991 budget decisions by the extension of the Homes Now deadline, the reallocation of units and the announcement of 10,000 new units. We believe this will go a long way to dealing with the problem of renters who are paying more than 30% of their income on rent. The statistics coming out of a report the Co-operative Housing Association did jointly this year with the Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association showed that nearly a third of all Ontario renters are paying more than 30% of their income on rent, and that across Ontario we have more than 100,000 households on waiting lists for one of the various forms of non-profit housing.

The other important public benefit of the announcement of 10,000 additional new, non-profit housing units is that they will create approximately 22,000 jobs in construction and housing-related industries. As I as the executive director of the Labour Council Development Foundation am aware, currently there is an extremely high unemployment rate in the construction trades and this kind of initiative is very timely. Also, by investment in non-profit housing, there is a long-term public asset created that will continue to provide affordable housing at cost to Ontarians over time.

We believe the government will save money over time that it might have had to spend in areas such as social services and health care by dealing with people's housing problems, so that the problems of the homeless and of people exacerbated by inadequate or unaffordable housing will not result in an impact on other parts of the provincial budget.

The other important feature of these kinds of initiatives in non-profit housing, and particularly in housing co-operatives, is the supportive communities that are built across the province. We have a strong track record in communities all over Ontario, and this track record has been validated by a recent evaluation, by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp, of the benefits of co-operative housing across the country.

Of course the timing of such initiatives is extremely important. Taking a major initiative in housing during a recession period has meant that the government has been able to take advantage of the fact that land and construction costs have been reduced during this recession. As well, lower interest rates have reduced the eventual cost to government of subsidizing the creation of this housing. The ministry also has recently taken an initiative to centralize the borrowing requirements of non-profit housing projects across the province, and this too has resulted in cost-benefit savings.

delivery network that has taken 20 years to build across the province, so we have experienced developers of non-profit housing who can go on working with the architects and representatives of the construction industry to build homes for Ontarians.

As I mentioned earlier, CHAO and the Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association completed a report this spring that concluded that 27,000 units of additional rental housing are needed immediately to raise Ontario's vacancy rate to 3%, and an additional 14,000 to 16,000 rental units will be required annually for the next 20 years to meet the needs of a growing population and changing demographic trends. The largest part of that growth is expected to take place during the next 10 years, gradually declining as we proceed into the next century. While some of our future rental housing requirements will be provided by the private sector, increasingly market forces will erode the financial viability of such housing production. The government's completion of the Homes Now program and the commitment of 10,000 additional units in this budget represent solid progress in the right direction.

If we are going to be able to respond successfully to the backlog of need as well as the future housing requirements of a rapidly changing housing market and population, new ways of developing housing will need to be found and new delivery structures built. The Ontario non-profit co-op housing sector is participating actively in the consultation initiated by the release of the Ministry of Housing's green paper, A Housing Framework for Ontario.

Our new but quickly maturing third sector in housing is extremely innovative. As part of its submission, CHAO will be proposing ways of reducing the supply subsidy costs for new, non-profit housing by lowering the cost with innovative mortgage instruments, such as the index-link mortgage program we use at our federal level, purchasing land at an earlier point in the development cycle when it is cheaper and generally creating a stronger co-op sector infrastructure that will allow us to operate more efficiently and more effectively.

We believe the significant expansion of the overall percentage of rental housing stock supplied by non-profit housing is inevitable. The task will be ongoing and will require the commitment of substantial amounts of public assistance. Currently the alternative is only inaction. Unfortunately, neglect is also a very costly option. In addition to the obvious human costs that can be witnessed daily in Ontario's overburdened food banks, the high price of indifference is already too evident in the human suffering that is resulting in the increased need for social assistance and medical care, and is straining other areas of the provincial budget.

The rewards for meeting the challenge are great. Non-profit housing permanently creates a stock of affordable housing. It strengthens communities and, in the case of co-operatives, offers direct control over shelter to a portion of the population that cannot afford private ownership.

The Chair: Thank you. We have approximately 15 minutes per party, beginning with the Progressive Conservative Party. Mr Stockwell.

Finally, by continuing to take major initiatives in the field of non-profit housing, the government is supporting a

Mr Stockwell: No questions.

The Chair: Now we will move to the New Democratic Party.

Mr Sutherland: I guess I just wanted to know what of direct impact you think this is going to have on the social service agencies in the upcoming year.

Ms Bethke: That is very difficult to quantify. We have to look at what kind of research could substantiate the kinds of benefits, because all we have is what is generally referred to as anecdotal evidence. We know of situations where families move into housing co-operatives and are put in a position where a member of the family is able to enter the workforce or is able to return to the workforce because of the kind of confidence he or she has built through volunteer involvement in the housing co-operative, or as he has learned, the fact that there might be day care available in the community. Those are the kinds of stories I hear all the time, but it is not a quantifiable thing.

Mr Sutherland: Would you suspect, though, that if people are living in co-op housing or non-profit housing units and their rent has been reduced to less than 30% of their income, these people generally being low-income people, other money is not likely to be saved but is going to be spent? Their money is going to stay in the economy and is going to be circulating through the economy?

Ms Bethke: I would turn the argument around. You hear people, I am sure, coming to you from the food banks and from the social service agencies who will tell you that if they could resolve the housing problem people face, they would not be seeing them at a food bank because they would have enough money left out of their disposable income to spend on food. I am not even talking about the other economic impacts; I am talking about basic needs that would be met. The same is true for social service agencies. It is a consistent theme that we in the non-profit housing sector have been hearing over the past few years, that if we could address people's problems with the affordability of their housing, much else would be resolved: family strains that result from money problems, a number of issues.

Mr Sutherland: And they are likely to spend that money in their local community, because these are not the needs of people who are doing the cross-border shopping, is that right?

Ms Bethke: I do not know that I would go that far, but I am just assuredly, low- and moderate-income people do their shopping closer to their home. I think there have been statistics about that kind of thing before.

Mr Jamison: We are here today and we are hearing from very specific groups about specific issues and interests. I would like to come back to the budget itself and how it has affected you and your organization. How significant will the amount of money that was put forward in the co-op housing area be in effecting the type of change you feel is needed in the province to provide housing at an affordable price to people? In conjunction with that question, how important do you feel that investment is at this point, during a recessionary period?

Ms Bethke: There are two things, from our point of view, and I will go back to the statistics I quoted earlier. In The State of Housing in Ontario report that we did this spring, we identified that there was a backlog of need of 27,000 units. The government's current initiatives with the 10,000 units and the Homes Now units and the federal-provincial cost-shared program should go a long way to addressing the backlog. In addition, given the growth in population we expect to see, in particular in the next decade in Ontario, we will need 14,000 to 16,000 new rental units every year just to deal with that growth. So if the government is able over time to increase its commitment to a 20,000 unit per year production level for non-profit housing, that will go a long way to addressing that need for new rental housing in the province, because as we have indicated, we feel that we probably will be the key providers of new rental housing forms.

Housing is an expensive commodity to build and finance, and we use the same financial institutions and the same builders that someone building private sector rental housing does, and there is a reason no new private sector rental housing is being built. It is too expensive to build. You cannot rent it for what it costs to build. It has to be subsidized in some fashion. Given that particular situation, I do not see any other vehicle that makes sense to the government but the investment in a long-term public asset that would justify the commitment of substantial government resources at this time.

The other issue you talked about was the recession, and again, a recession creates a certain dynamic in the market that we have seen. Suddenly, land prices have fallen, for the first time in four to five years. My own organization has been offered development opportunities in communities where we could never have hoped to build non-profit housing before because we would never have been able to afford the land, or the builder who had control of the land would have been more prepared to build a condominium than he would have been prepared to build a non-profit housing project. Since condominiums are a very soft market right now, we are, as they say, the only game in town.

So we have seen a reduction in land costs; we have seen significant reduction in construction costs. My own staff were telling me about doing the tendering for the concrete foundation work for a project that was larger than a project we did 18 months ago, and the tenders have come in substantially below what we had 18 months ago. So the costs of construction are in fact being reduced somewhat during this recessionary period.

At the moment, we also have some of the lowest interest rates we have seen in the last five years. That reduces the cost both of building the housing and subsidizing the housing, which is a major concern, obviously, of the government. All of those things make this a very critical time for the government to make an intervention. They will never get more bang for their buck than they will now.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Jamison. The Liberal Party.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for the brief. With the budget I think there has been a lot of focus on the deficit, but it is much more than the deficit. I think many people are concerned that the revenue side of the budget for now and in the future is in some jeopardy and the economic wellbeing of the province is in some jeopardy. Others say this is a great budget for the future of the province.

I think what is going to really impact your organization is not this budget, but it is going to be the future of the economy, in two respects. One is that the demand for your services will increase if the economy does not pick up, and second, the ability to fund your projects will drop. I am interested in your organization's comments about the economic impact of this budget on the next few years. Do you think it is the right budget that will ensure your future, or are there some suggestions for improvement?

Ms Bethke: We are Ontario taxpayers too, so these are concerns we all share, and we recognize that it is important to look at the long-term future of the delivery of non-profit housing. We do not want to see a massive program for a few years where the tap would be turned off in a few years' time as the costs of the program escalate, and it is why we have been putting our collective energies to finding innovative solutions.

We know that financing these programs is one of the most expensive aspects of the program, and anything that can be done to reduce the financing costs of the program would be very helpful to the long-term future. This is why, at the federal level six years ago, we convinced the federal government to create a new mortgage instrument, an index-link mortgage that would be an inflation-sensitive instrument that might eliminate the inflation-risk premium that forms a portion of the interest rates we were paying when we borrowed money. We have, in fact, demonstrated with the government that the index-link mortgage for the federal co-operative housing program is a less expensive method for it to finance our programs than the previous type of conventional financing it was using. And they have continued that, so that is one area where we feel that, over time, we can find a way to reduce the cost to the government.

As well, we think that creating a significant stock of non-profit and co-operative housing across the province can only strengthen the co-operative and non-profit sectors.

Mr Phillips: My question was, as you look at the budget for the future of the economy of Ontario, are you saying this is the right budget that will strengthen the economy of Ontario?

Ms Bethke: Yes, we believe so. The interesting thing about building non-profit housing is that it has some significant immediate results in terms of job creation. It offers long-term benefits in terms of creating a stock of affordable housing that will, we feel, ultimately reduce the demand on the government to provide services in other areas where it cannot expect to recoup some of its initial investment by having a stock of affordable housing and by having a program that pays back some of the subsidy dollars the government has given it over the years.

Mr Phillips: The reason I raise it is that I think only time will tell on the budget, and I am anxious to have people's opinion because I think we may be here a year from now, two years from now, probably talking with you again.

Ms Bethke: Certainly. Presently the Ministry of Housing represents about one and a half per cent of total provincial budget. That is a very small portion of resources of the government going into our area, but I feel we could have a critical impact on other areas such as social services and health.

The Chair: Mr Stockwell, I will allow your question. The format for the last two and a half days has been that the parties in rotation take their time in that rotation and not waive it, but I will allow your question.

Mr Stockwell: Okay, thanks. I did not realize that is not really a question. I am following up on a question that was asked by the previous member. In any studies I have seen, it seems that the co-operative housing operation tends to build units at two to three times more cost than the private sector would build them. We have seen a few studies that indicated you are grossly over costs on a lot of your projects, and the shortfall is obviously picked up by the government, through mortgages, etc.

Whether or not it is a good budget, it seems to me that we are sucking money out of the economy to pay for inflated housing costs, and it would seem to me that it would be better leaving it in the private sector, allowing them to build the co-operatives on their own for considerably less than what you would do it for, and then it will be less money or less taxes.

Ms Bethke: I am not sure if you understand how our program works. We can only build a housing unit up to a budget limit that is called a maximum unit price. As an example, in Metro Toronto it means we have to build a three-bedroom town house for under $170,000. If the private sector is building three-bedroom town houses for under $100,000, I would be happy to find out how they are able to do it, but our costs are well below what the private sector would be producing, and in fact all of our units are built by private sector builders.

Mr Stockwell: I understand that. Maybe I have mistaken you for a different group. You are the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario.

Ms Bethke: Yes, and I must say that municipal non-profits and private non-profits work under exactly the same rules. There is a budgetary limit.

Mr Stockwell: What about a two-bedroom in Toronto or a one-bedroom apartment?

Mr Bethke: I guess the amounts would be closer to $120,000 to $130,000 a unit, so if anybody in the private sector is managing to beat that price, we would be happy to work with them to find out how they are managing to do it but those are the budget limits.

Mr Stockwell: But I see them selling now for thousands of dollars, and there is profit built in.

Ms Bethke: In Metropolitan Toronto?

Mr Stockwell: Well, GTA.

Ms Bethke: There are different budget guidelines on the side of Metro Toronto in the GTA.

Mr Stockwell: So you are suggesting that you are very competitive in the costs of construction and in the project unit costs themselves.

Ms Bethke: Absolutely, and the private sector builds units.

Mr Stockwell: On a tendered basis.

Ms Bethke: On a tendered basis.

Mr Stockwell: I have not seen that. Have you done studies to show that your construction costs in developing these projects are competitive with the private sector's? I have read all your briefs—

Ms Bethke: We have to operate within limits that are evidently less than what the private sector is doing. I can only conclude, since there is not a lot of new construction of private rental housing being done, that they do not do it for the price that the non-profit and co-operative sectors can do it.

Mr Stockwell: Did you ever think that there is no private rental housing being done because of rent control?

Ms Bethke: Yes. They have no rent control in British Columbia, and they have no major new rental housing construction.

Mr Stockwell: I am talking about Ontario.

Ms Bethke: And I am talking about an economic environment and an economy that could conceivably be supporting the construction of new rental housing. They have rent control in British Columbia, and they have no new rental construction either. Rent control is not the issue.

Mr Stockwell: So you are suggesting that if rent controls were not on, that you would still see, in those boom years, no rental housing built.

Ms Bethke: Absolutely.

Mr Stockwell: And why is that?

Ms Bethke: Because of the financing. Building of housing is an expensive thing to do, and you require some form of government subsidy to do it. The government has tried a variety of private sector initiative programs that have been demonstrated to cost the people who have to live in those projects more over time. We have done a comparison of a project that was built on Bay Street with one built at the same time in the co-operative program, and the rents in those units are higher and the government subsidies are higher.

Mr Stockwell: I guess this is a never-ending discussion. I fundamentally disagree with you, and I guess that will just be the way it is. I do not think the co-operatives are particularly inexpensive; in fact, I think they are more expensive. Any study I have seen has indicated they have cost more money than your typical private sector development. If you could show me a study saying otherwise, I would be really interested in seeing it, but frankly, in all the years that the co-operatives have been talking, I have never seen one.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this morning.

This committee is adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1143.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1341.

UNITED SENIOR CITIZENS OF ONTARIO INC

The Chair: Good afternoon. I think we can begin our hearings with the United Senior Citizens of Ontario Inc, Jane Leitch and Edith Johnston. Welcome to the committee. What we normally do is have a half-hour for each presentation. If your presentation does not take that long, we divide up the time for questions at the end.

Mrs Leitch: Thank you. We have given everyone a copy of our presentation, which will be relatively short. We are hoping for a lot of response and questions.

I am Jane Leitch, president of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario Inc, and my associate is Edith Johnston, treasurer of the organization. We represent approximately 300,000 seniors from across the province, some of them in organizations and clubs and some as individuals.

We thank you for the opportunity of meeting with this panel and making our presentation today. Seniors are very concerned about some of the issues in the proposed budget, and today we would like to address three of them that we have chosen as our priorities.

The first one is financial. The cut in income tax for people on lower incomes is certainly to be commended, but seniors on fixed incomes continue to fall farther behind. It is often said that seniors today are better off than they ever were. These are the ones you see out in the community. The others cannot afford to be there. Over 40% of the seniors in this province receive less than Statistics Canada's declared poverty line, and the shocking part is that 77% of that group are single, elderly women. The maximum assistance at present is $891.88 a month, or $10,702.56 a year for a single person. It is extremely difficult to live on that amount, especially with the high cost of housing and the lack of affordable housing. Many of our seniors are really struggling to survive. We feel that you must address that issue.

As are all consumers, we are uncertain about the future of health care in Ontario. Although billions of dollars are allotted to provide needed services, much of that money is now being spent on surveys and advisory committees, and the results seldom lead to productive legislation. I myself have sat on a couple of committees that have met and spent a lot of money, and nothing has happened a year and a half later. Certainly we feel that is a lot of wasted money that could be put into health care.

Dental care for the elderly has been neglected too long. The cost of dentures or needed dental care should not add to but should, we feel, prevent deterioration in other, more expensive health areas. The United Senior Citizens of Ontario Inc is on record as supporting the recommendations of the Hicks committee on dental care. This report states that, according to available fiscal and human resources and manpower, dental treatment for the elderly should be provided on the following order of priority: Gains-A recipients; guaranteed income supplement recipients; seniors with income equivalent to the GIS plus 15%; and finally all seniors who are registered with OHIP.

What happened to this report? It has been out since February 1989, and we would like to see some action. Some of these people in homes are a desperate state. We support the planned reform for long-term care. However, we need action now. The projected plan is up until 1996-97. That is too long for seniors to wait; some of us may not make it.

One of the resolutions in our convention is the need for consumers to be aware of the costs of their health care. It is suggested that everyone, most importantly seniors, should receive a printout in detail of these costs once a year. This week we heard a proposal for making use of our health cards for this information. It is hoped that the government will follow up on this. We think it could save money if many people realized how much is being spent for them. It would also act as a cross-reference to make sure all these services are really being provided.

Although the budget speaks of funds being provided to improve transportation, there has been no special attention to the needs of northern Ontario. The people up there are in serious trouble with all the cutbacks. Many older adults require trips to urban areas for health and other services and are often required to stay in hotels overnight because there is no means of transportation for them to get back that day. This results in a financial burden and often neglect of health because they have to depend on neighbours or friends and they will just let their health deteriorate as they try to remain independent. We feel if there were some form of transportation it would alleviate a lot of the isolation and things that happen in the north.

Your government supports the idea of seniors' independence and the concept of remaining in their own homes. This is only possible if they have access to services and do not become isolated. We would respectfully submit that school buses could be modified at very little cost so that during the day they could be used to transport seniors to appointments and social events. We understand that about 200 new buses are put into the system every year. Why could they not be modified before they were put in? We urge you to act on this as soon as possible.

We would now like to respond to questions.

The Chair: We have approximately eight minutes per party, beginning with the New Democratic Party.

Mr Sutherland: Interesting, your submission focusing in on dentures. The staff in my constituency office certainly wholeheartedly support you in that and feel that if we could somehow get dentures for many people, they would have a lot less work to do. That seems to be their greatest trouble when trying to help constituents in my riding.

I am just wondering if you have any sense of what the numbers are of seniors who need dentures but cannot get them.

Mrs Leitch: We do not have it across the province. In Simcoe county they did a survey which showed that more than 50% of the people in nursing homes need and do not have access to dental care. Many of them, we feel, would necessarily be in those homes if they could remain able to eat regular food and have some self-dignity. A lot of people are isolating themselves and becoming health hazards because of the lack of dental care.

Mr Sutherland: I was wondering if you had any general recommendations, besides the buses and what you are talking about modifying the school buses, for improvements in transportation for seniors.

Mrs Leitch: Do you want to make any comment on this, Edith?

Mrs Johnston: I would say that two years ago transportation was not the important issue within the seniors movement that it is today. One of the reasons it has become an issue now is that there have been so many problems with transportation, but also, I guess, because there are probably more and more seniors wanting to live in rural areas and needing transportation. This is for shopping as well as visiting relatives, and the biggest complaint that I have from seniors is that they cannot go a distance and come back that day. They cannot get up at 8 o'clock in the morning and get on the bus at 9 o'clock and come back at 9 o'clock that night after a visit. Particularly for health reasons, if they are going to the nearest big town for some kind of treatment or for a visit with a specialist, they are not going to do that if it means booking into a motel and staying in a motel.

Of course, the other issue that came up with transportation was the high cost of insurance, which meant that a lot of seniors who were helping to drive seniors around were not able to take out the insurance. So transportation and issues surrounding transportation have really become big issues within the seniors movement.

Mr Sutherland: I forgot to ask this morning of the topic of housing people, but I was just wondering what the status is there, given that people are on fixed incomes, the housing situation for seniors.

Mrs Leitch: We need more, that is for sure. There is not affordable housing. One of the statistics that is shocking to us is that many of our seniors are living on food banks because they are having to pay for the high cost of housing and they have little money left to eat on. In fact, I am talking to the director of the food banks in Metro Toronto, and 100,000 applied for help. That is a shocking statistic, that seniors must live on food banks, basically because of the high cost of housing.

Mrs Johnston: One of the things we really, really have to keep in mind about the housing situation is that no matter how elderly seniors get, if they can afford housing, they can stay in their own housing and have some services come in. But there is a tendency, if they can afford housing, that as they grow older and become a bit frailer they end up in institutions, which we really have to try to stay away from.

Ms M. Ward: I certainly agree with you on your point about housing, and your other points also. I find that in my riding I have a very large number of seniors, and about two thirds of the entire population there lives in rental accommodation. One of the most disturbing situations is when you meet someone who is living in constant fear that he is not going to be able to afford his accommodation. I know a number of people like that, particularly widows who are living on pensions, and not just widows, but couples also. They have been there for a number of years and they do not want to rock the boat.

I have a couple of buildings in my riding right now where people are being asked for increases which are not going to be approved—I am quite certain you are aware of the rent control legislation. They are being asked for 15% and 20% rent increases and asked to sign the lease with that, and of course it will go to rent review. People are afraid they are going to be evicted and they do not want to rock the boat, particularly women alone. I think you would probably concur that with seniors there is a predominance of women.

Mrs Leitch: Yes, 77%.

Ms M. Ward: I notice when I visit nursing homes, that it is—well, 77%. I was going to say three quarters.

I wanted to speak about the transportation system too. Is the northern health travel grant of benefit there?

Mrs Leitch: That just applies to mileage.

Ms M. Ward: Not accommodation to stay over.

Mrs Leitch: There is assistance for mileage within 200 kilometres, or now they have dropped it to 100 kilometres, with the need for doctors' appointments and so on, but that is only for mileage.

Ms M. Ward: I see.

Mrs Leitch: If they have to stay overnight or all those other expenses—

Ms M. Ward: They are on their own for the cost.

Mrs Leitch: They are on their own.

Ms M. Ward: I know that in my riding, which covers two municipalities, there are fortunately service agencies that run transportation to doctors and so on, but people have to book that beforehand. I suspect that the supply of that service is probably very uneven across the province, is it?

Mrs Leitch: Very much so. It is also curb to curb in most cases, and a lot of people cannot get to the curb.

Mrs Johnston: You talked a little bit in the beginning about income and what seniors can afford. We in the USCO attend a lot of conferences and conventions where naturally the seniors are in the minority, although they are supposed to be the ones who are making the decisions. It is other people, business people, who are talking about housing or health care, whatever it is. We really have to keep stressing the fact that the senior who is visible is not the senior we have to look after. There is now becoming this statement that is being made at all these conferences, "The senior of tomorrow is going to be so much better educated, is going to be so much better off." You get off on that talk and you begin to forget that there are all these invisible seniors who are not well off, and due to medical research they are going to be living longer and are going to be more frail. We really have to keep that uppermost in our minds, taking care of those people.

Ms M. Ward: As to your organization, where you say you have 1,300 clubs, your comments reminded me of something I was thinking of when you started your brief, the immigrant seniors. They are often very isolated.

Mrs Leitch: There are a lot of immigrant clubs that belong to our group. They tend to stay within their own circle of friends, but they join the USCO as a club. Each member joins individually.

Ms M. Ward: There are probably a lot out there who do not belong to clubs.

Mrs Leitch: There are a lot. We have a lot of individual members, but there is no doubt we are missing a lot of the ethnic population, although with anything we do, every senior in Ontario gains the benefit of it.

Ms M. Ward: Keep up your good work.

Mrs Leitch: We are working on behalf of all of them, whether they belong to us or not.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate your thoughtful brief. I am interested in your comments on one of the ones you mentioned, the long-term care reform. I have a big interest in it myself. My interpretation of where it stands now is that the previous government announced its plans and then the new government studied it for about eight months, and essentially it kind of reintroduced the same plan that was there before but it has taken eight or nine months of looking at it. That is my own interpretation. You people are very knowledgeable in this area. I would be interested in your comments on the proposals and any thoughts you would have for the committee.

Mrs Leitch: When the Liberal government first came in it brought in A New Agenda, which was quite a few years ago. It was discussed and rediscussed, and there were consultations and we made sure our members were at every consultation all across Canada. Then the minister responsible for senior citizens' affairs changed and A New Agenda was shelved. A couple of years later the Liberals came out with the new Strategies for Change for long-term care.

Mr Phillips: Right.

Mrs Leitch: I have been on an advisory committee. We spent a lot of time talking about it. I do not know how productive it was. They were supposed to have gone to consultation a year ago in the fall and the committee has been on hold for a long time. Now they have brought out another redirection for long-term care and I understand there is another one coming out this summer.

We are just confused. We have been surveyed to death. We have been consulted to death. We do not think all that money needs to go out on all those papers and all those consultations. We would like to get on with it and do something. What is really frightening is that they hired all these service access workers a year and a half ago and they are paying them and they have not been given direction yet. They are to get to know their neighbourhood. How long is that going to take?

Mr Phillips: That is my understanding. There are 14 offices around the province.

Mrs Leitch: Sure; 14 offices but 140 other support workers for those offices.

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Mrs Leitch: This is a lot of money.

Mr Phillips: The long-term care reform that you support is what?

Mrs Leitch: We think it needs changing. We think a lot of money has been spent foolishly. It might not cost more money if it were reorganized and if we knew how much it cost. That is our point about wanting to know how much it costs the government on our behalf. We think we as seniors do not always use the money wisely either, but we do not necessarily know what we are doing. We do not get any—how much is being spent on our behalf? Let me rephrase that.

Mr Phillips: Strike that from the record.

Mr B. Ward: Or what you meant was—

Mr Phillips: It must be a misprint.

Mrs Johnston: I guess the point we are stressing here is the money that is spent on these surveys and advisory committees and papers and papers. Really and truly at the last three or four conferences or conventions that I have been to seniors have got up at the PA system and have said this so many times over: "Let's stop. Let's start doing this. Let's put long-term care into action without all this other expense." It is time now.

Mr Kwinter: From your remarks I get the impression that the number one issue as far as financial viability for seniors is concerned is housing. Is that your problem?

Mrs Leitch: Probably it is most important. We put it first because everything hinges on it. On the amount of services provided, the new theory is to keep people in their own homes, but the services have to be there for people to remain in their own homes. We think a lot of people are inappropriately put in health care institutions when, if the services were provided—it all ties in with finances.

Mrs Johnston: It certainly all ties in.

Mrs Leitch: Yes, but there is more than that. There is the social isolation that is going on. That is happening.

Mr Kwinter: When you talk about these invisible seniors, can you just tell me a little bit more about why they are invisible?

Mrs Leitch: Because they cannot afford to buy the clothes to go out socially. They do not have dentures. They feel inferior. They are becoming second-class citizens. They are not that visible majority that we see, that everybody says is doing fine. They are people who probably had little education, had little opportunity to save any money of their own. A lot of them are women whose husbands' pensions, if they ever had them, died with them.

Mrs Johnston: There are people who have been at the poverty level for probably a long time, and probably as a younger woman or a woman in her 50s who was not able to get back into the labour force at a decent wage, and then goes into retirement with a lower pension, no Canada pension or a very little one. Through being poor and living at the poverty level, they lose their self-esteem, their energy, their ambition to want to be different. They just get stuck put somewhere and really they do stay invisible. Even though there might be a seniors' club down the road that could be going to, they are stuck in front of a TV or drinking their tea. There are an awful lot of them in society today, but because they are invisible, we are always thinking about them.

Mr Kwinter: I assume a high proportion of them are men.

Mrs Leitch: About 77% of the people on subsidy are older women.

Mr Kwinter: What proportion of all seniors are invisible?

Mrs Leitch: Forty per cent are living on or below Statistics Canada's poverty line. It is frightening, is it not?

Mrs Johnston: The media itself portrays the senior travels, the senior grandma and grandpa who have the phone to phone long-distance and all this. We get locked into thinking that this is what life is about, that is what is going on out there, and it is not.

Mrs Leitch: Many of them cannot afford telephones and cannot afford newspapers and they do not get them because they just cannot afford the cost. It is important to eat.

Mrs Johnston: That whole thing comes too from what they could afford before they were a senior. They went through the Depression when long-distance telephone calls were right out of the question. They are still thinking that, even in retirement, even if they were able to make the odd long-distance call. They do not, which really tends to isolate them even more. They are not able to get out to be influenced by other seniors. Maybe we are not able to do research and the outreach to them where we are always reaching them. They are the hardest people to reach.

Mr Runciman: I may be characterizing your recommendations unfairly, but it seems to me that most of what you suggesting here is going to cost taxpayers additional dollars.

Mrs Leitch: Not necessarily.

Mr Runciman: I agree with you in the sense that you've talked about dental care, and there may be some offsetting savings, but you cannot put a number on those and then can I.

One of the major concerns about the budget of the present government is the fact that we are running in the neighbourhood of a $10-billion deficit. I guess I would like to know your views and the views of your organization with respect to areas where perhaps this government and future governments can address the concerns of your organization with respect to the people who are living below the poverty line currently, but there are many seniors and others in society who are benefiting from government, if you will, who are not in need of government assistance. I know that in my own community my dad refuses, for example, to accept benefits from the Ontario drug benefit plan because he has an income where he does not feel he should. He has friends who are in a much better financial position than he is who take advantage of the Ontario drug benefit plan.

We could look at OHIP as well, and the universality of OHIP, where people who are the other 60% of seniors, many in society, who are benefiting from so-called free medicine, free health care in this province. You are concerned about the future viability of health care, as I am and as many people are. I am wondering about your views on universality, if you have any views about the idea of a deductible in health care, for example, like any other insurance policy, those kinds of things that can bring some fiscal sanity back to the health care system.

I believe the way we are going now, if we do not take a look at those kinds of options, which are perhaps not politically attractive but bullets that have to be bitten at some point in the future—I believe it would be very helpful if your organization took a look at them and passed judgement on them as well.

Mrs Johnston: You look at dental care. If all those seniors had good dental care and they were able to eat properly, they probably would not have some of the health problems they have, where the money goes to dental care and is saved in other areas of health care. That is just one little comment I have. I am sure you have something else. I have some other things to say too.

Mrs Leitch: I think on one of the things you alluded to, the high cost of living and the high taxes, the GST and so on, a lot of seniors come from a generation of people who sort of looked after themselves, and we feel that running into a high deficit is putting the government's hands into the pockets of our grandchildren. We are very concerned about that. We feel the government spends a lot of money doing things that are less productive. As we said some of these meetings and advisory committees and so on, if it were spent on some of the services, it would not be any more money; it would be redirected money. We do not think the things we are asking for need new money. We are asking for there to be a better look at the money there is.

Mr Runciman: I appreciate that and I agree with you that there is a lot of waste in government in delivery of programs, etc. I guess in terms of the bigger picture, the question of universality, for example, is one that I think it would be helpful to this government, and other political parties as well, to have your views on and how you feel it can address—the health care budget represents a third of the provincial budget and it is growing.

Mrs Leitch: Right. We know that.

Mrs Johnston: We have to retain universality. There has to be a way that we retain universality. There probably are different things we can be doing, and I think we can start being more careful of how money is spent. Also, I do not know where you would draw the line as to who can afford it and who cannot, and where government is going to make the decision as to one person being eligible for something and another person not being eligible. I am sure that in retaining universality, we have to assume that our people who are well off to pay for something, pay for it. They do not always want to indicate that they are paupers and have to be using services free.

Mr Runciman: The reality is it does not work that way.

Mrs Leitch: You referred to dental care. We gave you some priorities there that we agree with. The people who need it worst should certainly be looked after first.

Mr Runciman: But your ultimate priority is universality.

Mrs Leitch: The USCO stand is the ultimate. We feel it makes second-class citizens of those who cannot afford it.

Mr Runciman: My only comment is that I think your views and the views of others in society would be perhaps increasingly helpful to all political parties if you took a look at some of the tougher questions with respect to getting a handle on costs for government, rather than the idea of additional dollars.

I was listening to a radio show the other day where a gal was talking about introducing a new sport to Canada, and the interviewer said, "What kind of chance of success do you think you are going to have in getting this widely accepted across Canada as a new and popular sport?" She said, "It depends on how much money the governments are going to give me to promote it." That seems to be a growing illness in this country, I believe, where people look to government for virtually everything to assist them, even promoting a sport.

I am not trying to be critical of your organization. I am saying that I think all of us in this society have to take a fresh look at these things, and a realistic look at what we can really afford. We are all going to suffer in the long run.

Mrs Leitch: We certainly do not want to be a gimme society. We do not want to be asking for things that are not our share, but when we hear that there are all these many people on food banks, seniors living on food banks, and there are people in institutions who have no dental care so they have to remain there because they cannot look after themselves and eat and keep up their health, then we have to speak out on their behalf.

Mr Runciman: But I think you can be helpful by speaking out in the sense of saying: "Sure, I think all of us are concerned about those matters, but how can we fund that? How can we make sure that those people are adequately addressed?" rather than, for example, very wealthy people in society getting free drugs.

Mrs Leitch: Our organization is an organization of volunteers. All of them are volunteers. Throughout the many years that USCO has been around, we have never accepted any kind of government funding for our programs. However, we realize that times change. Times are changing, and we in USCO are changing our thoughts about how we have to do things and we are looking now at the fact that in the future we are going to have to find the ways and means of doing a little bit more research into some of these things and quite likely in the future we are going into a little bit more on how the government is spending the money and what kind of funding there is out there and who should be looked after and whatever. But in the meantime, user fees are not part of our program. We do not want to see user fees. We want to keep universality. Non-universality in a health care system creates a system for the rich and a system for the poor, and the United States is a very good example of that.

Mr Runciman: We could debate this one all day.

Mrs Leitch: We said many years ago, when the age security was going to come in at—was it $40 a month?—that the country could not afford it, and then I am sure they told Tommy Douglas we could not afford medicare. We have been able to afford it, and we are going to have to keep on trying to afford it.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon. Our time for your presentation is up.

Mrs Leitch: Thank you very much. We hope that you will consider some of our suggestions. You are all going to be seniors. We look forward to some positive results from you.

The Chair: What I am hoping for is a little bit of equity in this.

Mrs Johnston: I would like to tell you that, besides being treasurer of USCO, I am the editor of our newsletter, and I know that our New Democratic Party does get our newsletter. I just wonder if the Liberals and the Tories might each like to have a copy of our newsletter.

Mrs Leitch: And I do have a few copies of our brochure if anyone would like to pick those up. These are the copies that have been presented by USCO.

ONTARIO HOTEL AND MOTEL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association, Diane Karabinos, executive director.

Ms Karabinos: It is Karabinos.

The Chair: I am a little out of practice. I usually do a little better than that.

Ms Karabinos: It is all right. I have always waited until I hear how it is pronounced. It has been fun. I have two boys in baseball, and sometimes to hear the sport announcer say what they did to those names made for good jokes.

Mr Stockwell: You should see how they are pronouncing Mulroney these days.

Ms Karabinos: I believe it.

The Chair: Then you probably would have appreciated the first day of school with all of the teachers trying to figure out all of the kids' names and how they are pronounced.

Ms Karabinos: Very much so.

I must apologize. I know you all have a brief, and there is a scratched-out item in there. As I was preparing it, I put a couple of thoughts down that I was going to expand on, but after reviewing the number of pages, and knowing how much time you have to sit here, I decided not to add them to my presentation.

I would like to first of all thank you very much for giving me the opportunity of addressing our industry's feelings and concerns about the recent budget, but also would like to tell you a little bit about our organization.

The Ontario Hotel and Motel Association is a trade organization which represents over 1,200 members who own and operate large and small businesses in the hospitality industry. These industries are hotels, motels, taverns, restaurants, resorts and lodges throughout the province.

association membership employs over 45,000 people, the numbers increase during holidays and special seasons. We recognize the importance of working together in the tourism industry and join our efforts with our colleagues under the umbrella of Tourism Ontario to help improve this industry.

Although the announcement was made after the budget, we were very pleased and excited when Peter North, Minister of Tourism and Recreation, announced the commitment and establishment of the Ontario Tourism Education Council. This will provide opportunities in our industry through job apprenticeship, national certification standards, training and education and the promotion of vitality awareness.

We were disappointed, however, that tourism was not mentioned or supported in the recent budget. Tourism means jobs and revenue. Ontario tourism operators are burdened with taxes: fuel, airport, transportation, property and land. Compound those with the GST, PST and the Ontario land tax, plus other proposed taxes on our industry, and it makes tourist operations a nightmare of paperwork.

Hundreds of tourism and hospitality businesses, both large and small, have been brought to their knees by this recession, wiping out countless millions of dollars in personal and family investments while crippling the entrepreneurship which has sustained development and growth in the industry. In the recession of 1982, the small business sector was helped. In this recession, one that is deeper and longer than most people dreamed—and it is not over yet—small business person has become a non-entity. It must be remembered that not only are employees people, but employers are people too.

Our industry has traditionally provided meaningful and productive employment and steady incomes for hundreds of thousands of Ontarians, and particularly for women, youth, aboriginal peoples, new Canadians and visible minorities, in greater numbers than in any other sector or industry in our province. Many of them and their dependents are now suffering the hardship of permanent or indefinite layoffs and reduced available work opportunities. There must be a recognition of the vital economic importance of the Ontario tourism and hospitality industry to the economy of the province.

We find that Canadian consumers are going to the US for goods because of price differences. The cross-border shopping greatly affects the hospitality industry as well. This is causing economic pain and in some cases bankruptcies for domestic retailers in border communities in Ontario. Canadian shoppers, in order to benefit from the short-hour visit, are opting to stay in US hotels and motels so that they can bring additional goods back across the border. The occupancy on weekends of border cities' accommodation properties is down everywhere. This means that hotels are losing money, retailers are losing business, jobs are decreasing and the government's tax revenue is diminishing, and it would appear that our tax policies are self-defeating. When people continue to shop across the border, it becomes a part of their routine, part of their life. Routines are difficult to break. We are people, but we are creatures of habit. How long before we convince them again to shop Canadian and utilize our own resources?

Sunday shopping, mandatory service training, minimum wage increase, off-premise sales, pay equity, wage protection, sin tax, employee health tax, environmental and waste regulations, workers' compensation, directors liability—where will this all end? Business has long been recognized as the major creator of new jobs. Business, by its very nature, is innovative and creates new products and advanced technology which can be exported worldwide.

If the government continues to apply more legislation, taxes and restrictions on the employer, it soon will not matter if the employment standards are not met or the employees are being paid a good wage, because there will not be any reason to have employees. Retail, manufacturing and hospitality operations, large and small, are closing their doors already at alarming rates.

I conducted a survey, and I will not go into specifics, since you have them there, but even though it was an 11% response, we felt it was quite substantial, because when you are conducting surveys, 3% is a good number to receive back. But the overall feeling was that everybody is hurting. Business is down, employees had to be laid off, and it is not just for one reason. We recognize it is for many reasons.

I would just like to take this opportunity to highlight some of the requests and recommendations that were collectively made with Tourism Ontario's submission that we would like to remind the government to reconsider. The Ontario government should:

- maintain student wages and the tip differential in wages for wait staff;

- eliminate the exemption of the current provincial sales tax on prepared food purchases under $4—this would net the Treasury an approximate additional $140,000 per year;

- eliminate the discriminatory provincial gallonage tax on beverage alcohol purchased by licensees, which will enable them to competitively price and merchandise spirits, beer and wine with food and significantly increase provincial tax revenues;

- enhance industry sales of taxable food and beverage by harmonizing the collection of provincial sales tax applied to prepared food and beverage alcohol at 8%—you may or may not be aware the alcohol is at 10% now and the food is at 8%;

- freeze the provincial sales tax rate applied to accommodation at 5%;

- eliminate the application of the commercial concentration tax on large hotels and associated parking areas and large buildings in the greater Toronto area;

- reduce the unfair employer health tax rate for tourism and hospitality enterprises to a flat 0.5% of gross payroll regardless of their size;

- eliminate the application of the employer health tax on taxable benefits and allowances in our industry;

- collect the employer health tax from all persons who are self-employed or compensated through unincorporated proprietorships;

- reinvest all provincial tax revenues collected annually from provincial fuel taxes, drivers' licences and vehicle purchase, rent and repair taxes, levies and surcharges into the improvement, repair and expansion of provincial and municipal roads.

The hospitality industry today is faced with many obstacles and increased operating costs and restricting legislation. In order to remain competitive and recapture some of the lost business from our neighbours to the south, we must have the ability to compete on a level playing field. We ask the Ontario government to please reconsider our recommendations, as we strongly feel that these recommendations, if approved, will help the economy of Ontario and therefore the people.

I would be happy to answer some questions.

The Chair: We have about four minutes per party, beginning with the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr Sutherland: Is it not the Liberals' turn to start?

The Chair: Right, it is the Liberals. Sorry.

Mr Kwinter: I just want some explanation for one of your recommendations. The second one reads, "Eliminate the exemption of the current provincial sales tax on prepared food purchases under $4—this would net the Treasury an additional $140,000 per year." What is the rationale behind that?

Ms Karabinos: To be honest, I think we were trying to work out—we are looking at lowering the taxes on alcohol and alcoholic beverages. We realize that the government, in order to offset or lose revenue in one area, will need to look at revenue in another area. We felt that by choosing prepared fast food we are not discriminating against the people who cannot afford to pay the taxes, because we know people who frequent fast-food operations come from all walks of life, and this was one of the reasons we had recommended that. The figures that were looked into I believe were estimated, and we looked at basically a sales projection forecast and what it does. I am afraid I could not give you specifically how that figure came up.

Mr Kwinter: The reason I ask the question is that, with all due respect, $140,000 is a rounding figure in nearly any ministry. I mean, it is statistically insignificant, it means nothing. Why you would sort of upset one whole sector of a whole part of the hospitality industry for so little gain just seems to be strange that that would be something you would be advocating.

Ms Karabinos: I apologize then. I do not mean to upset any sector in particular. There are some that are our members as well. It is the inequities that are coming, that one type of establishment does not have to pay provincial sales tax where another establishment does. You walk into a tavern or a bar and order something and you are taxed to the hilt. This is more of our reasoning. We realize you cannot lower the gallonage tax, so to speak. We were trying to come up with some fair way of compromising.

Mr Phillips: The minimum wage is going to $8.50, I think, over the next three years. Has your industry done any impact analysis in terms of whether that would have any impact on the number of jobs in the field?

Ms Karabinos: Yes, definitely. We have done it in our own association; the Ontario Restaurant Association also has done it. In the survey, as we stated, we asked different questions on the increase of costs. Verbally, doing a question across the province, the general feeling without accurate statistics is that they just could not afford to hire any future people; they would probably have to lay off people because the money is not there in a service in the hospitality industry. There is not a great profit margin and it is very heavily serviced with people. This is an industry where people are our resource. They are the best allies we have, but the overhead cost—in our industry we cannot put up computer equipment to take the place of people because it is service, and these escalating costs will result in having to cut back. They just cannot.

One of the strongest points was made when we did the initial survey, when they were talking about increasing wages for students. It was almost unanimous that if we had to pay students the same wages as we would be paying adults, then unfortunately the adults would get the nod for employment over the students because they felt that the adults would be—I do not want to say better qualified nor educated, but they would have more experience, be more reliable and responsive.

Mr Phillips: If your industry has any numbers on the jobs, I think the committee would be interested because when it does go to $8.50, we are always interested in the job implications of that.

Mr Runciman: I do not have any difficulty with the recommendations you are making here. I would like to ask you, though, about the liquor laws in the province. I wonder, in terms of your industry, if you find them too restrictive; if any liberalization of liquor laws would be of assistance to you as well as the measures you have recommended here. I am wondering what impact that would have on.

Ms Karabinos: Definitely, to put it in one simple word. Our liquor laws do restrict our members many times in making a living, and the laws laid down now in addition to the taxes are just compounding them in trying to stay alive in the business. They are finding it very difficult to cope with it.

Mr Runciman: I am going back to the Conservative government when Robert Elgie cancelled happy hours. I live on the border and I see what is transpiring over on the other side of the St Lawrence River in respect to Alexandria Bay, for example, a major tourist area along the St Lawrence River. They not only have happy hours, they have what they call power hours over there where they give away beverages for a given period of time. There is some question about what is appropriate in terms of drinking and driving and all of those other societal questions but it certainly gives the people on this side of the border another handicap in respect to being competitive. Coming from a traditionally Conservative riding, over the years my views have changed where I think that perhaps we are just simply being too darned restrictive in respect to our liquor laws.

Ms Karabinos: I agree with you. I feel we are being too restrictive. We have to bear in mind that the operators establishments that sell the liquor and wine are professional in their jobs. They serve it responsibly. They are the promoters of serving alcohol responsibly. We were one of the first industries to bring in serving alcohol with care. We realize we have an obligation to the community. It is not being it very difficult—the cost of everything, the elimination of happy hour, the perception that people cannot have a good time, that they have a drink—is really hurting our industry quite a bit. We hope that will change in the future.

Mr Stockwell: Frankly, I think the season is a write-off. At the end of the season you are going to have more businesses going out of business after they find out the numbers this summer have been so disastrous. Have you interim numbers as to how much business is off? I know where I operate in Midland it is just a ghost town, really a ghost town. We are not doing any American business. I think the outcry again this summer is just going to be unbelievable. I am just curious to see if you have any statistics.

Ms Karabinos: We do not have actual statistics because people out there are too busy staying alive. I agree with you. I was in Sarnia and I was devastated when I saw closed shops. Sometimes you went down to some of the American towns where the windows were all boarded up and it was like a ghost town. When I see that happening in my own province and in my own country it scares me. The people will not say they have gone under until we go to contact them to renew their membership. They just say they have not survived, they have given up.

Mr Stockwell: So you do not have any interim numbers on bankruptcies or just, "I'm closing up and I'm going home."

Ms Karabinos: I could probably get that for you.

Mr Stockwell: You have been through two recessions, one in the early 1980s and now this. The early 1980s recession was bad. I do not think it was as bad as this one. I think they have doubled the ante on this one. Maybe you can make a quick comment on all the new taxes you are faced with as an employer, the fear of the way the minimum wage is rising to just an unbelievable amount, especially in the service industries. You will lay people off before you have to be able to pay that kind of money. Is that basically the concern you are hearing? It is the recession, yes, it is terrible, we go through recessions, but it is the added increase in taxes that your industry has been hit with and the uncompetitive nature of your industry today.

Ms Karabinos: Yes, it definitely is the legislation that has been put down on them, the increase in taxes, the lack of business, the lack of tourists coming into the province, the lack of spending power for the residents in the area, whether southern Ontario or northern Ontario. It really has impacted them.

I had my own business two years ago, and I often think if I were in my business today I would have been one of those who would have folded my doors. It was a service business. I was working seven days a week. Sometimes it was like 24 hours or 36 hours a day, but quite a long time, in order to afford to pay somebody, and at that time it was just over minimum wage. Today, with the health taxes and everything else, there is just no way I could have done it.

Mr Sutherland: I guess from the comments you have just made, you would not have been supportive of, say, an extra $3 billion to $4 billion in revenue collected in taxes.

Ms Karabinos: You will have to clarify that. In what way?

Mr Sutherland: Assuming those taxes would probably come from the normal traditional areas that are taxed and maybe a few others, you would not be supportive of that.

Ms Karabinos: I think you are putting me on the hot seat a little bit in that respect. Let me just put it this way, I do not think any good citizen is against taxes collected as long as they are used in the proper way, as long as they are collected with people in mind. You have to leave some money behind so people can spend the money, generate further business and generate further jobs. If we get taxed too much, that is just not going to happen.

Mr Sutherland: I was just wondering, because I am reading this document we had put before us. It is the report of the budget review by the official opposition. On page 5 it says, "The Liberal approach, which we call on the NDP to implement immediately, was embodied in the phrase 'pay as you go' by the former Treasurer." I am trying to figure out, if we paid as we go along, if we were paying right now, that would have meant that if they were in power they probably would have had anywhere from an extra $4 billion to $5 billion in tax increases this year to have a balanced budget. I was just getting your comments on that.

Mr Stockwell: Have you ever heard the term "quantum leap?"

Ms Karabinos: I am non-partisan. I am not answering that one.

Mr Stockwell: Fair enough.

Mr B. Ward: One quick question. We have to look, during these tough times, at all government programs and expenditures. There is one program run through our Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology, through the Ontario Development Corp, called the tourism redevelopment incentive program, TRIP. I am sure you are familiar with it.

Ms Karabinos: I am afraid I am not. I am sorry.

Mr B. Ward: It is a loan guarantee program for hotels, motel owners, tourist-type industries that want to expand but cannot obtain at a favourable interest rate a loan to complete their renovations. I can relate directly. This is not all doom and gloom. I was at a sod-turning ceremony probably for one of your members, the Brant Park Inn in Brantford, for a $700,000 renovation expansion program, and $500,000 of that was guaranteed through TRIP. That is one aspect of the government benefiting your membership indirectly or directly. We all have to look at government programs, and if we cut, where do we cut? I am surprised you were not familiar with this program.

Ms Karabinos: I was not familiar with the name, but I am aware of the program.

Mr B. Ward: Is your industry supportive of that type of program? I think it is of great benefit. In fact, the owner of the complex said there is no way their renovation and expansion could have gone through without this loan guarantee from the government.

Ms Karabinos: That is correct, and we recognize that the government has done many things and has created many programs. I guess what I am saying is that the suggestions we are making will help everybody, no matter if they know where to apply for this program or whether they would qualify for the program. Some of these suggestions will help generate business and employment.

Mr B. Ward: I think you are saying let's work together, get over these tough times so your industry can survive and we can all prosper in the future. We are here to gain your views on the budget and how the economy perhaps is going to look in the future, and we very much appreciate that.

Ms Karabinos: Definitely, but as I say, I do not know what the answer is, and I would certainly never want to sit in any of your seats, because I know it is a difficult decision. I also know that our members and the proprietors out there with the businesses, be it retail businesses, Sunday shopping, the hotel or motel large or small, are suffering. We cannot keep pointing fingers at the GST. It is not that. It is the fault of all of us. It is my fault as well as theirs as well as yours. We all have to do it, but we also have to take that first step. We have to start looking at cutting back so we can be competitive with our neighbours to the south.

Mr B. Ward: Okay, so is that perhaps one program we should be cutting back?

Ms Karabinos: I think we have to look at—

Mr B. Ward: Because if we did, then that expansion would not have gone through.

Ms Karabinos: No, excuse me, but I do not think that is the answer. That is not what I am proposing and that is not what our recommendation is, because that is one property. I think those kinds of incentives are needed, but I think we also need incentives for everybody. We need to promote tourism to this province. There is another area where more money could be spent on promoting tourism, recognize that tourism is a valuable part of this whole province and the economy. I looked in the budget book and I saw the graph made up, and the service industry represents, I believe, 67% of the wage earners, and manufacturing 22%. Yet so much focus is put to the manufacturing and their wages, and it really is the service sector we have to concentrate on, because that is the future and we are the—

Mr B. Ward: Good, I appreciate that.

The Chair: Thank you for your views and your presentation this afternoon.

SMOKERS' FREEDOM SOCIETY

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Smokers' Freedom Society, Phil Gillies, president.

Mr Gillies: It is an unusual experience for me to be on this side of the table, but it is none the less good to be here. I thank you very much for the opportunity of making a presentation on behalf of our society this afternoon.

We want to thank you for the opportunity of making a brief presentation with regard to the budget brought down recently by the Treasurer. Our society has a number of specific concerns with regard to ever-increasing tax on tobacco products and also with a budget reference to a so-called provincial tobacco control policy.

Let me say at the outset that having served two terms in this Legislature, I know hearings of this nature can turn into a roast of the minister of the day. With that in mind, I do want to indicate to members that while I am not a great fan of this budget, I am indeed a fan of the Treasurer. Mr. Laughren is one of the hardest-working and best-motivated individuals whom I had the pleasure of serving with in this House. The Treasurer and the next government assumed their duties at an extremely difficult time in Canada's history. We can only hope that their stewardship of the provincial economy at this time will prove to be of benefit to most Ontarians. None the less, I am here today because we have serious concerns with the references to tobacco products in the 1991 budget.

First of all, let me tell you a bit about us. The Smokers' Freedom Society is a national organization with over 8,000 dues-paying supporters, both smokers and non-smokers across Canada. The society was established in 1986 to support and promote responsible freedom to smoke "with respect for others." The organization believes smoking is primarily a private matter which should not be subject to discrimination or to excessive government intervention and regulation. SFS activities include information dissemination, lobbying, research, financial support in defence of smokers' rights and public advocacy.

On June 1, I became president with a mandate to considerably expand our fight across Canada against excessive taxation and other legislative and regulatory infringement on the rights of smokers.

I am sure members are all aware of the national tax protest that has been conducted recently by the manufacturers with the full support of our society. I wish to speak specifically against the budget measure which would see the provincial tax per cigarette increased by a further 1.67 cents to 6.5 cents, with an equivalent increase on cut tobacco. Bill 84, the budget bill to implement this change, now sits in Orders and Notices awaiting debate.

The ever-increasing and unfair tax burden on cigarettes and other tobacco products has reached the breaking point. These taxes are hurting our economy, they are encouraging criminal activity and they are infringing on the civil rights of millions of people.

The tobacco taxation policies of our federal and provincial governments in 1991 are counterproductive in just about every respect. The tax component of the selling price of a package of 25 cigarettes is $4.38 in Windsor, Ontario; in Detroit, just across the bridge or under the tunnel, the tax on the same package of cigarettes—Canadian cigarettes, I might add—is 74 cents. Cigarettes are cited as one of the driving motivations in our province's cross-border shopping crisis. Indeed, if you ask through a public opinion survey, you will find the two things most likely to send people across the border to shop—the two triggers, if you will—are cigarettes and gasoline.

cigarette smuggling is becoming one of the major forms of criminal activity in Ontario; it is up some 40% in the last two years. You can buy illegally imported cigarettes within three blocks of this building. Indeed, you can find them in just about every town and city in the province. You can have a carton of smuggled cigarettes delivered to your home in Toronto for a total of about $20, including delivery. For a carton of cigarettes purchased legally now the price range would be from about $43 to $50. Small wonder that thousands of otherwise law-abiding citizens are now buying the illegal product.

News reports in recent weeks indicate that organized crime is moving into this lucrative field of criminal activity. We will soon be dealing not with small-time smugglers peddling cigarettes across the Niagara River in kayaks and on wagons but rather with heavily armed professional criminals. Law enforcement agencies, the OPP included, are now expressing a concern that the pipelines being used for smuggling cigarettes are easily adaptable to the smuggling of illegal drugs and other kinds of contraband.

Corner stores are becoming increasingly unsafe places to work as robberies increase. The usual targets are cash registers and of course cigarettes. Many stores have now been burgled repeatedly. They are having to install steel cabinets and safes to lock up their tobacco products at night, another expense for small shopkeepers who are already struggling on the face of a recessed economy. At present prices, one dealer told me recently, you might as well have a rack of gold bullion behind the counter.

Punitive taxes and resulting lost sales are costing Ontario jobs—jobs for farmers, jobs for distributors and jobs for unionized workers in the tobacco manufacturing industry which still has a number of manufacturing facilities in the province. According to Statistics Canada, members of the committee know, tax increases have been cited as the single most important contributor to recent increases in the consumer price index.

Total federal and provincial taxes now represent approximately 75% of the purchase cost of a package of cigarettes. Our position is that this is regressive taxation. It places a disproportionate burden on lower-income people who cannot choose to smoke—people who may not be able to afford season tickets for professional sport, people who may not be able to afford expensive vacations, but ordinary people who may take the simple pleasure in having a cigarette.

I might add that the over two million people in Ontario who cannot choose to smoke simply are not going to take it any more. We know that the mood among smokers in the province, for the most part, is one of ever-mounting anger. This has been reflected in the national tax protest which has been going on for several months now.

Each and every member of the Legislature is, I am sure, hearing from your constituents that they are fed up with these record levels of taxation, both provincial and federal. Your constituents who smoke are paying more than their fair share of the total tax burden. We would like to say, as the present campaign being run by the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers' Council says, "Tell the government that smokers count too!" We urge you to speak against and vote against Bill 84, the budget bill to amend the Tobacco Tax Act.

I am all too aware of how easy it is to vote for increases in tobacco taxes, even if you may be opposing other tax increases. But in this year, a year of unemployment, a year of plant closures, tax revolts and triple deficits, I would ask members to ask themselves these questions:

Is this the time to once again force up the price of a widely used consumer product the retail price of which is already made up of 26% product, marketing and distribution costs and 74% tax?

Is this the time to send many more thousands of Ontarians across the border to the United States to shop for cigarettes which are approximately one third the cost they are here? These same consumers are usually buying other goods while on these trips, goods that Canadian retailers would like to be selling them.

Is this the time to encourage the growth of a major new profit centre for criminals? By encouraging Ontarians to purchase inexpensive, illegally smuggled cigarettes, are governments creating a new era akin to Prohibition?

The Treasurer believes that tobacco consumption will decline as a result of the new tax increases. I ask you again to ask yourselves, will tobacco use really decline or will smuggling and cross-border purchasing simply increase?

Indeed, it is interesting, I point out to members, that while the sales of domestic cigarettes are down slightly since the latest round of tax increases, the sales of cigarettes for export—these are Canadian cigarettes produced here and then exported into the United States—the production of that product is up 40% over last year. We know from our surveys that Americans do not smoke Canadian cigarettes, so that huge increase is simply Canadians who are buying from across the border to avoid the taxes.

This is the year, members, to say no to tax increases, including the tobacco tax increase. In the 1990 election campaign, many Ontarians voted against high-tax policies. How refreshing it would be to find that many of our legislators are prepared to keep their word.

There is one other item in the budget which I would like to touch on briefly. On page 19 of the budget document, the Treasurer tells us that the Minister of Health will be announcing details of the provincial tobacco control strategy. As you can well imagine, Smokers' Freedom will be watching keenly to see exactly what is included in this control policy. While we do not wish to rely unduly on rumour at this stage, rest assured that we will be in touch with you again when the details of this policy become known.

We hope the government is not contemplating measures such as generic packaging and restricted distribution through government outlets, an LCBO for cigarettes, if you will. In the present economic climate, removing tobacco products from the shelves of private businesses would spell a death sentence for hundreds of corner stores across the province. It would also be a horrible inconvenience, we believe, for the smoking public.

We want to assure the government that the views of Ontario's two million smokers will be forcefully put on any such measures. We do not want a war over tobacco policies and we hope the government does not either, but if unreasonable measures are forced on the province, then there could well be a war.

In the next while, Smokers' Freedom will be taking a number of measures to strenuously represent the interests of the 6.4 million people in Canada who choose to smoke.

1. It is our intention to move our national headquarters from Montreal to Toronto. We will be opening our new headquarters here effective September 1. By the end of the year we will also have an office open in western Canada.

2. We will be marshalling human and other resources to: commence lobbying of all three levels of government; gather and disseminate information on behalf of our supporters; engage in media relations, promotions, advertising, demonstrations and grass-roots organization in many of your constituencies.

3. This fall, we will see a large-scale membership drive in Ontario, commencing in Metropolitan Toronto. We are now hearing from people in your communities and I am sure we will be hearing from many, many more.

The day when we were able to continue to unfairly overtax the smoking public without being answerable to smokers is over.

Many thanks for giving us the opportunity of appearing before you today. I would be pleased to try to respond to any questions you might have.

The Chair: We have approximately four minutes per party, commencing with the New Democratic Party.

Mr Jamison: Welcome. I thought your presentation very interesting. I think it reflects some of the things that are going on today.

As you may well know, and I am sure you do, I represent a tobacco-growing riding, and my question to you really is on the effects on that community specifically, the growers of tobacco. It seems that all governments have taken the direction to try to reduce smoking by whatever means. Usually it is by whatever means, and that is of course reflected in the tax area quite a bit. I know that you have been in consultation with people from the Norfolk-Oxford-Elgin area where tobacco is grown. Possibly you could let us know what kinds of effects the level of taxation has had there.

Mr Gillies: Mr Jamison, you are quite right. The effect on the farming community in Haldimand, Norfolk and Oxford, throughout southwestern Ontario, is very, very serious. As you represent a tobacco riding and my former riding, Mr Ward's present riding, borders on a tobacco belt, we were well aware of the devastating effects that declining purchases of Canadian tobacco were having. Many farmers, as you know, were forced to leave the field. Many of them lost their farms, there were bankruptcies, and so on. Governments tried, with I think fairly limited success, both federally and provincially, to provide incentives and programs to shift tobacco farms into other types of farming. The problem is that the soil conditions, which are very good for growing tobacco, are not good for a lot of other crops. There have been experiments with growing peanuts; there have been experiments with growing soybeans and some other things. It is simply, frankly, not profitable enough for many of these farmers to convert and able to make a good living.

The other concern I think we have to have is much further we go in terms of tax increases in terms of smoking control policies and so on before the Canadian manufacturers or their parent foreign companies—because often the parent companies are foreign—say, "To live with it," and either cease production in Canada or purchase Canadian-grown tobacco. Then we are left with the worst of both worlds, I would suggest, where remaining farmers could be forced out of business and the market would be filled with tobacco being imported from the United States.

I think it is a very serious situation. Despite some very meaning federal and provincial policies to try to convert tobacco growers to other crops, I really think for the most part those programs are doomed to failure. There is no other crop that will grow in that kind of sandy loam soil that would be profitable in the same respect as tobacco.

Your constituents who are presently growing, the ones who have survived, I think you would agree, Mr Jamison, are doing all right now. They are doing better than they were doing five or six years ago when there were many more farms. But I think the future could be pretty bleak for tobacco unless some of these trends are arrested.

The Chair: One minute, Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: Obviously you are well aware of the situation and you understand how government operates and you understand that taxing of tobacco was something that went on when you were here and as part of the government. How do you reconcile your new role—and I realize that you are the advocate for this group—based on what we had last week from the Canadian Cancer Society where there is still a great deal of concern out there? How would you reconcile them in terms of public policymaking to deal with that issue and find the resources, since health care takes up one third of the budget, to deal with the impact of tobacco?

Mr Gillies: First of all, you are quite right; this is a new problem. It is one we faced when I was here and I dare say it is one that you will face for many years to come in terms of various government programs aimed at restricting smoking vis-à-vis the taxation. There are a couple of things, though, that we should remember.

Federal and provincial taxes now on cigarette production account for $7 billion annually in taxes. I think there was a day when what we call the social cost argument may have been valid, that the aggregate taxes on tobacco production were needed to cover what were perceived as the health and social costs related to smoking. The numbers just do not add up any more at all.

We have seen a number of studies, one done by a former assistant deputy minister of Health and Welfare Canada. There are no numbers around, that I have seen anywhere, which would indicate that the health-related costs, if you accept that all the categories of ailments the cancer society, for example, would say are associated with smoking, are not saying I necessarily accept all of them, but if you do accept them—the most you could possibly account for in Canada would be probably $700 to $800 million s to the system. You are talking $7 billion in taxes. We initiated another study, which I hope will be finished by the fall, to try to get some more up-to-date and accurate statistics on that, but it simply does not add up. The costs associated with smoking, by no estimate that I have ever seen, come close to approximating $7 billion. They are not far off.

Mr Sutherland: If I can just ask one point, does that include lost days of work and things like that? I am just wondering how you got that figure, because it seems low. Is it the $700 million to $800 million.

Mr Gillies: Yes. Actually, when I saw it—I am referring to the Laframboise study—frankly, it seemed a little low to me. Just so I can quote it to you, for a pack-a-day smoker in Ontario, the taxes amount to approximately $598 a year. By his calculations, the health-related costs add total $200.75 per year per smoker. So you see there is a considerable gap there. He went so far—and I might add I am quoting here, I would not go so far as the former Minister of Health and Welfare did when he said that “if you follow the health cost logic, in fact smokers are subsidizing the health care system for non-smokers.”

The Chair: Thank you. It is time for the Liberal Party. Mrs Sullivan.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in what you had to say about the underground economy. Knowing that about $1 billion of provincial revenue comes in each year through the tobacco tax, and the new tax is anticipated to bring in additional moneys with the declining consumption, what do you estimate the size of the underground economy at to be, consequently, lost revenue for the province?

Mr Gillies: There are number of estimates, but I will refer to one here which I think is quite reasonable. This is actually, I think, pretty low. This particular document came out in the early spring, and again, we are talking about, for the most part, Canadian cigarettes which are manufactured here, are exported without the tax and then are being smuggled back in. It is our own product being smuggled back in. The estimates are that type of smuggling is up 10% over last year. A very low estimate is that the illegal cigarette trade in Quebec alone—so we have a population slightly smaller than Ontario—accounted for about $116 million in lost revenue last year to that particular province.

Mrs Sullivan: Lost tax revenue.

Mr Gillies: Now, there are other estimates I have seen that are as high as $350 million. I guess it becomes a question of diminishing returns. If, by the province's own estimates, the new increase this year would bring in something shy of $350 million, considerably shy of that, by raising the tobacco tax again, are you just driving that many more people to buy the illegal product? Are you in fact just encouraging tax avoidance, as opposed to collecting that much additional revenue? I think it is open to question as to whether, by further increasing, the province is going to collect any more revenue on cigarettes than it does at the present level.

Mrs Sullivan: Does any of this smuggled product carry the tax-paid band?

Mr Gillies: No, very little of it does. What happens is it is legally exported into states which have a lot of Canadian visitors; not just the border states I might add. You can find Canadian cigarettes all over Florida too and, I believe, in California. They just go down there.

Ontario taxes and federal taxes account for 74% of the purchase price of a pack bought here, so you can well imagine that they are sold much cheaper in the United States, maybe $14 or $15 a carton. So it is good business. It is good business for a smuggler to bring them back into Canada, even if he pays full retail down there. If he sells them for $20 or $25 a carton, he is laughing. It is very profitable.

If you check with some of the senior law enforcement officials of the crown, the big concern is that it started off with small smugglers. It was people bringing, you know, a couple of cases back in a secret compartment in the car, or things we were hearing about boats going across the Niagara River, that type of thing. It has gone well beyond that now to organized crime, the Mafia. I do not want to sound overly dramatic, but very heavy-duty criminal elements are getting into this. It is going to start to get nasty. We have had a number of retailers say to us lately that they think a corner store which sells tobacco products in this country is becoming a very dangerous place to work. There are robberies, there are more violent robberies, and it is causing a great deal of concern.

Mr Runciman: I think you have made some excellent points in respect to your case. I share your view that it is out of whack. I am wondering how you sell this. I know a number of points you have raised are good selling points, but to the average citizen, as you pointed out, there are about two million smokers in Ontario, so we have about seven million who do not puff. The question of this being a sin tax—we know you do not have to smoke to survive, etc—how do you deal with that?

Mr Gillies: I am glad you asked that question, because in the present climate, I can tell the honourable members, you are on the side of the angels on this one. Public attitudes, even on sin taxes, have changed dramatically.

As part of the national cigarette tax protest which has been going on, CTMC has been doing weekly polling through Canadian Facts, a research firm, and it is very consistent. The vast majority of Canadians in the present climate feel that tobacco taxes should either be left as they are or rolled back. I can give you the figures for week 7 of the campaign, so this is as of July 11.

“Statistically valid survey across the country: Should tobacco taxes be rolled back?” Forty-four per cent say yes. “Should they be left as they are?” Twenty-eight per cent say yes. “Should they be increased even more?” Only 18% say yes, and then 10% do not know.

It is actually a very small minority of Canadians, quite surprisingly, because it is a minority of Canadians now who do smoke. But the vast majority of our citizens now say enough is enough, you do not need to put those taxes up any more. If you were to vote against the tobacco tax increase in this budget, public opinion is strongly with you to do so.

Mr Sutherland: I would be interested to know if you asked them if you were going to replace the sin tax with income tax increases, whether it would still be that high.

Mr Gillies: It is a good point, but if you could also show them that by leaving the tax as it is, in fact we do not believe the province will forgo much revenue, because every time you put it up in the present climate, you are going to increase smuggling, you are going to decrease the purchase of legal product. I am not at all sure it would not just about net out.

Mr Runciman: Mr Gillies, I do not undermine your submission, because I agree with it, but I am curious, as a member, about how your organization is funded. Do manufacturers participate in the funding?

Mr Gillies: They do. Our organization has three primary sources of funding. We do get an annual grant from the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers' Council. We receive funding from the tobacco-related unions across Canada, province by province, and we receive funding from our supporters, just ordinary people across the country, of which there are presently about 8,000.

Interestingly enough, because the history of our society is that it was based in Montreal, about 60% of our dues-paid supporters are in Quebec. We are undertaking a recruitment drive and a lot of activities in English Canada to double, I would hope, that number of supporters in pretty short order.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Runciman. Thank you for your presentation, sir.

Mr Gillies: Thank you very much for your kind attention.

YORK UNIVERSITY

The Chair: Our next presentation is York University, Sheldon Levy, vice-president, institutional affairs. The process is for you to give your presentation. Whatever time is left from the half-hour will be divided equally among the three parties to ask questions.

Mr Levy: First, let me thank you for the opportunity speak with you today. There are few occasions when the university is at the top of the public agenda. The day in June when our children wait anxiously for the letter to find out if they have been admitted to their chosen program and university is one of those days, and a few years later when, as parents, we are bursting with pride when our children file across the stage to receive their degrees is another one of those days.

I really am hopeful that today is also one of those occasions. I understand the difficult position in which you find yourselves as you wrestle with the government's books and try to figure out how to do the difficult job of supporting all the claims upon the public purse.

I am hopeful, because in recent years we have only been able to grab the public agenda when you have reacted to our overflowing classes or our closed doors, but today your invitation for input from the universities means that changes facing our society and our economy need a proactive approach and that universities are considered important players in the economic wellbeing of the province as we approach the 21st century.

Because, of course, things are changing. In the universities this is reflected in the fact that over the last 30 years student attendance at universities has increased fivefold. A statistic I do not think very many people have ever thought about is that in the same period of time working attending universities have increased from 12,000 in 1961 to over 100,000 today. During this period York University was born, and it is now the third largest university in Canada with over 40,000 students.

More than half our students are women. We are proud to report that 40% of the students in our faculty of science are also women, and we are equally proud to report that 20% of York students now come from visible minorities. One third of all our students speak a mother tongue other than English and 70% of our students will be the first university graduates in their families.

This is clearly a record of increasing demand and working towards greater equity. We are obviously offering something that people need and want. If we were looking at the record of an industry, we would also expect to find over the course of the last three decades considerable resources were put into the expansion, to build new factories to hire new people, and to make sure we were producing what the market demanded.

But the truth is that at the same time as this phenomenal growth has occurred, funding for universities has increased at the rate of inflation, a fact much heralded reflecting a steady increase in the amount dedicated to post-secondary education. But when you place this steady dollars against the huge increase in enrolments, resources dedicated to handling that demand have in fact declined 40% on a per capita basis, and Ontario has achieved the unenviable distinction of near-bottom ranking among the provinces in funding per university student.

What is most interesting is that all indicators point to increasing pressure being placed on universities by public, industry and government to continue to do more, place high priority on training the scholars, leaders, managers and technological forerunners of tomorrow. Statistics Canada data show the unemployment rate of university graduates at 4% compared with 12% for those with a high school education. Business leaders are on record insisting that the economic future of Canada relies on a strong university system, and governments rely on universities to serve the social and economic priorities which require the underpinnings of education and knowledge.

We acknowledge our role and our responsibility. For research and education emanating from a strong university system are an investment in the future both for the individual and for the overall economy. Universities are willing to take on the challenge of developing a curriculum for the 1990s, and beyond that integrate technology into the way we do things. We have to provide our students with the knowledge and the tools to make our society competitive on a global scale. And we have a social mission to make higher education accessible to all who can benefit, without limiting opportunities or unjust differentiation.

he point is that the expectation and the reality simply do not add up. Demand from students, including women and minorities, is increasing, and governments are insisting that the demand be accommodated. But funding for universities is declining. There is no question that a university education is a valuable commodity and more and more emphasis is being placed on acquiring the set of skills only university education can provide. Business, government, technology all look to universities to provide ideas, training and increasingly refined students to society and the workplace, but the priority placed on the provision of a university education results in support for Ontario universities ranking near the bottom compared to the other provinces, and worse compared with the United States.

Our chief competitors in the United States have realized that a university education is essential to progress. In the United States, for example, university per capita funding has risen 35% at the same time as Ontario funding has declined the same amount in the opposite direction. And the research shows that in the United States it is recognized that this level of funding is still not enough.

It is simply not possible to offer expanded opportunities at the same time as budgets are declining and capital support is dwindling. We cannot meet our social and economic commitments when we cannot convince you to accord university education a higher priority. The inability to compete for the best faculty, the inability to utilize and develop the most recent technologies, the inability to offer the basics; books and space for learning, will all contribute to an Ontario deficit, the impact of which will be much more than just economics.

Nowhere is the lack of opportunity to be more obvious than in the greater Toronto area. Data from the Treasury, from school boards and our own analysis all point to a looming crisis. Eighty three per cent of the secondary school students will occur in the GTA. The ministry's study shows that in order to accommodate this growth, York alone would need to grow by another 16%, double the system size, by 2011. So far we have worked hard to meet our bottom line each year, even in very tough financial times. We have made major capital investments over $150 million without generating long-term debt, and we have done this while facing a funding decline of 40% per capita.

But we are suffering. We are losing the competition to attract and hire the best professors, and as the professoriate shrinks this will become a critical drain. We have had to cut down on the hands-on time we can provide students in our laboratories. We are cancelling library subscriptions to periodicals and books we just cannot afford to buy, and after working with our surrounding community to develop the kinds of relationships that are needed and beneficial, we are having to scale them down. This year we have cut budgets yet again by 2.7% to 5%. Over the next three years, we are committed to a further decline of 10%.

Sure, there are places we can save money, and we will, but the fact is that our students are not getting the level of quality in a university education that they need to achieve their goals and your priorities. If it matters to you to have your children educated by the best professors, with access to the best laboratories, studios, libraries, classrooms and ideas, we have to address priorities and funding. In the face of increasing and demonstrable demand, somehow support for universities has and continues to be a low priority for the province.

All evidence to the contrary, the perception of an elitist system which is not part of the mainstream of Ontario society still persists, and we are most perplexed by the fact that this perception appears to be held in part by those who are products of our system.

Check the facts and you will find that universities have done a remarkable job of providing educational opportunities at a very low cost to this province, and we have seen our priorities slip to last place in our country. We need you to help us move in the only direction we have left to go, to become a first-rate system that promotes opportunity for everyone.

I would be more than pleased to answer any questions you have.

The Chair: We have approximately five minutes per party and we will begin with the Liberal Party.

Mr Kwinter: I was taken with the relationship that you made to American universities, talking about their level of funding compared to ours. Is that York University compared to state-run universities as opposed to private universities?

Mr Levy: There was a report done by the Council of Ontario Universities that looked at Ontario versus state versus private. In all cases, the Ontario system fell at the bottom. If I could, I would like to give an example. We visited the University of Pittsburgh a couple of weeks ago on a joint research project. The University of Pittsburgh, coincidentally, is almost exactly the size of York University, and it is next door to Carnegie-Mellon in Pittsburgh.

The University of Pittsburgh bemoans the fact that Carnegie-Mellon is rich. The University of Pittsburgh has an operating budget of $720 million. York's operating budget for almost precisely the same number of students is about $200 million. There is a 300% difference. Now, Pittsburgh is a semi-private public, where they get private support as well as public, but the fact is that we are very far behind the States.

Mr Kwinter: The next question I have, related to that, is that you are talking about support from government. How does that relate to tuition? Also, could you comment on Queen's formula proposal and what you think of that idea?

Mr Levy: Okay, but there are two different sets of questions.

Mr Kwinter: One leads from the other.

Mr Levy: If you compare tuition rates at the private universities to Ontario, naturally they are 15-fold or 10-fold higher, so they are a lot larger, and then when you are in the public sector, the tuition fees all of a sudden become much closer to the Ontario rate, so it is a mix. It is quite dramatically different in the States between private and public.

The Queen's proposal was supported, I would say, by every one but perhaps one—I cannot even think—of the Ontario system last year, because part of it was a commensurate support by the province. It would have been funding that would come from the province and from additional fees, and at the same time a recognition that the support for students to be able to afford the larger fees would be a commensurate follow-up through OSAP or a revised OSAP.

So the Ontario system, I think, has put on record that it is, as a university system, supportive of a combined effort between students and government and ourselves to improve the financial state and the health of the universities, with a recognition of the very high importance we put on ensuring that this does not keep out students who, for reasons, could not find education affordable.

Mr Kwinter: Do you have any idea of how many Ontario students are going to the United States for their education?

Mr Levy: I do not know in volume, but I do know that there was a study done that showed that a large proportion—I do not want to quote a number because I do not have it available—of the very best students were going to the United States, because they were given offers and opportunities that no Ontario university can compete with. I cannot say to you that it is large numbers at all, but I am confident to say to you that the proportion of the best students that are heading to the States to get their education is non-trivial.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to ask you about the conclusion you have come to relating to future enrolment requirements at York from students coming from the GTA. Certainly one of the things we know about the secondary level is that the schools are in the wrong places, and that is why there is an enormous pressure in the greater Toronto area for secondary schools, but the proportion of young people in society is not, in fact, increasing that substantially. I would have thought York's attraction is not necessarily only to GTA students, that at the university level there is a high mobility among students that is not reflected at the secondary or elementary levels.

Mr Levy: There are two facts. One of them, just going by Treasury data, demonstrates very clearly that the flow of the population from Ontario to the greater Toronto area is going to increase by 2011. About 80% of York University's intake is from the greater Toronto area, so we are a very local university.

Mrs Sullivan: But does that necessarily have to stay the same?

Mr Levy: Partially the explanation is that about 40% of our enrolments are of a part-time nature, of mothers and fathers with families who are coming back to university. Opportunities for them to go to other universities is just limited, so it is either York or the University of Toronto or no university.

Mr Stockwell: A quick question: You made the comparison to the University of Pittsburgh with a $720-million annual budget and York at $200 million. Can you give us an average tuition fee for each?

Mr Levy: York's tuition is around $1,800; Pittsburgh, for in-state students, is about the same, and for out-of-state students it is much more comparable to what we call our foreign student fee, because they look at out-of-state students as essentially foreign students.

Mr Stockwell: You are saying about US$1,800.

Mr Levy: Yes. That is not like Carnegie-Mellon University which is next door. It is their state university so about comparable.

Mr Stockwell: Comparing Canadian dollars to American dollars.

Mr Levy: It is not a large difference in the two.

Mr Stockwell: When I talk to business, the last thing it asks me to do is to raise taxes. If we are going to look for a real influx of capital, money, to universities, they are going to have to get the money from someplace. Other than taxes, where do you think we should raise money?

Mr Levy: We have made a couple of suggestions, let me first say that raising taxes to provide opportunities for young people, even in these times, does not seem to me to be a bad thing to do.

Mr Stockwell: Maybe not to you, but to the business community it is not a really exciting thought.

Mr Levy: I can understand that, but they are the beneficiaries to a large extent of the products and they are the ones that are—

Mr Stockwell: I agree, but the way we are looking at business we are not going to have the beneficiaries around to take advantage of all these wonderful—

Mr Levy: I will answer your question rather than debate. We have also proposed what is available in places like Australia, which is a contingent repayment program. What that does essentially is increase the tuition, provide a loan to students that is payable through an income tax; that is, those who are the beneficiaries of the post-secondary system pay it, but they pay it through their income when they are able to afford it.

Mr Stockwell: Is this over and above what they would normally pay in income tax?

Mr Levy: That is right. It is a loan payment, and those who benefit pay it and it is commensurate with their ability to pay through the income tax system.

Mr Stockwell: What is the recovery rate?

Mr Levy: It is extremely successful.

Mr Stockwell: That sounds reasonable as long as it is extremely successful. The trouble is it is not extremely successful now, as I understand it.

Mr Levy: We do not have anything like a contingent repayment program that works through the income tax system, because it works through OSAP, and there are problems with that. But this is directly through the collection of income tax by the federal government.

Mr Stockwell: That is interesting. Anything that would raise revenues and increase your budgets without increasing taxes, I think would be somewhat interesting to review.

Mr Levy: Along with the fact that students can get loans who could not afford to go, and they pay it when they are able to afford it through the income tax system.

Mr Stockwell: Then you could raise tuition too.

Mr Levy: That would provide the revenue. We have, as, put that one on the table for consideration as well.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you for coming today. This is the first time I have some experience with, being involved with the student council at the University of Western Ontario. I know the reputation of Western towards other universities. Let me say, looking at your York Gazette, that if you are attracting students of the nature of Sasha Courville, I know and spoke at her leadership conference, you are certainly doing many things right and getting some top-notch students.

Mr Kwinter asked about people going to the United States. It is my understanding that it is, as you said, some of the brightest, but more going at the master's level, the post-doctorate level and the post-doctorate level, and that is where we are losing a lot of people to the United States.

Mr Levy: The very brightest students at all levels, at the master's and doctoral levels certainly. A lot of universities just cannot compete with what the American universities can provide.

Mr Sutherland: I thought your points were quite interesting about the funding levels. I have seen some of the support that support what you are saying in terms of the state universities receiving more funding. I do fundamentally agree that if we are going to deal with the issues of competitiveness, we need to increase funding for the post-secondary education system, both for universities and colleges. I think that goes without saying.

I wanted to ask what York is doing in the area of collaboration with some of the community colleges, and maybe somewhat with some of the other universities. It is always my sense from a lot of people I know from a school who transferred from university to university that it was a bit of a quagmire getting certain universities to accept other credits, because of the independence of the existing courses. What is York doing in that area?

Mr Levy: Between universities and colleges, we have made a considerable amount of progress that, I have to admit candidly, was long overdue. We have, for example, a co-operative effort in the Durham area between Durham College, Trent University, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute and York that put on a program that allows students to transfer between the different universities with considerable ease. We are trying as a co-operative to fill an educational gap in a large, growing area that has no local accessibility to university education, and we are building alliances. I think there is a considerable way to go in that. I think a lot of the problems that have existed are coming down, but I do not want to pretend that it is perfect harmony at the moment.

Mr Sutherland: Let's take a first-year sociology class. Can you give us some indication where the class size would have been 10 years ago versus where it is now?

Mr Levy: I know what you are getting at, so let me try to characterize it rather than being exactly specific. It is more than class size. Let me tell you what it was like maybe 20 years ago. Twenty years ago a sociology student would have the probability of being in front of a full-time member of faculty, probably in a class that was in the 50s, probably with an opportunity for a tutorial after the class, and almost certainly would have an essay-type question, a writing requirement in the course that would have considerable criticism by the full-time faculty member of the quality of the work done.

I would say that if you look, not at York but at a random university today, the probability is you would have a very high chance of finding maybe a full-time faculty member, maybe a part-time faculty member, maybe a graduate student doing that course. The course would be 100 and something. There would not be a tutorial hour after it and those who most need the extra help would not get it. If there was an essay question, you would not get the critical content you would have 20 years ago. I do not think that is a York-specific phenomena. Perhaps Western and York are no different in that regard.

Mr Sutherland: Have you had to eliminate some of your essay courses because you cannot afford the funds for markers or because the class size is so large? I know we hear a lot about people's writing skills coming out of college and university, that they are not what they were 15 years or 20 years ago. Are we seeing that type of thing occurring at York as well?

Mr Levy: I have to say to you, no. We put literacy, writing and mathematics, so high on our agenda that everything will be cut, I think, before that. It is sad in some ways to read reports that give you and the public the impression that universities only care about graduate students. The care of the undergraduate students in writing courses and literacy courses is quite profound. We put a very large proportion of our resources into writing, and it has not gotten bad to the point that we would—I do not know what we would do. It would be such a philosophical problem for us that I do not know how we would deal with it, so no is the answer.

The Chair: Thanks for a good presentation, showing that even though we have a $9.7-billion deficit, there is still a lot more that we have to do as the government.

Mr Runciman: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I wonder if it would be possible to try hearing this next submission with the air-conditioner on for a few minutes. If we cannot hear the witnesses, then we will have to turn it off, but it might be helpful to all of us if we cranked it on for a few minutes.

ONTARIO COALITION FOR BETTER CHILD CARE

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care; Janet Davis, president. I do not know if all of you can sit at the table because there is only—

Ms Davis: We figured out a way we could do it. We figured it was late in the day and you have probably been listening to dry briefs all day long and we would like to liven it up a bit.

Mr Runciman: As long as it is not against the law.

Ms Davis: We would like to welcome the opportunity to let this committee know what we think about the budget. We would like to start off the top to show you in a concrete, symbolic way what we think about this budget. As you probably see, what you have tied on your microphone is a shoelace or a shoestring.

Critics, particularly the members directly opposite me, have said since April 29 that this is an exorbitant, extravagant budget. We would like to differ. We think it is a shoestring budget. We believe that in child care we have for too many years been operating on shoestring budgets, and in fact the budget we have this year will continue the practice of juggling budgets. We know all about shoestring budgets. We know that with shoestring budgets you have to choose your priorities.

We were pleased that this government did not take the route of other provincial governments and drastically slash its social programs. We had seen other governments doing more draconian things.

Actually, I am not going to follow the brief. It is there for your information. You can listen rather than read it. We prefer it that way.

The deficits that have been created, as most of you probably have heard from other deputants, were mostly a result of the lack of transfer payments from the federal government. We have deplored the kind of economic policies that are being pursued by the Mulroney government, particularly the reduction in transfer payments in social programs which have an impact directly in Ontario and specifically on child care. We know that all the expenditures at the provincial level now, with a 5% ceiling on the Canada assistance plan, will be coming out of entirely provincial and municipal dollars, and this government is struggling with how to deal with that.

But what we are here to say is that we have to continue to spend more money on child care. We are facing a continued crisis, worsened by the recession, and we would like to give you an opportunity today to hear from the people who are actually struggling day to day with the kind of budget restraints that we are.

I want to say as well that the January 31 announcement by Minister Zanana Akande was positive. We felt some relief that there was going to be some movement on child care. However, the three main planks of the announcement have yet to be fully implemented.

The down payment on pay equity to the non-profit sector: We were very pleased there was recognition that there needed to be immediate salary enhancement. However, the down payment has yet to reach the hands of the people working in child care. We are not sure as yet how much and when and if, so we are extremely anxious to see that this money is forthcoming.

The 5,000 subsidized spaces: While they are minimal as far as we can see, there is tremendous need for subsidies for spaces still not taken up across the province. We think there is only about a third of the spaces taken up. Many municipalities are in the position of not being able to cost-share the subsidies available to them, so we again recognize that there are some fundamental flaws in the child care is funded.

The commitment from this government to reform child care is also positive. We hope it is not going to be atracted process where we consult for 16 months and think about what people have said and finally get around to doing something by the end of the term. We expect to want to see some significant reform in the short run.

I must say about the budget itself that, because of delays, we do not actually have, to date, even the amount of the allocations for child care. We have heard, however, that the overall budget is higher than it was last year. But it appears as though the capital allocations have been cut completely; the program development fund, money, which is intended to expand child care, looks though it has been cut almost completely; and both these initiatives mean that the expansion of child care has been absolutely curtailed. We are extremely concerned about that and we are actually quite angry that this kind of information has not been made available to us to date. The former government in fact allocated $20 million in capital money each year, and it looks as though we are not even going to get that for child care this year. We have not seen any horrific cuts. We obviously, though, are experiencing significant reductions and we are not going to be able to do any major reform or any expansion unless additional funds are available.

I would like to turn it over to my colleagues and fellow members to explain the kinds of situations they are living with daily.

Ms Yardley: My name is Monica Yardley. Over the last three years I have been chairman for the parent advisory board committee which meets once a month to discuss policies and issues that affect the day care at Stephen's and King Edward. I am also here as a single parent to speak on behalf of many single parents who I am sure are out there.

I am fortunate. I am a bookkeeper and I work for small architectural companies. I have a job, but without subsidized spots I would probably be on welfare. I am sure there are many single parents out there who would like to have affordable quality day care, but without subsidized spots they cannot work and as a result they are not being able to live satisfactorily or put their children anywhere so that they can do this.

I know there are 4,200 licensed vacancies in Metropolitan Toronto now, but they are not subsidized vacancies. I am aware that within our own day care the infrastructure is going to suffer considerably. Without any parents being able to pay the full amount of fees, day cares are going to have to cut back on quality, meaning cut back on the staff time, just a lot of issues that are of concern.

Second, my other point I would like to bring up is that as the chairman of this committee for five years, I am aware that the minor capital expenditure allocations for renovating the playground at King Edward have always been promised and bumped to the following year. This has gone on for five years. I am curious to know what kind of funds will be allocated for this, especially this next year.

Ms Skuly: My name is Mary Gabriele Skuly. I am in the region, at a centre called St John Boscoe. Since in St John Boscoe has struggled. We are in a middle-neighbourhood which is mainly mortgage-heavy. In other words, to say, we do not access a lot of full-fee families because they just cannot afford it.

We also had a hard time getting a purchase-of-service agreement with York region because it was in a deficit position with quick expansion of child care in the region. York region chose not to access any of the 5,000 spaces. It chose not to access 250 spaces that the provincial government was going to give it in 1990 because it could come up with 20%. We are still in operation because the provincial government gave us a grant to carry us through, but it is going to be a tenuous operation. We are quite sure what is going to happen with this centre.

We are here basically to ask for your help. We need money in this system. Families can no longer afford child care. There are many empty spaces. There are 1,500 children in York region sitting on a fee assistance list. There are 926 vacant spots in York region. The province has talked about pay equity to non-profit child care workers and to date we still have not seen any money and we do not know when it is going to come. The province is committed to non-profit centres and we just do not see any alternatives for these commercial centres to convert. It is obvious that there is not enough funding.

Ms Marshall: I am Cecilia Marshall. I am a single parent from Jesse Ketchum Child Care Centre. I have two children: one is 10 and the other is four and a half.

I have been with Jesse Ketchum for close to seven years now. It is attached to Jesse Ketchum Public School and provides approximately one third of the population of the school.

The present condition of the building, which was built in 1912, is deteriorating, but unfortunately there are no extra funds available from the province. Without these funds we cannot meet the building codes and fire regulations and, therefore, our licensing standards. My concern is if we do not meet these licensing standards we will be shut down.

I would just like to add that Jesse Ketchum is Canada's largest day care centre. We made it through the Second World War and I am hoping that, with your assistance, we can make it through this next budget.

The Chair: There is more. Sorry. We have approximately 15 minutes left. If you want the panel to ask questions, please keep that in mind because we may wind up saving time for only one question per party, and if it goes full length, no questions at all.

Ms Hepworth: My name is Gael Hepworth. I am here to tell you as a taxpayer that I am a very angry taxpayer. I have heard rhetoric from my politicians over the past five years about how they are willing to get serious about women's issues and helping families out there and are serious about the day care issue. As a consumer out there, the reality is it is not true. I am a full-fee parent. I have paid full fee since I had my child three years ago. Today I figured out somewhere in excess of $40,000 will be spent by my husband and myself paying child care fees up to the point where he is four years old and he is eligible to go to half-day day care.

What happens out there in the day care system is that because the funding is so spotty, it is very difficult to get a child into a quality day care centre. I moved my child out of a profit day care centre into a non-profit day care centre recently, looking for a better quality of care. I find that because the funding is so spotty across the province, and the inconsistency of approach, it is difficult to get your hands on. Your administrators spend all of their time accessing money from full-fee parents or partial-fee parents and trying to make their budgets meet and still at the same time to deliver a program that is outstanding to the children in their care. It is outrageous.

In terms of women being able to function in this society, you talk about training being important. I tell you, we cannot access training unless we have good, quality child care. We cannot access whatever it is that this society has to offer unless we have access to good, stable, quality child care. The only way that will happen is if we provide a stable funding base for these administrators to get on with the job of providing good, quality child care for all children in Ontario.

As a parent I feel penalized by the fact that I chose to have a child. We are more than capable of sustaining the cost involved, but at the same time I spend my time going out to find that there are thousands of people on the waiting list for child care. Because they cannot access subsidies, the spaces are not full in the centres and the staff get laid off. It becomes a very difficult operation to keep running. It is not a lack of demand; it is a lack of political will on the part of the leadership. You are the leadership and I want to know why you are not putting the money where it needs to be. This is a service that is required by the taxpayers and I do not think we should carry the burden for ever and ever.

Mrs Smith: My name is Carol Smith. I am here today to represent Direction 2000, which is a non-profit organization whose overall goal is to assist interested parents and community groups to develop viable non-profit quality child care. That goal is founded upon the following principles: that quality child care is founded on a thorough understanding of development; that parents have both a right and a responsibility to participate in all aspects of their children's upbringing; and that child care is a family support service, a community service, and must reflect local needs.

Our concern is that there is no commitment in this budget for program development funds, and it is program development funds that allow us to assist the community. Our organization has been without funding since June 30, so our projects are without the support of a consultant and I am without a job. We offer a vital service to the community, one that ensures the fulfilment of our goal. We believe this government wants to be responsive to community needs, this government wants to form a partnership with the community and this government is working towards a reformed system. However, you need to be a good partner to the child care community that now exists. You cannot abandon this system while you are working on a new one.

While I was thinking about the presentation—and someone earlier said you have a lot of dry facts being offered to you—I tried to think of a way to illustrate my point. At the moment there is a circus in Toronto. No reflection on this group, but to the child care community it rings true. Picture a circus where just recently the ownership changed hands. The new owners want to be responsive to the community, make some changes, build a better circus, so they look at what they can do; add more animals, more acrobats, more clowns. They study it, they meet with their patrons and they study it some more. But at the top of the tent, the high wire act is still going on. The participants—read child care community—are walking the tight-rope. They are juggling dollars, enrolment and staff. Others—read new centres—are swinging out on trapezes and reaching out for supportive hands and finding none. It will not be long before they will all tumble to the ground because the new owners forgot to put up the safety net.

The system as it now stands needs that safety net. They need to know that their partner is not just paying lip service to the partnerships.

Direction 2000 asks that you consider the negative consequences that the lack of program development funds will bring to the child care community as it now exists. Our children, our families and our communities deserve your support.

Ms Willard: My name is Mary Willard. I represent the York Region Coalition for Better Child Care. I would like to reiterate that we feel it was a very positive move in the right direction when pay equity was awarded to child care workers in non-profit centres only. There is a very high percentage of the child care centres in York region that are commercial. Where are the incentives to encourage commercial centres to convert to non-profit? Enough centres are willing to convert to non-profit. Where are the funds to make those conversions possible?

Ms West: My name is Cheryl West. I supervise the Pat Schulz Child Care Centre, located in the City Adult Learning Centre in Toronto. The City Adult Learning Centre is for students 18 years and over who return to school for their high school diploma. This year the enrolment is projected to be over 2,000 students. The Pat Schulz Child Care Centre is an infant-toddler centre with 25 spaces, located in the same building. Two thirds of our spaces are prioritized for children of students, and our waiting list, updated just this July 1 through 16, has 197 children waiting. Some 169 of them are in need of subsidy; 28 of them are full fee. At least 80 of those 169 are hoping to be students this September, of course, depending upon child care.

As September approaches, I receive at least four calls a day from students hoping to go to school this fall again, depending upon their child care. I take their names and I advise them to call Metro children's services so that they will be considered for eligibility for Metro subsidy. That waiting list I believe to be 11,000 children long. This is most discouraging for these young women trying to build futures in Ontario.

In January 1990, the student body at the City Adult Learning Centre signed a petition requesting that we accommodate preschool children. The principal agreed that time that there was the need and he allocated space for the project. We applied for money to the province to renovate and start up the program, but we were told that there were no funds available in 1991. In fact, I believe the Toronto area office is not even accepting applications this year. The amount of relief made available for child care by the current government's budget is a pinhole of light in a long, dark tunnel for students, primarily women in families I speak with each day.

In addition to the crisis that we face regarding the lack of money to fill the existing spaces within the community, the new dilemma we will face will be competing for qualified staff as public sector pay equity settlements put pressure on private non-profit centres to keep salaries at par with municipal centres.

As a supervisor of a centre, I feel and see the hardships and strains on social services through the families I speak with, as well as the staff and problem-solving I have to do every day. The waiting lists speak to the need of the people of Ontario for a provincially funded child care system. As you review today, be mindful that many of these families have been waiting a year or longer for child care, that their operations are currently funded on shoestring budgets and that we need a directly funded provincial system in order to avert the closures we are now facing across Metro Toronto.

I would just like to add that the child care community as well as myself, would welcome these hearings at a federal level, but it is shameful that we are spending tax dollars on this review today.

Ms Davis: As you can see, we are struggling daily with the crisis in child care. The problems have existed for years. We have had Band-Aid solutions posed to the child care community each year for the last several decades.

I also want to reiterate what Cheryl has said. Why are we even examining the expenditures on social programs beyond me. Of the total $9.7-billion deficit, $1.5 billion goes to new programs. The rest is as a result of cost-sharing shoestring budgets. It is outrageous that we should be spending this time and this energy questioning the expenditures of this budget.

I want to reiterate again that there is a great deal of support for a reformed child care system, there is a great deal of support for the agenda of this government, and all we can say is get on with it. Put aside this dithering over whether this is the appropriate way to go. There are too many people who are suffering as a result of delays and as a result of non-implementation of programs, and we just want to say again that this is not an exorbitant budget, it is a shoestring budget and we need more.

The Chair: We have time for one question per party beginning with the New Democratic Party.

Ms M. Ward: I have questions. Which one shall I choose? Conversions, perhaps. We had a group of private day care operators in yesterday, and some of your members were mentioning that. I got the impression you feel it is a good idea. They seem to be vehemently opposed to even considering it. Do you have any comments on that?

st another quick comment: I think there are quite a spaces available right now. The subsidies are not That should spur them on to consider that.

Ms Davis: There are a number of answers I could give to that. One, I support the NDP's position that we need to move towards creating a non-profit system in Ontario. We need only look south of the border or to Alberta to look for the experience of other jurisdictions to see what happens when we have a large commercial sector in child care. What we need to do is to begin now, while the sector is still small enough. One quarter of the centres are commercial. The remainder of the spaces but a quarter of the sector is for-profit. We need to look at putting in place incentives to encourage that conversion take place.

It is a question of quality. Despite the fact that the commercial lobby may tell you there are no differences in quality, there is a large body of literature, and a report recently prepared by the ministry which was a review of the research done that shows categorically that the quality of care in the for-profit sector is likely to be poorer. They do not say that they are all bad and that all the non-profit centres are great, but overall, if we want to move towards creating a high-quality system of child care, it has to be non-profit and public.

Ms M. Ward: Is that report recent?

Ms Davis: Yes, it is called Factors Related to Quality in Child Care, produced by the Ministry of Community and Social Services. If you look to the European experience, we are not just talking about social democratic countries, the commercial sector is virtually non-existent in Europe. They are miles ahead of us in taking the route that we need to take to create a high-quality system of child care.

Mr Phillips: The Agenda for People I carry around with me all the time. I think I have even mentioned to you that this is because it was the—

Ms M. Ward: It is dear to his heart.

Mr B. Ward: You are going to memorize it.

Mr Phillips: It is the document that was essentially the commitment that was made to people like yourselves, I think you felt very strongly about it. I am listening intently to what you said about the implementation of that agenda, which I think called for 10,000 new spaces, pay more for your sector, and all right away, I think.

As you know, the budget is not being held up; the agenda is implemented. This is just a hearing now on what people think of the budget, so nothing has been delayed on. What explanation do you get of the fact that virtually none of the agenda, if I understand your comments, has been implemented? What is the answer you get when you ask the minister that question?

Ms Davis: You know the answers. It is a question of dollars, and there are not sufficient dollars to implement the programs they would like to implement. It is obvious.

Mr Phillips: But their document, the Agenda for People said we were in a recession last year. I am just wondering what excuse you get.

Ms Davis: The shortfall in transfer payments from the federal government is certainly a reality that we did not expect to be prolonged—or maybe we did expect to be prolonged.

Mr Phillips: That was in place last year.

Ms Davis: But what angers me very much about the federal cutbacks is that they are in programs that are mandatory programs. Social services and welfare—

Mr Phillips: I am sorry, but the Agenda for People knew all of that. I am just wondering what you get from the provincial government as an answer.

Ms Davis: The answer is that there are insufficient funds.

Mr Runciman: I just have one question, a comment really, with respect to the covering letter you had on your presentation. You have a quote in here: “‘It’s not enough, to say there isn’t enough money,’ Davis stresses.”

From my perspective, it is not enough for you and others to approach government and say, “Look, all we want is more money.” I think it would be helpful for all of us, regardless of what political stripe we have, if interest groups appearing before legislative committees suggested innovative and constructive ways in which a government could trim costs. I know you are talking about transfer payments from the federal government, and perhaps that is an easy knock, but I think you are looking at this government incurring close to a $10-billion deficit, the federal government an annual deficit in the neighbourhood of $30 billion, and I do not think that all of us as taxpayers can last indefinitely running those kinds of deficits at the federal and provincial levels. So I think, from my perspective as a provincial politician, it would be most helpful when a group like yours appears before us to say, “This is the justification for increased funding for our particular interest and here are ways in which we suggest those funds can be achieved and without incurring additional deficits for all of us as taxpayers.”

Ms Davis: We would support the government's proposal for a minimum corporate tax and looking at some revisions to the tax system and some obviously progressive forms of taxation that would increase revenues. We are not economists. We come forward to talk about child care because that is what we know.

Mr Runciman: I do not think we all have to be economists. We are all taxpayers and we all have concerns and we all have views to express. From my perspective, it would be helpful if all interest groups took a look at the broader picture rather than focusing simply on their own area of interest. That is all I am suggesting to you, when you appear before us in the future, any legislative committee. You may be criticized for making specific suggestions, but you folks are here to criticize us quite frequently, so I think you should be prepared to take some of that heat as well to come up with some specific suggestions.

Ms Davis: I think we did mention some proposals. We support the proposals that have been suggested by this government and we are hoping to see them implemented.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon.

PROPANE GAS ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Propane Gas Association, Ontario committee: Rene Chartier, director; Tim MacDonald, officer; Marshall Wice, officer; Al Hindmarsh, officer; Alex Goerk, officer.

The Vice-Chair: The Chair has just stepped out for a minute, so maybe we will just start the presentation anyway. Just to let you know the format, you have a half-hour altogether. Whatever time you take for your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the 30 minutes, and the time left will be divided up among the three parties to ask questions.

If you would like to start, just before each of you is speaking please introduce yourselves so we have that on Hansard.

Mr Chartier: Thank you, Mr Chairman. My name is Rene Chartier. I am the director of communications for the Ontario committee of the Propane Gas Association of Canada.

I would like to thank two members of the clerk's staff for helping us to be here today, Mrs Karen McKay and Monica Marshall. We are very grateful for their advice and their kind thoughts.

The principals of my association, representing all persons who live and work in the great province of Ontario, are Al Hindmarsh from Oakville, Bob Callow from Aurora, Tim MacDonald from Unionville, who will be our spokesman this afternoon, and Jack Patriarche, his colleague from Unionville. Behind them are Marshall Wice and Alex Goerk.

Mr MacDonald: Thank you very much for allowing us to present our position today.

I just outline the background in terms of how the auto propane industry was established in Ontario back in 1980 in response to energy security concerns that first occurred in 1974, with the first Arab embargo and oil shock and subsequently higher prices of crude oil and gasoline and diesel fuel oil. In 1979 there was another oil shock with the Iraq-Iran war, which again resulted in shortages of crude oil and higher prices for gasoline, diesel fuel oil, etc.

In 1980 the Ministry of Energy in Ontario established an alternative transportation fuels program, of which propane was a very key and integral part. There are a couple of key principles with respect to that program, of which one is that government and industry would work together in the area of demonstrations and research. By far and away the most critical aspect was the fact that there was a fiscal regime in the way of no motor fuel taxes for propane and other transportation fuels and a sales tax rebate to encourage vehicles to go off gasoline and diesel and on to propane and other alternative fuels. At the same time, the federal government had a $400 grant program to foster the same kind of activity. What we have seen in the last few years is a move away from that original fiscal principle. That has hurt the industry and we have experienced declining conversions in recent years.

It is critical for this industry to have a proper fiscal regime to survive. Any country that has a viable alternative transportation fuels industry requires proper fiscal support from government and requires government and industry work together to develop alternative transportation fuel.

Our purpose here today is to outline the benefits of propane in terms of its benefits for energy security, for the environment, for job creation and for investment, the importance of auto propane to the whole propane industry and the importance of a proper fiscal regime to ensure ongoing viability.

Just in addressing the first issue in terms of energy security, you can see here from this chart that back in 1980 when this program came into effect, in terms of the proven oil reserves in the world—and this is world demand reserves—the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries controlled 60% of the world's proven reserves; the OPEC countries controlled 40%. In 1988, OPEC controlled 77% of the world's crude oil reserves and the non-OPEC controlled 23%. The key point here is that energy security was a very important issue back in 1980 and today it is just as compelling as back then, if not more so. We have all seen the recent events with Desert Storm and war in the Middle East. That certainly is not a very stable area in the world. This issue of energy security is just as compelling a reason to diversify our energy options today as it was back in 1980.

I just want to outline here energy consumption within Ontario by key sectors. You can see in that green pie chart—the pie—that is industrial—28% of demand consumption of energy in Ontario. Basically that is mining, major industries, steel industries, etc. Commercial—restaurants, commercial operations—is 8%. Residential is 13%; that is energy used for hot water, heating, cooking, clothes drying, etc; electrical generation, that is energy used to produce hydro, such as nuclear energy and hydro-electric energy. The energy industry is 15% of demand. That is energy used in refineries, etc. In transportation it is 24%.

The point I want to make is that in all these segments there are choices; there are options. You can use natural gas, hydro, propane or oil-based products. In the transportation segment, the energy used in transportation is 98% oil-based. The balance is basically propane and compressed natural gas. I guess the key issue then is that the key energy security issue rests with oil and the key sector is transportation.

Turning now to propane, we will say at the outset that the propane industry in Ontario and Canada is a very small energy segment. It represents only 1.5% of energy in Canada. The big players are hydro, natural gas and oil-based products. Within Canada, the domestic demand for propane—that is propane used for residential, commercial, industrial, etc—is 1.5 billion litres. The production in Canada is 8.5 billion litres. The key point is that there is abundant supply of propane within Canada, and today most of that is exported to the United States, which is totally different than with oil. We are importing light crude oil in Canada.

Looking at these various segments within the propane industry, we have the same segments as any other energy industry. We have industrial, which represents 23% of the propane consumed in Canada and likewise in Ontario. That is used for mine, air, heating; also, a major segment in industrial is forklift. Propane has been used in that application for over 40 years because it is clean-burning and has very positive ions relative to gasoline and, as you know, forklifts used inside warehouses, etc. Propane has been used for many years because of its environmental benefits. Residential represents 15% of propane demand in Canada again, that is furnaces and water heaters and clothes, etc. Commercial is 23%, agriculture 7%.

The main point I want to make here is auto propane. Propane in Canada is one third of this industry's demand. If you look back at this industry, we were a 3-billion-litre industry in 1980. Auto propane did not exist. Now we are a 3-billion-litre industry and auto propane represents one third of the industry across Canada and one half of the industry in Ontario. I am saying this industry is very important.

You are probably wondering what happened to the rest of the market. The expansion of natural gas mains has taken away a large part of the demand from what we call the traditional propane market. Propane is a gaseous fuel like natural gas. It is used beyond the natural gas mains. Natural gas mains have expanded and taken that market away from propane. Mainly for the auto propane market and industry, auto propane developed in 1980 and has picked up the slack. The key point I want to make here is that auto propane is extremely important to this industry. It has become the largest segment. Within the province of Ontario, it represents 35% to 40% of our industry.

The other point I want to make is that like natural gas, propane has high-efficiency furnaces very well and can be used as a great product to go off hydro or go off oil, and it burns with the same characteristics as natural gas.

Now I want to talk about the environmental benefits of propane. Propane as a fuel is extremely good in all the problem areas of concern: smog, greenhouse effect. We think propane is the best alternative fuel in terms of global warming—very low carbon dioxide and methane emissions. We have been working with Environment Canada to measure emissions. We have material in the handouts you have in front of you with respect to emissions. We will just go through some of the highlights here very quickly.

On this chart we have taken some information with respect to a Chev Silverado. You can see that the far, dark set of charts is the government standard. The pink is cold weather urban starting, the blue is normal city driving and the darker blue is highway driving. You can see that propane is measured against the government standard in all different types of situations: highway, city driving, cold weather driving. If you look at hydrocarbons, that is under the government standard. It improves in highway driving and is very good in cold weather driving. Carbon monoxide is significantly better than government standards and also in nitrous oxides. One thing I will say is that propane is a gaseous fuel. It runs clean in all applications; gasoline runs dirtier in colder weather.

Last October, World of Wheels sponsored a rally across Canada with four fuels: gasoline, compressed natural gas, propane and methanol. I will say at the outset that these were brand-new Tauruses. They were not optimized set up for the various alternative fuels. They were just converted to propane or natural gas or whatever, and the optimization was not complete. But you can see here the results of propane with respect to other alternative fuels and to gasoline.

The first chart indicates propane against gasoline and other alternative fuels with respect to regulated emissions, hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide and NO_x . Propane is the green fuel; gasoline, pink; the government standard is light blue and CNG is the dark blue. With respect to hydrocarbons, which are particularly important with respect to smog, you can see that propane stacks up very well against all the other alternative fuels. With respect to carbon monoxide, again propane stacks up very well with all the alternative fuels, better than CNG and better than methanol. Finally, in terms of NO_x , again propane stacks up very well. It is the best fuel in the area of NO_x , which is very important for global warming and acid rain and photochemical smog.

The other thing I should say about propane is that it is in a sealed system. You have two kinds of emissions: tail-pipe emissions and evaporative emissions. Propane runs in a sealed system, so right off the bat you eliminate the potential for a lot of emissions.

In the area of unregulated emissions—formaldehyde; VOCs, which are volatile organic compounds; methane and non-methane hydrocarbons, which are critical for the creation of smog—again we have the same scale. We have gasoline in the light purple at the far left of these bar charts, CNG in the dark blue, propane in green and methanol in light pink.

You can see in the area of formaldehyde that propane is the best alternate fuel. In the area of VOCs, propane and CNG are neck and neck in terms of their emissions. With regard to methane, propane again stands out very well, considerably better than CNG. And in the area of methanol, again propane stacks up very well.

We have other information on emissions which can be made available to members of this committee if they want.

The other thing I should say about propane is that back in 1980 there were virtually no vehicles running on propane. Today there are over 50,000 vehicles.

We have been the most successful in the field in grabbing hold of this challenge and creating an alternate transportation fuel. We had to, given our market dynamics, as I went over. But we certainly have proven we are successful. We have an infrastructure in place today of 1,700 outlets. We can provide a solution today, and we are doing it right now, but we can expand that solution further for the environment, for energy security. We are here today. We are not saying we are the whole solution, but we are saying we are a very strong part of the solution.

We have a number of challenges as an industry. We are not saying we are perfect. There is a low awareness of propane. We are a very small energy source—as I said, only 1% to 1.5% of total energy in Canada—so there is a low awareness. We are working as an industry to improve that awareness. Second, at times that awareness is negative, and we have tried very hard to alleviate those concerns with the public. In the last three or four years there has been a government-industry committee looking at the propane industry with industry, with the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations, with the Association of Municipalities of Ontario and with the Consumers' Association of Canada.

A study was completed in terms of the fuelling of auto propane. That study indicated that propane was as safe as gasoline in terms of safety incidents, so we have a job to do in terms of promoting the product and ensuring that it continues to be a very safe fuel, which it is today.

As an association, we have developed various pump island attendant training courses in the last couple of years to properly train people in the fuelling techniques of propane.

Declining conversions is a very, very critical issue to this industry. Clearly if we do not have conversions, our volume will plummet. We have seen some impact on that. I just want to show you some numbers very quickly with respect to conversions.

The total numbers at the top—for example, 23,000 in 1990 and 17,700 in 1987—are the total conversions done in Canada. The pink are non-Ontario conversions. That is particularly in Alberta and British Columbia. The green ones are in Ontario. What we have seen in the last few years is a decline in conversions. There is a perception out there by the public that propane has less support from government than it did before.

Back in 1989 there was an imposition of a motor fuel tax in two stages. That sent a message out to customers, who said: "Look, I am looking at converting my vehicle, but are the economics going to stay the same? Are the assumptions I based my original decision on going to remain the same?" That was a concern for a lot of our customers.

We have seen declining conversions. Last year we did 4,500, and we are working very hard as an industry to increase that number. That is the critical lifeblood of this industry. Back in the early years there were a lot of conversions that came off very quickly. Today we are working to make sure that the conversions are done properly. Several companies warranty conversions so the customer has a comfort level that the conversions have been done properly.

As I mentioned, back in 1980 this program was launched as an alternate transportation fuels program. One of the key principles was that there be a level playing field. All transportation fuels would have the same terms and conditions in terms of government support and in terms of a fiscal regime. That level playing field has been changed. Propane is now the only alternate fuel that pays a motor fuel tax, and that has hurt us.

We feel the support that other alternate fuels have been getting is not the same as what propane has been getting, although I will say that in the last budget there were some bright signs and positive indicators—I want to talk about that next—with respect to propane pricing.

One of the issues we have faced is that with the advent of the road tax, the spread between propane prices and gasoline prices tends to narrow. What that did was change the economics. The fleet user who was using propane saw his economics deteriorate because all of a sudden instead of propane not having a road tax, it had a tax of 4.3 cents a litre on it.

The advent of the GST, which arrived in January this year, impacted on our economics another 2.5 cents; it narrowed the gap another 2.5 cents. Gasoline had a federal sales tax on it. The federal sales tax was taken out, GST was put in. The effect was neutral. Propane has a small component of federal sales tax, about two tenths of a cent a litre. The advent of GST narrowed the gap between gasoline and propane because we had to put that right off the pump price. Right off the bat it was narrowed.

I will commend the Treasurer on his recent budget. It did not increase the motor fuel tax in the last budget. There is a 1.7-cent tax on gasoline right off the bat, another 1.7 in January. That will tend to widen the spread.

Technology is a very big issue for the industry. The automobile industry is constantly progressing in terms of technology. We are working very hard to maintain a technology both in engines and in refuelling infrastructure, that requires investment. I will talk about that a little further.

We have had some concerns with respect to the application of government regulations at the fuels safety branch level. We have information on that in your handout. It is a concern for us. We are working closely with the fuels safety branch and the MCCR to try to make sure we work together in a more positive way.

With respect to employment, this is a new industry that did not exist in 1980. We have had a very positive impact on employment in Ontario and on economic activity. Looking very quickly at conversions, conversions generate economic activity. If you take 4,500 conversions, that costs about $1,800. That is retail spending of $1.8 million. We have looked at the impact of this based on an input-output model. Every $10,000 of retail spending generates $12,000 of gross domestic product impact. That is a benefit to the Ontario economy of $9.7 million, or 324 person-years of employment.

Concerning motor fuel sales, 400 million litres of motor fuel sales at, let's say, 28 cents a litre generates $112 million of retail spending. The GDP, or gross domestic product, impact of that is $130 million. Again, that was not there before. The person-year number of jobs is 4,500, in total you are looking at 5,000 jobs. I will say that a lot of these jobs in the refuelling infrastructure are for those people in the 18-to-24 age bracket, where unemployment is particularly high. We have, as I said, brought out training programs to help them do their jobs better. What could this impact be if these conversions were 20,000, like they were before? What could the impact be on jobs and economic activity?

What is the impact on the Ontario budget, on the cash flow of the Ontario government? We do kick in, through our motor fuel tax of 4.3 cents per litre, $17 million. Admittedly, the government forgoes road tax on our product but that is essential; if we do not have a proper fiscal regime, our industry is dead. The province does forgo tax revenue. That represents about $38 million. That has not been updated for the recent changes in the budget, but I think it is basically very accurate. The provincial sales tax rebate for converting vehicles of $750 a vehicle represents $3.4 million, but on the previous page, I indicated the gross domestic product impact of this industry of about $144 million. Based on that same input-output model, 16 traditionally flows back in terms of tax revenue to the public coffers. That is a plus of $23 million.

The net negative cash-flow impact on the province, in terms of finances, is $1.6 million. What could it be? That is not count, by the way, the impact on society in terms of cleaner air. What are the benefits of having lower emissions in terms of hospitalization and the health program? Those are not factored in there, so there are a lot of other costs that are not factored in there that are real costs.

In conclusion, the energy and environmental reasons for promoting all the transportation fuels, particularly propane, are even more important today than they were in 1980. Propane offers an alternative to gasoline that can meet our policy objectives, create employment and investment in Ontario and provide long-term security of supply. The initial policy of fuel neutrality has been eroded to the detriment of the auto propane industry, and this is hurting the industry directly and making it difficult to make the necessary investments in infrastructure, market research and development and demonstrations.

Our recommendation is to make the playing field more even as it was back when the program came to light, because we are experiencing declining conversions. Specific recommendations are: increase the sales tax rebate for propane conversion to $1,000 from $750 to match the one currently available for CNG; extend the period of eligibility for the rebate from three months, as it is today, to 12 months; provide some tax relief to propane to mitigate the effect of the GST on auto propane and the gasoline price differential—I will say that the recent budget went a long way to do that; and, in association with the federal government, permit accelerated depreciation of investment in building infrastructure.

In summary, propane provides a great opportunity for Ontario in terms of energy security, in terms of the environment, in terms of job creation, in terms of investment. The auto propane industry is very important to the propane industry. There are a lot of companies in Ontario that are 100% dependent on auto propane. They jumped into the market when this opportunity came about. If the auto propane industry disappears, this industry will shrink to one third to 40%. But if you look on the upside, what is the potential that could be there? Cleaner air, more jobs, better energy security in the transportation sector, which today is 98% dependent on oil.

The other thing too is that I think it is an excellent example of industry and government working together. We have worked well for the last 10 or 11 years. We want to continue to work together to build this industry for the achievement of the public policy goals I have mentioned. We would like to expand that partnership and work with industry and government to have more government vehicles on propane, and maybe have government work with us to coach the Chryslers and Fords and GMs of the world so they can produce vehicles that run on propane.

That would help the provincial government too. If vehicles are produced at the factory level, conversions are not necessary. The Ontario government can look at that 10% sales tax rebate; that may not be necessary. The pricing of vehicles coming out of the OEMs—the original equipment manufacturers—the Chryslers and Fords and GMs, is similar to gasoline because off the line it does not have to be converted. The Treasury saves that money and it still has the benefit of a clean-burning fuel and energy security; there is an abundant supply in Canada. I appreciate the opportunity we have had to speak to you today. I am probably taking too much time, but we appreciate the opportunity, and that concludes my presentation.

The Chair: Actually, time expired, but if committee members have questions, perhaps we can start with having one or two questions per party, beginning with the Liberals.

Mr Kwinter: In your total conversions, what proportion are commercial or fleet users and what proportion are individual consumers?

Mr MacDonald: By far and away the majority are fleet users. I would say 90%-plus. The benefits of converting to propane come to the fore in that fleet application because you drive more miles. Keep in mind that because you have to pay for a conversion of $1,800, you have to drive enough miles to generate savings to get that pay-back back. Fleets generally like to have that pay-back within a year to 18 months.

There are, though, opportunities, we believe, in the commuter market. If you drive enough miles the pay-back will be there. There still is pollution coming out from lots of vehicles, but clearly the lion's share, 90%-plus—that is an estimate but that order of magnitude—is fleet users like couriers, taxis, limousines, those kinds of vehicles.

Mr Kwinter: The reason I want to know that is it seems to me that is where you really have to concentrate your effort. That is where the greatest growth would be. I agree that one of the major hurdles would be to get the original equipment manufacturers to make that a factory option.

Mr MacDonald: Yes, precisely.

Mr Kwinter: That would solve a lot of your problems. We saw that in the 1970s with diesel. A lot of people went to diesel and a lot of commercial vehicles are still diesel. That should be, I would think, one of your major thrusts, to get original equipment manufacturers to make this a factory option.

Mr MacDonald: That is exactly right; no question about it. It has been very successful. If you look at Holland, 20% of the fuel that is used in the vehicle market is propane. There are 500,000 vehicles. There is no reason Canada could not have 500,000 vehicles on propane. In Ontario we could have 250,000 vehicles. We could handle five times more, with the supply we have. We are there now. We have an infrastructure in place today. We have 1,700 facilities in Ontario available today.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to follow specifically on your recommendation relating to the motor vehicle tax on alternative fuels. As I recall the history of this, and I would just like you to bring us up to date, when the incentive was put into place, it was put into place and considered by virtually all of the subsequent treasurers as a temporary tax until the industry came to maturity and the alternative fuels were seen as a real alternative for users. There was, as I recall, concurrence between your industry and the Treasurer a couple of years ago that in fact your industry had reached that maturity level where it could compete, because there still was a differential between propane and regular gasoline, and that it was an appropriate time for that tax to go back on. Would you just like to comment on that?

Mr MacDonald: I could be wrong, but I do not recall the industry saying, "Now is the time to put on the tax," per se, or "an appropriate time." You are right that a critical thing is the spread between propane and gasoline.

When the program was launched, as I understand it, back in 1980, it was a long-term program, a 15-year program, and the principle was: "Let's create an environment where government and industry work together in the area of research and demonstrations. Let's provide a fiscal regime and a level playing field and let the marketplace decide which fuels are selected by the public, fleet users or private individuals, whatever. That was the original intent.

I guess what happens is that you get a mindset out there that: "This fuel tax has gone on. When is the next one going to happen?" In many ways it is a fear of the unknown—Once a fuel starts to get taxed, is another tax going to get on. I convert to propane when there is not a fuel tax. A fuel tax was put on? It first came in at 2.3 cents in July 1989, then another two cents; it was announced at the time of that budget for a total of 4.3 cents. Then the GST happened, then all these sorts of add-ons, so it is a combination of a number of things. Clearly it is critical that the spread be there. You are 100% right there, but a lot of it is perception.

The fleet users are very much concerned with the economics of things. They are converting to propane because of economics. I would like to think they were converting because of the environment, but when it comes right down to it, they are converting because of economics. If they feel there is more tax to come, they get very nervous. They rethink. They tend to think a little farther.

You are looking at a conversion. They are high mileage users. Every two or three years or four years they rethink their decision, and if the economic environment has changed or if there is some doubt about it, they pause for thought.

In terms of your comment about whether the industry thought it was okay to put a 4.3 on or it was negotiated or whatever, I do not recall those discussions. It does not mean there were none, but I do not recall them. But you are right that it is critical there be a price spread between propane and gasoline and diesel.

Mr B. Ward: I have a quick one. It is more of a clarification from a fiscal standpoint. You are suggesting that the fiscal support the government has shown your industry, now and in the past, should continue, and in fact should be enhanced if possible. The other clarification is that you agree with the fuel taxes that were implemented because it increases the spread, as I think you just stated, which the GST closed and that by not taxing the motor fuel tax, it has benefited your industry.

Mr MacDonald: The GST came in this year, as we all well know. It added two to 2.5 cents to our price, and so to gasoline. It is true that the 1.7 cents a litre from the Ontario budget that was announced in April, which was instituted right away, and then the upcoming 1.7, will widen that spread. That is, I guess, your point of clarification.

We have to have a positive fiscal regime to be successful. If we do not have a sales tax rebate to foster conversions, we will not have conversions. You see $1,000 for compressed natural gas—I am not knocking any fuel; I am just stating facts—and you see it is $750 for propane. That sends a message out to people. You see other alternative fuels with no motor fuel tax, and you see propane with 4.3. That sends a message out.

I guess what we are saying is that we need a fiscal regime which allows us to provide the fleet users, the public, the economic benefits. I commend the Treasurer for not putting on the road tax, not increasing it, and widening that spread again, but what we are here to talk about is why we are here is to say: "Look, we need a fiscal regime. We want a level playing field with all alternative fuels."

Mr Sutherland: It is nice to hear a group saying that the gasoline tax increase was a good thing. What I want to know, just for some personal interest, is, roughly how many miles or kilometres a year would you have to drive to make it worth while to have a conversion, or what do you think from the economic standpoint?

Mr MacDonald: It depends on many things, of course: the fuel efficiency of the vehicle itself; the spread between gasoline and propane.

Mr Sutherland: With the current situation, what would it roughly be?

Mr MacDonald: I would say you are looking at about 4,000 to 4,500 litres of propane a year. You guys can help me out if I am wrong here; I would say 20,000 to 30,000 kilometres a year.

Mr Sutherland: I am at 39,000.

Mr Wice: By good measurement, if you have a gasoline vehicle and you fill it up two and a half times a week, then that is a vehicle that should be on propane.

Mrs Sullivan: You have a customer.

Mr Sutherland: I thought about it. I may still do it. I did not think I would be driving this much.

Mr MacDonald: We can take orders for conversion today, if you would like to.

Mr Sutherland: I am at 39,000 kilometres over 12 months, so we are pretty well there.

Mr MacDonald: We can arrange something.

The Chair: That is it until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning. The committee adjourned at 1652.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 1 August 1991

The committee met at 0909 in room 230.

1991-92 BUDGET

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Vice-Chair: Good morning. The Chair is going to be a little late, so I will be chairing in his place until he arrives. It looks as if we have a quorum this morning. This is the fourth day of the hearings by the standing committee on finance and economic affairs for post-budget commentary.

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

The Vice-Chair: Our first group this morning is from the University of Toronto: Robert Prichard, president; Penny Horne, president of faculty; Judith Eichmanis, president of the staff association; Peter Go, president of the student administrative council; and Robert McGavin, chairman of governing council. We have half an hour altogether. Whatever time you use in your verbal presentation will be subtracted from that half hour and the time left divided among the three parties.

Dr Prichard: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. My colleagues and I are grateful to you and your committee for giving us the opportunity to appear and grateful that the committee is permitting these full and informed discussions of the government's budget.

You have introduced the others that I appear with. Our plan is that each of us will speak briefly from our particular perspectives. I will introduce our position by speaking for five minutes. Each of my colleagues will speak for two minutes beyond that in the hope that we will use less than half our time for our presentations, leaving the remainder of the time for any questions the committee may have.

The 1991 Ontario budget states, "It is almost universally acknowledged that the key to growth and prosperity is an educated, adaptable, motivated and skilled workforce." That is from page 79 of the budget.

The budget, as you know, also speaks to the centrality of innovation and technology research and development to economic growth and competitiveness. We at the University of Toronto endorse these sentiments entirely. We believe that investments in people and investments in ideas rank among the most important and productive investments a society can make. We believe such investments are essential to building a province committed to both prosperity and equality of opportunity and we believe investments of this kind are ever more critical and more compelling than in times of previous economic difficulties, such as those Ontario is experiencing at present.

The University of Toronto is Canada's most significant university. It does the most research of any university in Canada by far. It graduates more PhDs and masters students in any other university in Canada by far. It graduates more undergraduates and more professional graduates than any other university in Canada, and it counts itself as a university among a network of great public universities across North America and around the world.

The University of Toronto is a major and very special asset of the province of Ontario, and the University of Toronto is, of course, dedicated to investments in people and investments in ideas, investments that can contribute significantly to Ontario's future. But the university can meet its obligations to provide a university education of excellent quality, indeed pre-eminent quality, only if it enjoys an adequate level of public financial support.

How do we judge the budget against this requirement? First, we congratulate the government on maintaining transfer payments to the universities at approximately the rate of inflation. To have done less would have been disastrous in terms of doing further harm to a university system already seriously damaged and undermined by 20 years of inadequate public policy and inadequate financial support.

We also congratulate and thank the government for providing assistance with meeting the costs of pay equity and for providing special funds for anti-recessionary capital projects that will mitigate some of our most pressing problems with respect to deferred maintenance and hazardous materials.

I should also record our concerns. As we record our gratitude for this financial support, despite the government's revenue shortfall, we must record our concerns about the current state of financial support for the universities.

While there has been much talk about the deficit identified in the budget, there is another deficit that should also concern the government, this committee, and the people of Ontario. It is the deficit in essential support for our universities. This other deficit, as I call it, can be measured in many ways. It can be measured as $410 million a year in base financial support, a figure based on the government's own advice from the Ontario Council on University Affairs and acknowledged in the Legislature by the Minister of Colleges and Universities of this government as an appropriate measure of the shortfall in university revenue.

It can be measured as Ontario ranking ninth out of 10 provinces in support per student. It can be measured as Ontario providing only a fraction of the support per student provided to students in comparable public institutions in major American jurisdictions such as Michigan, providing 55% more per student; Pennsylvania, 74% more per student; California, twice as much per student; on average, at public doctoral institutions in the United States, 40% more per student than is received at the University of Toronto.

It can also be measured as the accumulated backlog of deferred maintenance, which at my university alone, has now reached $120 million of deferred maintenance projects, and it can be measured as the loss of positions and jobs in the faculty and in the staff, and the consequent escalation of student-faculty ratios and decimation of staff support services. This other deficit requires urgent attention. It will require more spending, not less; more investment in people and ideas, not less.

The people of Ontario understand the benefits. University enrolment has grown by 30% just in the 1980s, and the economic return to a university education continues to outstrip all other forms of labour force qualification.

In conclusion, we recommend that you endorse the transfer payments to the universities as the absolute minimum necessary to stave off further damage. We also recommend that you urge the government, as a matter of urgency, to follow through on the Treasurer's call for a plan of renewal for Ontario's universities, and that you insist as a committee that the government bring forward a plan to ensure that adequate investments are made in the universities of Ontario to overcome the other deficit so that the full promise of our institutions can be realized.

We at the University of Toronto and at other universities in the province stand ready to serve the people of Ontario. If equipped to serve to the limits of our abilities, the contributions we can make to the long-term economic strength and prosperity of the province of Ontario are enormous and enduring, and we would very much like to seize that opportunity.

The chairman of the governing council, Dr McGavin, will speak next.

Dr McGavin: Thank you for having us here today. I am in the unique position of being a government appointee who has been appointed by three different governments in Ontario: Tory, Liberal and NDP. While I have seen these changes in government, I have seen a remarkable consistency in the attitude of government to higher education. Higher education has become a low political priority. Our share of public funds has been eroded dramatically in the past decade. The youth and future of this province are being ignored.

It has reached the point where Ontario's support for post-secondary students now ranks ninth among the 10 Canadian provinces. For all of us in Ontario, the richest and greatest province in Canada, that amounts to more than an embarrassment; it amounts to self-destruction.

With the dwindling share of funds flowing to higher education, universities in this province have had to make deeper and deeper cuts in our programs. We have now cut so deeply that we are bleeding. The quality of education in Ontario is bleeding. At a time of critical faculty renewal, we are less and less able to attract top international scholars to our faculty. With this loss, we face the further loss of research funds and private sector participation in research projects, all of which would lead to more jobs for Ontarians.

As we sap the quality and vitality of our universities, more than our competitiveness is at stake and more than the future job opportunities of the youth of Ontario. Universities also contribute immeasurably to the quality of life, to research, to culture, to the learning, knowledge, justice and fairness of our society. We cannot afford to see the diminution of higher education in this province.

By the same token, we know we cannot afford to increase deficits to restore university funding. With federal and provincial deficits, we have already mortgaged the future of Ontario's youth. They are the ones who will have to pay. While we hand them a legacy of debt, we are taking away their ability to handle it by letting higher education fall by the wayside. So what Ontario's universities need to get a better share of an existing pie. We need to reallocate funds to education and make it a top priority in the province. I think there is growing support for this, particularly when people come to realize just what is at stake.

Support for our fund-raising efforts at the University of Toronto indicates that the value of higher education is widely appreciated. Students, the University of Toronto has 270,000 alumni, faculty, staff and the private sector have contributed in the past few years $125 million to a broadly based campaign. But how can we go back to the future more if the society we serve keeps hearing signals that there is no future for higher education in this province? We need to pour money back into the foundations or the rest of the structures will collapse. If you do not give higher education a higher priority, Ontario will not have a future; but if you do, if you buck the trend of the past decade, the future will take care of itself.

Dr Prichard: The next presenter will be Ms Bonnie Horne, the president of the University of Toronto Faculty Association.

Ms Horne: As president of the faculty association, I represent the 2,500 faculty members and librarians who work at the University of Toronto. What I want to talk to you about, which is of particular concern to them, is what is happening in terms of the quality of education that is being delivered at our institution. Quality is being sacrificed for quantity, and that has been the situation for quite some time now.

We all understand that having an education at the post-secondary level involves more than just having facts crammed into the heads of students, yet more and more professors are being required to use methods of teaching that result in that kind of delivery of post-secondary education. Gone are the opportunities of the past where, in small classrooms, people were able to engage in lengthy and interesting discussion, where people were required to write lengthy papers and articulate their thoughts in very well thought-out ways. You are now looking at classes of hundreds, and in some cases over a thousand students in a classroom. Just try to picture individual classes that exceed the size of the entire enrolment of the high school that the students have just left when they start their undergraduate education at the University of Toronto.

It is impossible to deliver the quality that we are capable of, and that we know is the best kind of education at the important education that needs to be delivered. More and more of my colleagues are using multiple-choice tests and true-and-false answer papers in order to test the skills and abilities of the students in their classes. They find it unsatisfactory that this is the way they have to measure students' ability. They find it unsatisfactory that they cannot meet with students outside the classroom. They find atisfactory that tutorial classes are now as large as enrolment courses used to be a couple of decades ago.

It is very important that we be aware of just what effect underfunding has had in the day-to-day life of the average undergraduate student at the University of Toronto. I hope in the short time I have been allowed that, with this particular example, I have helped give you an idea of exactly what is going on in the classroom where students from families like yours and the people you represent are now attending university.

Dr Prichard: The next presenter will be Ms Judith Eichenmanis, who is the president of the University of Toronto Staff Association.

Ms Eichenmanis: As president of the University of Toronto Staff Association, I represent some 3,000 administrative staff members. For us the equation is a fairly simple one: Underfunding equals less real income for the universities, equals budget cuts, equals a very overworked and severely stressed administrative staff complement, equals in some cases reduced, and in other cases less efficient and less effective services to faculty and students. So the bottom line is Underfunding equals an inability on our part to perform exactly the way we would like, to do the best job possible for the university. I think that is probably a factor that affects our people even more than job insecurity, which is obviously something they are facing. They are a very loyal, dedicated group and they tend to want to spend their whole careers at the university. They want to do the very best job they can and they are being frustrated in that.

They also have this enormous job insecurity facing them. There are cuts going on, but workers all over Ontario are going through difficult times, so we are not asking for special concessions. We are asking you to believe that there is a problem resulting from underfunding and it is affecting the quality of education in Ontario. We hope you will hear and understand that.

Dr Prichard: The final presenter is Mr Peter Go, who is the president of the students' administrative council of the University of Toronto.

Mr Go: I represent over 32,000 full-time undergraduate students at the University of Toronto, and I want to briefly describe the underfunding crisis as students see it.

The quality of the undergraduate degree has been quickly eroded. Actually, for the last 15 to 20 years, there has been a progressive decline in government support of the universities. I will not bore you or alarm you, as the case may be, with lists of direct consequences of underfunding such as outdated equipment, crumbling buildings or overcrowded classrooms. Rather, I want to point out one poignant example of the deteriorating quality of education and the whole declining student experience at universities.

What has steadily occurred as a result of inadequate funding is a change from learning by a thought-provoking and problem-solving process to learning by memorization and regurgitation. Instead of low student-to-professor ratios, sufficient contact with instructors and stimulating and educational assignments, we students are now relegated to large lectures, sometimes with more than 1,600 students in the classroom, with very little direct assistance, and we are forced to learn by memorizing, on our own, lists of facts and regurgitating those facts on our exam papers.

Not only are the faculty frustrated with this kind of delivery, students are frustrated with receiving this kind of education. The multiple-choice test has never been so popular. In fact, it is now called the "multiple-guess" exam.

This is certainly not the model of quality education that is acceptable to students, parents or taxpayers alike, and it certainly does not bode well for the future competitiveness and wellbeing of our province in terms of a well-educated populace.

The University of Toronto is working very hard with what it has, to provide a quality education, but obviously we do not have enough. Students are also contributing not only in terms of tuition fees, but also in donations to the university. Last year's graduating class raised almost $500,000 in gifts to the university. We in SAC now have a trust fund that is close to $3 million to address the problem of accessibility for people with disabilities.

The faculty and administration are also trying very hard to improve the quality of our education with new initiatives and, unfortunately, scarce funding. We are, as you can see, working very hard but we have not been given enough.

Unless this government wants regurgitative learning and the decline in education at universities to continue, there must be a real commitment to the universities of this province.

I want to reiterate the comments of President Prichard and the members of our group and state that this commitment to universities must come in the form of removing the underfunding deficit.

Dr Prichard: Mr Chairman, as you can see, we are working together at the university from the different constituencies and working hard in difficult circumstances. We are not discouraged, despite our language. Indeed, we are fundamentally optimistic about the long-term possibilities for the university; but we are deeply concerned about the current situation and we want to work with elected representatives of all parties and of all the people of Ontario to develop a plan of renewal and recovery for Ontario's universities. We thank you for this opportunity to continue that effort with this committee.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Dr Prichard. We have about three and a half minutes for questions from each party, so we will start with the third party.

Mrs Cunningham: As usual, it is a pleasure to see the University of Toronto so well represented. I especially appreciated hearing from the faculty association and the students this morning.

The presentation, Mr Chairman, as you and I know, is not new to us, but it is another opportunity to tell the elected representatives how serious things are at the universities. Since time is so short I have two quick questions.

One is from a member of the alumni at the University of Western Ontario who has chosen not to contribute for the first time in some 20 years because of accessibility and because of the complaints that his own family members have had—not unlike your own, Mr Go—in that if the university cannot provide a better quality of education, maybe the reason the government is not supporting universities is that they are doing a fairly good job, but not towards the kinds of things you need, meaning money for faculties but fewer, smaller class sizes. If this is a trend that is beginning, certainly in my job as critic I would like you to comment on that.

The other one is, what kind of response have you had from this government with regard to your renewal plan which was so well presented on your behalf in the pre-budget hearings for the last budget?

Dr Prichard: Maybe I could attempt a brief answer to each of those.

On the first, I think the evidence across North America is clear that great public universities depend on strong private support in order to fully accomplish their missions. At the same time, that strong private support is dependent upon strong public support, and the only way we can produce great universities in Ontario is through a combined effort of public support and private philanthropic support.

One without the other will not do the job. If our potential benefactors lose confidence that the government supports the universities, they also, I believe, will lose confidence. If there is a vote of confidence through the public sector, I believe the private sector will similarly vote with confidence.

With respect to the plan of recovery, at this point—I want to put it carefully. The Treasurer, in his announcement of the transfer payments, indicated a need for a dialogue with the universities in order to develop a plan of renewal, recognizing the need for a multi-year plan of renewal, accepting the deficit in support of the universities and the need for a plan of renewal. At this stage that dialogue is not as advanced as I would hope it would be, and it is our position to the minister and to the government on a regular basis that there is no more important challenge facing the Minister of Colleges and Universities than the development of a plan of renewal and recovery and the gaining of cabinet support for that plan. That is the single most important challenge facing the minister.

There are other issues of concern of course in the university sector, but in our view the single most important matter for the minister and the government is to develop a multi-year plan of renewal, and it is because of this that we urge this committee to continue to watch the government's conduct in this area and to continue to urge the government to develop the plan which the Treasurer himself has indicated is required.

The Vice-Chair: I think you have about half a minute left.

Mrs Cunningham: For me?

The Vice-Chair: Yes.

Mrs Cunningham: That is unusual, is it not? I will ask my next question.

Mr B. Ward: It is so early; it is too early.

Mrs Cunningham: So early in the morning. When we were chatting about this recovery plan, part of that recovery plan was the contribution from students with regard to the tuition fees, and I am aware of other funds, Mr Go, in which students have been particularly wonderful at raising funds, especially for accessibility. The University of Ottawa is another example. I suppose I could direct a question to you.

We are asking the students to contribute in very different ways than we did a decade ago or even two decades ago. They are doing a pretty successful job. The University of Toronto is quite unique, but as I said, there are other universities. How are the students at the University of Toronto now feeling about the recovery plan and the commitment with, I suppose I would have to say, the increase in fees on behalf of students, their contribution?

Mr Go: I think, first, I will address the commitment to an increase in fees and other things and come directly to the tuition fee question.

Students are committing to things like accessibility for persons with a disability because they see value for their money. They see a jewel there that they can contribute to that they know will leave a lasting impact on the universities.

For tuition fees, for them to work in a partnership with people like Rob, people like yourselves, they want to see a real commitment also. We have come forward with a proposal that we would be willing to talk about an increase in fees if we saw a commitment from the government. As far as students at the University of Toronto are concerned, they have been frustrated because they have not seen a commitment to an increase in the funding from the government.

The Vice-Chair: Moving on to the governing part, Mr Ward.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to look at the positive benefits that our budget has implemented in Ontario, and part of that is our capital works projects and initiatives. It has been criticized by some, that either we should not have done it at all or it is wasted money.

In your presentation you mentioned commending the government for receiving some benefits from the anti-recession package. For the benefit of this committee, could you relate what projects or project was implemented through this initiative?

Dr Prichard: Yes. I stand to be corrected by one of my colleagues behind me, but I believe we received a total of just under $6 million in a combination of support for deferred maintenance projects and control of hazardous waste projects. We have a backlog of such projects, as I indicated, over $120 million, individual projects recorded, and this has allowed us to make accelerated progress on the more urgent of those projects. They range from stopping leaking roofs to controlling loose asbestos in buildings, through other essential repair and renovation projects right across the three campuses of the university. So this is essential support and it is for that reason that I made specific note of its importance to us.

Mr Christopherson: Dr Prichard, welcome. It is good to see you again, and your colleagues. Thank you for your presentation, and thank you for your acknowledgement of our ability to maintain at least the level of transfer payments to you and other funding partners. As you know, that was a priority for us before the budget. I think we met that commitment during the budget, and I can respect and appreciate your desire to see that level and more in following budgets.

What I would like to focus on are some of the comments were made regarding the future of the province, the role of our economy vis-à-vis the amount of expertise we have in our province to develop the kind of specialized work, and particularly value added areas, to our economy. I would like to hear in your own words, if you do not mind, for the record and for our own edification, as concisely as possible how you would convince the public that money needs to be spent in the area of education, particularly in post-secondary, if we are to meet the needs of a changing economy where value added means so much. How would you phrase that to make the case to the public to this government to continue to make it a priority and the fact that we really, in our opinion, have no alternative?

Dr Prichard: I am not sure I can do better than the government's own budget, which states the case for the centrality of investments in human capital in an Ontario economy which is going to survive and thrive through constant emphasis on higher value added, whether in services or in products. I think the evidence is unambiguous that the major western nations of the world that outstanding post-secondary institutions are an essential element at the top end of the educational system to pull the entire quality of the educational system forward and to provide the base of highly educated people, the base of research, the base of science, the base of innovation around which a value added economy can grow and thrive.

I do not think we have good examples to the contrary of that proposition. We have many examples. One need only look at California and Massachusetts as two areas of very substantial economic growth arising from a direct connection with housing some of the finest post-secondary institutions in the world. We see that happening in Japan. We see that happening in Germany. We see that happening everywhere that economies are booming. We see it happening in Ontario at present. I do not believe the Ontario strategy for economic renewal and recovery which is set out in the budget can be realized without having a number of outstanding post-secondary institutions in the province.

The Vice-Chair: Moving on to the official opposition.

Mrs Sullivan: I am very interested that once again the University of Toronto is back bringing really a fairly negative message to the people of Ontario about the quality of post-secondary education.

I want to explore with you, in the base funding plan that you have put forward, the $410-million recovery program, and I just do not recall what U of T would see as its fair share of that additional money, if it became available. Where would you see priority in a renewal program? I call programs such as faculty renewal and centres of excellence which injected some capital for a period of time, but where would you see priority as a first step in a multi-year program, and what would U of T see as its fair share of a new injection of funds?

Dr Prichard: Thank you for the question. The University of Toronto represents approximately 20% of the university system in Ontario. Depending on what the rule of allocation is, the share ranges from about 18% to 23% of various different programs, so as a rough approximation, if one takes 20% as the number, it would translate over the multi-year program into about $80 million of base financial support for the university.

What priority would we attach? The proposal made by the Council of Ontario Universities called for each university to develop an individual plan of renewal and recovery which would be developed by a joint committee of staff, students and faculty, and the funds would be held in trust until such a plan was developed and filed, demonstrating exactly how the funds would be spent. As a result, in some sense it is premature for me to say exactly what the priorities would be, because it would come from that joint exercise, but let me say what I would argue for in that process. My colleagues can speak to whether they would endorse these views.

The number one priority—the only priority, I would say—would be that of quality. The single greatest harm to the universities over the past 20 years has been the reduction of quality, and the turnaround will have to come by focusing investments on quality. The single most important such investment we could make, in my view, would be in faculty, in faculty renewal, making more faculty members available to our students, who have increased so hugely in number, such that we could drive down the student-faculty ratio, give more individual contact with faculty members to our students and reduce the scale of the enterprise from the scale described by my colleagues to a more manageable scale, more the scale that any of you who had the privilege of attending university in Ontario once knew as what a university education meant. So for me, the number one investment would be in more faculty to provide better quality to students.

The second area of priority for me would be more support for students through student services; that is, to think only of what happens in the classroom as the core of the education is, I think, an impoverished view of a high-quality education. There is a variety of student services, from counselling to training to placement, through a variety of services which surround and support any extracurricular life of the university. Those have in some sense been hurt even more and they need to be rebuilt through a joint effort of our students and our staff.

So for me, at the University of Toronto—and I speak only for our university and only for myself—quality and focusing on faculty and student support services are the two things that I would assign the highest priority to, but my colleagues may want to endorse or differ on it.

Ms Horne: I would certainly endorse that. I think it was clear that my message had to deal with the first part of that. Just to give you an idea, in spite of the fact that there has been some renewal money put into the institution recently, we are looking at a 10% reduction in the current faculty over the next four to five years in order to meet the budget guidelines that the university has put forward at the moment, at a time when the enrolment is continuing to increase. So even what we view as an unacceptable situation today is going to be worse next year and worse again the year after that, unless something beyond maintaining the status quo is done for our institutions.

Mrs Sullivan: I am surprised that you have not mentioned library books.

The Vice-Chair: Sorry, I am afraid your time is up. I want to thank you very much for making your presentation today, and I know Mrs Cunningham and myself were glad you elaborated when you said the University of Toronto was the most significant university.

LABOUR COUNCIL OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO AND YORK REGION

The Vice-Chair: We will move on to our next presentation, the Labour Council of Metropolitan Toronto and York Region; Pat Clancy, vice-president, and Brenda Wall, executive assistant.

Good morning, and welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Just to let you know, you will have a half-hour altogether for the presentation. The time you use up for your verbal presentation will be subtracted and then the time left will be divided between the three parties for questioning.

Mr Clancy: Thank you very much for having us here today. It is kind of a new role for labour to be here talking to a government that it has confidence in.

We would like to present to you our brief. I am going to ask Brenda Wall, the executive assistant to the president of the labour council, to read the brief, and then we will be prepared to answer any questions that we can answer.

Ms Wall: On behalf of the Labour Council of Metropolitan Toronto and York Region, we are pleased to have an opportunity to address this committee regarding a matter of crucial importance to our membership, namely, the Ontario budget.

The Labour Council of Metro Toronto and York Region represents approximately 180,000 members in over 400 affiliated local unions throughout this region. Our members have been hit hard by the recession and have suffered greatly at the hands of federal Tory economic policies. Therefore, we are very pleased to discuss our view of the Ontario budget and its implications for working people and the citizens of this province.

The current recession is the worst recession in Ontario since the Great Depression and has had a devastating effect on working people everywhere. Estimates of job losses in the first year of the recession range from 215,000 up to 323,000 throughout Ontario. Those are figures that have been given to us recently by the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto. Similarly, estimates in the Toronto area run close to 135,000 in the same period, March 1990 to March 1991.

These figures are hard to comprehend, yet we have certainly witnessed the effect within our labour council membership. Thousands of workers are coming to us for assistance through our Metro Labour Education and Skills Training Centre, a special workers' education centre servicing the needs of employed and unemployed workers. They are the victims of the devastation in the manufacturing sector, and in this region they are older workers, immigrant workers, workers of colour and workers with low-level literacy skills.

The elimination of manufacturing jobs is significant. In 1981, one in every four jobs was in manufacturing, in Ontario and in Toronto. By 1986, a little over one in every five jobs was in manufacturing. In the first quarter of 1991, less than one in every six jobs is in manufacturing; this has happened very quickly and it has had an effect on the entire economy. These manufacturing jobs are difficult to replace. They have traditionally been much higher-paying jobs than in most other sectors.

What is different about this recession too is that the jobs are gone for ever. In 1982, 24% of layoffs were due to shutdowns. In 1990, 65% of reported permanent layoffs were due to partial or complete closures. Business bankruptcies as well as personal bankruptcies have increased tremendously as a result of the recession.

In March 1991 the unemployment rate in greater Toronto reached 10.1%, and even this figure is misleading. What is not evident in the numbers is the amount of part-time, low-wage employment that working people now have to endure just to survive in the economy. For thousands who are still jobless in this city, however, they are being added to the welfare rolls and the ranks of the poor and the homeless. In May 1991 in Toronto we had 124,000 people on welfare every month, 120,000 people on family benefits allowance, over 175,000 people on Ontario Works, almost one in five on some form of social assistance in the Metro area.

It comes as no surprise to us that Brian Mulroney is fighting against the Ontario government's budget. That is because this budget is trying to do something different, trying to fight the recession rather than worry about the deficit. The federal government, on the other hand, pushes ahead with its agenda on behalf of big business. Its aim is not to satisfy the most basic social and economic needs of ordinary Canadians, but rather to maximize the profits of wealthy investors and allow them to restructure the economy according to their priorities. All of their policies and actions, which have led us into this recession, have been based on this premise.

The federal government has carried out cutbacks which have hurt all Canadians, but they have cost Ontario the most. Cutbacks to established programs, to the Canada assistance plan and other programs will cost the people of Ontario over $1.6 billion. The result is increased pressure on the provincial programs, such as welfare and social services, which are designed to alleviate poverty. The freeze on established programs financing could well mean the gradual death of medicare as a national program enjoyed equally by all of us by the 1996-97 fiscal year.

One of the major reasons for the loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs in this country, and in particular in this region, has been the free trade agreement. Let's look at the myths created by the federal government when it signed the deal.

First is the myth of job creation. The federal government's predictions for employment growth under the free trade deal kept getting revised downwards, but at one time they predicted 350,000 new jobs. Even by conservative estimates, the Canadian Labour Congress indicated that up until early 1991 there have been 226,000 job losses directly attributable to the free trade deal. This does include those lost in spinoff industries as a result of plant closures.

As we have indicated, the effect on the economy as a whole is almost immeasurable. When people do not have jobs, they do not buy goods and services. Unemployment in the construction trades is running from 40% to 80%. Mail stores and small service industries have been closed down all over the country.

The promise around our social safety net can be similarly exposed. The truth is that we have seen massive cuts in social programs as well as other cutbacks and clawbacks.

We were also promised the best training and adjustment measures in the western world by the Tories, but to the victims of free trade and plant closures are still waiting. In fact, according to the unemployed workers who come to our centre, access to training and adjustment programs is severely limited even where programs exist. Rigid criteria in the vast majority of programs and services, lack of available training seats and unnecessarily high entrance requirements are the norm. This is even worse for immigrant workers, who also face systemic racism, sexism and ageism when attempting to access programs.

Right now we are faced with the prospect of the Canada-Mexico free trade agreement. In our view, this will mean the same for working people in this region as the current free trade deal has meant: that is, jobs lost as companies flee the north; big business pressure to limit and cut back on social programs that provide a so-called subsidy to Canadian employers; increased pressure on cultural programs and supports; and a willingness to march to the tune of economic policies dictated by American corporations. After the devastation caused by the current deal, it is hard to believe that this government is willing to submit the Canadian population to further suffering. There is no concern expressed for whether the continued exploitation of Mexican workers or the possible effects on Canadian workers. We are pleased to see that the Ontario government has come out early against the extension of the deal to Mexico.

The imposition of the goods and services tax by the federal government is just another example of placing the burden on to individual Canadians and away from corporations. It involves a massive shift in tax burden and represents a massive attack on working people, the poor and the general population, just at a time when suffering is at its worst.

It has become clear to all that this regressive tax is hurting people even worse than predicted. According to the GST consumer information office, the average family will pay an extra $570 a year in GST, about 50% more than predicted in government studies used to argue for its introduction.

The NDP government in Ontario has done all it can to raise objections and refused to harmonize Ontario's retail sales tax with the GST and refused to piggyback the provincial sales tax on top of it. This has meant a saving of $70 million a year, money which stays in the pockets of Ontarians.

High interest rates hurt working people and hurt the economy, despite what the federal government has claimed. They have continued with their dual policies of high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar and as a consequence have added to the devastation of the economy of Canada. They claimed that high interest rates are necessary to fight inflation, to support the Canadian dollar and to attract investment. Instead, the high interest rates have added significantly to business costs by raising the cost of capital and they have killed jobs in this country. They have maintained the Canadian dollar at artificially high levels, especially vis-à-vis the United States. This undercuts the competitiveness of Canadian goods and services in the US and adds to the devastation caused by the free trade deal.

It is in the context of all these regressive economic policies imposed upon us by the federal government that we must view the Ontario budget. We believe that it is a step in the right direction, not only for our members but for the entire population of this province. In the context of the recession and federal government cutbacks, the provincial government had to make some tough choices. In putting the wellbeing of people before the deficit, they moved in the opposite direction to the Tories. Mulroney's answer is to raise taxes and cut services, making the recession worse. The answer of the Ontario government is to fight the recession through:

- Sustaining and creating 70,000 jobs, so the province lost 260,000 instead of 330,000. Or, if you take the larger figures that we have heard recently, lost 330,000 instead of 400,000 jobs;

- Undertaking the most aggressive anti-recession effort in all of Canada through increasing overall spending by 13.4%;

- Creating the $700-million anti-recession program. When combined with the contributions of local government and agencies, total spending will exceed $900 million;

- Maintaining health care and education despite cutbacks from the federal Tory government;

- Responding to the need for action in such areas as worker protection, pay equity, social assistance reform, affordable housing and the environment;

- Putting spending power in the hands of Ontarians. By not imposing the provincial sales tax on the GST, $470 million will be left in the pockets of consumers in 1991 and enriching the Ontario tax reduction for low-income earners;

- Creating a $215-million social assistance reform package that is designed to provide benefits for those who are in greatest need, to help people get into the labour force, to increase fairness and accessibility and provide further relief to overburdened municipalities;

- Providing providing tax relief for the poorest of Ontarians by initiating the largest enrichment program in the history of the Ontario tax reduction program. This $50-million enrichment means the number of low-income earners whose Ontario income tax will be eliminated or reduced will increase to 700,000 for the 1991 tax year;

- Allocating $48 million in 1991-92 to help lay the groundwork for self-government and resolution of land claims for support for research and negotiations; $30 million to be spent on community infrastructure such as waste and sewer systems; and $5 million for 400 new child care spaces on reserves;

- Allocating an additional $12 million for new shelter beds and enhanced services for women who are victims of domestic violence and an increase of more than $8 million to expand and enhance services to women and children who are victims of sexual assault;

A sum of $125 million will be made available to Ontario's transfer agencies, to both major and other agencies, to assist them with the cost of pay equity;

An unprecedented level of provincially supported housing activity for the development of another 10,000 non-profit housing units which will cost the province approximately $150 million in annual operating subsidies when completed.

Big business spokespersons, the media and the opposition parties have all criticized the budget for its deficit. When the NDP came into government, it discovered that the budgetary surplus confidently predicted by the Peterson Liberals was a $2.5-billion deficit. Since then, facing the worst recession in 50 years, the government has made tough choices while managing taxpayers' money carefully and compassionately.

In all of the discussion of the province's budgetary deficit, little attention has been paid to its causes. Most of the deficit comes from the financial reality of the recession: falling revenues, increasing costs in health care, social services and education. A very large part of it is the impact of federal transfer payment cuts. The cumulative impact of federal cutbacks in established programs financing is costing Ontario $3.6 billion in 1991-92 alone. Last year, provincial revenues fell at the same time as more people required social assistance. We have documented the situation in the Toronto area above.

Ontario's projected deficit of $9.7 billion is moderate if considered in perspective with the record of recent Conservative governments. The Ontario deficit is comparatively low in terms of total spending, in terms of gross domestic product and in per capita terms with other provinces and with federal governments under Conservative governments. The Ontario Federation of Labour has documented this in its brief.

Spending now is critical to stimulating economic growth, to responsible fiscal management and to helping our fellow citizens in difficult economic circumstances. As the figures above demonstrate, Ontario spending is not out of control. In fact, it is less than other provincial governments spent to get out of the last recession.

Ontario's public debt charges, the interest cost of carrying its debt, are low as a share of its total revenues. The federal government spends 36 cents of every dollar of revenue as interest on its debt, spending which only serves to benefit investors and bond dealers. In contrast, Ontario spends less than 10 cents of every dollar of revenue on interest costs, less than every province except Alberta and British Columbia. These costs will rise to 11.6 cents next year, still far below the federal rate and less than the debt charges of most provinces.

Ontario lost its triple A rating, but so did the Liberal government when it first came to power. They did not regain it until four years later.

The Ontario government has got a bad rap for this budget from much of the corporate press, but there are many other who believe the government is to be commended for its initiatives. Working people in our community believe that this budget is a step in the right direction, and there have been others who have indicated their support, including the TD Bank, with its guarded support, and recently the Conference Board of Canada, and even more recently than that a list of progressive economists including Mel Watkins and other high-profile economists in this country.

In conclusion, we would like to thank the government of Ontario for holding public hearings on the budget and providing us with an opportunity to present our views. Our members are well aware that Ontario's economy, like other economies around the world, is undergoing, and needs, restructuring. We want an efficient economy which provides secure, well-paid jobs at high levels of employment. We want an economy which is highly productive yet is environmentally as well as socially sustainable, an economy in which the benefits of growth are shared fairly. In our view, this budget is a major step in the right direction. It represents an investment in the people of Ontario to lay the groundwork for sustainable prosperity in the 1990s.

The Vice-Chair: We have about three and a half minutes per party for questioning, starting with the governing party.

Mr Christopherson: There has been a lot of concentration on the deficit number of $9.7 billion itself. Many in the business community are hollering that this is going to weaken the economy so badly that business, along with money, will flee to other places. The net result will be a loss of jobs. As an organization that represents 180,000 working people, a credible, sophisticated organization which has the means to research and do its homework on these matters, why does it not share this vision of impending doom with regard to jobs in this community as it relates to the budget?

Mr Clancy: I do not think we can really say we do not see some impending doom, but we really do not see the impending doom being caused by the spending of the government in its first budget. We do not see that getting into deficit is the reason why we are going to lose jobs in Ontario.

I think we have a much worse enemy than any deficit that the Ontario budget could have created, and that deficit happened to be the gentleman who sits in Ottawa and constantly tries to erode the whole protection we have as a country as far as workers are concerned. We have lost more jobs because of the free trade agreement than we will ever lose by a deficit the province is going to create as a government.

With the impending free trade deal with the Mexicans and Americans, we are still going to have that kind of problem. On a positive note, we feel the government has moved forward in the area where it could move forward and supported workers in the public service, and in supporting workers in the public service it at least has shown to other workers that we have a government that is interested in workers.

It is sad that the government does not have the opportunity to do some of the things in the short time it has been in government that we expected it will be able to accomplish long term, as far as job protection and other things like it are concerned.

Mr B. Ward: Since these hearings have taken place this week, I have been amazed at the number of groups that have come out in support of the budget and of diverse backgrounds, from accounting and from social groups. Just yesterday a business organization came out and commended the Treasurer.

We had one economist give a brief. I was a little concerned by his view of a particular segment. I would like to focus on the impact the federal policies would have on Ontario, and you touched on it. This economist, from a well-known brokerage firm, stated that the high dollar and high interest rates really did not have much of an impact on Ontario's economy. I was just wondering if you can expand on what you stated. What is your view of that comment?

Mr Clancy: I am not sure who the economist was, but I think we have run into a situation, again with high interest rates, and not, as economists and the government like to say, high interest rates that the market determined; but high interest rates foisted on us by the Bank of Canada that were put there mechanically. They were not interest rates that had anything to do with what the marketplace was doing or anything else. Those interest rates certainly made it difficult in Canada and especially in Ontario in the area of construction, house building and things like that.

I really do not want to constantly criticize the federal government, but with the economic policy of the federal government, what else can you do in this country but criticize the federal government? It certainly has done more than any group in the world to destroy the fabric of Canada, both economically and socially. Those kinds of policies have made it impossible, really, for an economy to grow.

With putting that kind of cap on the ability of an economy to grow and then undermining that economy even more, and the people who depend on that economy, the workers in this country, by allowing a free trade agreement where we made a level playing field for the Americans but forgot to put a spot on that level playing field for Canadians, I am not sure anybody can say that interest rates really did not impact on the slowdown of growth in Ontario. I am not really sure what that economist said, because I have not heard any of his remarks, but you cannot have a manufactured interest rate that has nothing to do with the marketplace that is not going to stifle the economy.

Mr Phillips: I was interested in your opening comments about the confidence you have in the government. This was just a bit curious to me. When the government came in, I think the unemployment rate in Ontario was the lowest in all of Canada. Now there is a lower unemployment rate in at least four of the other provinces, in spite of full employment and all those other things. So the working people of Ontario, which is everybody, I guess, will also be looking at the ability of this budget to kind of turn the economy around. I guess that will be a measure that we will probably be talking about with you next year.

I think we have kind of seen two kind of responses to the budget now. There is a pattern emerging from these hearings. One group will come and say, "Listen, the budget is going to do nothing to get the economy rolling again, and all those who rely on the government for assistance are going to be worse off because there won't be the ability of the economy to fund their programs." Others say: "This budget is great. It will get the economy going. We love it." It is a bit like forecasting weather, because probably we will not know for another year, but how will the government sustain your confidence? What will things look like a year from now as a result of this budget that the labour council of Ontario will say, "Yes, this budget has worked"?

Mr Clancy: I do not want to try to use a crystal ball. I think we really have to take a look at what this government has done initially in saving about 70,000 jobs in the public service, what it has done in providing incentives for construction and for work programs in a period of time when the economy was in a downspin and everybody was saying to the government, "You can't spend money." I think a government with the intelligence to take a look at what really needed to be done and the courage to do that is a government that gets confidence from workers.

One of the reasons we really do not see the great swell of confidence from workers is because really, with great respect to the press and those people who own the press, this government does not get the kind of publicity the opponents of this government get. It is far easier in this society, with this government, which is doing things that are non-traditional in the role of the governments we have had since I was a boy, Liberal and Conservative governments—this government has taken some initiatives to try to help working people in this society through this difficult period of recession. Not so with Conservative or Liberal governments that have been around since I was a young fellow. I think that gives us a great reason to have confidence in the government, and not only confidence in what it is doing today, but confidence in what we see it will be able to do in the future because of those kinds of initiatives and that kind of thinking.

The Vice-Chair: We only have time for a very brief question and a brief response.

Mr Phillips: How would we explain the unemployment rate, then, going from the lowest in Canada?

Mr Clancy: That is very simple to answer. I really wonder why somebody who deals with the public interest, as you do, would not know the answer to that. First of all, the unemployment rate is geared to the fact of the competition created by free trade, the competition that is being created by the fixed interests that have caused companies to leave and go wherever they thought there was a better climate to do business, to Mexico, to the United States, those kinds of things. The previous governments protected the workers from allowing that to happen.

Mr Phillips: But that would be true across Canada.

Mr Clancy: Not so much as here, because this is generally the base of Canada.

Ms Wall: If I could just complete the answer to that question. If you look at the past year, it is not the Ontario government that created that rise in unemployment. It started during the height of the recession. Early 1991 is when it really started to hit. Those factors have nothing to do with the Ontario government. They have to do with the federal government's policies and, combined with the free trade agreement, the recession.

Mr Sterling: I guess if I were a businessman and had money to invest, I would look at various areas I could make profit in. We have had evidence in this committee that business is getting a return of about 4% profit on the gross domestic product of this province at this time. While wages have increased significantly over the last 20 years, profits have dropped significantly for business owners.

We have a budget in Ontario with a $9.7-billion deficit, a $7.8-billion deficit over the next few years. If I am an investor and am looking at this jurisdiction, I am saying: "I can only make 4% on my money if I come here. I can only expect higher provincial taxes because this government is running up the debt." Why would you invest in Ontario if you had some money to place here?

Mr Clancy: If I were an investor and looked at the 20-year record you just spoke about, I would probably be more convinced that this could be a place where I could invest. In 20 years, if my ability to earn interest on my investment put me in a position where I was down to 4%, because 20 years ago it was a hell of a lot more than that—I do not know the exact figures, but I also know what wages were 20 years ago. Corporations were making more money than that 4%, and I am taking your figures of 4% as being accurate. If the governments of this province have put us in that bad position and I were going to be the investor, I might be hesitant, but not on the record of this government. I think I would be more hesitant on the record of the governments that put that kind of situation in place.

I do not see how you can lay 20 years of history on a government that has been in place for nine months. The government is creating a deficit that it feels comfortable it can reduce over the next few years by $2 billion. I think that is really a comfortable position for somebody coming in as an investor. I think that is something that would be comfortable.

We have been overtaxed for years, but I do not think it was this government that put in the taxes that have overtaxed us for years. If I were really concerned about investors, I would be coming here from a different perspective. I am here representing workers, not investors, and as far as the people I represent, this government is doing something the other governments did not have the courage or the initiative to do. From this we will see a stronger economy grow in Ontario, and it will grow on the basis of those kinds of initiatives. That kind of stronger economy is going to attract, not detract. Investors are going to come to this community to invest their money. I do not see anything this government is doing right now that is going to drive away investment. I think there are a heck of a lot of other things that have happened, not by this government, that have caused investment to go south.

TORONTO-CENTRAL ONTARIO BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES COUNCIL

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation is by Tony Michael, business manager of the Toronto-Central Ontario Building and Construction Trades Council. Do we have a couple of other people making the presentation?

Mr Michael: One other, I guess.

The Vice-Chair: I guess this other person is a stranger to these committees either.

Mr Michael: He is not a stranger to me either.

The Vice-Chair: If Mr Michael and Mr Majeski would like to begin your presentation.

Mr Michael: As usual, I will read it out and have questions after. To the Chair and members of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, the Toronto Central Ontario Building and Construction Trades Council is pleased to submit our views and those of our council members on the issue of the 1991 Ontario budget. The council represents approximately 40,000 construction workers in the industrial, commercial, institutional and residential construction sectors. It is composed of 31 affiliates.

My name is Tony Michael and I represent the Toronto Central Ontario Building and Construction Trades Council whose major construction unions are facing a devastating amount of unemployment. Unlike the last recession, there have been no federal initiatives to create employment as a stopgap measure. When coupled with the Tories' financial cutbacks of transfer payments, construction workers are deeply affected. Many of them are reliant upon social assistance for the first time.

We would like to start off by saying categorically and unequivocally that we, as 40,000 unionized construction workers in the Toronto-central Ontario region publicly support the initiatives taken by the current government in its 1991 Ontario budget. We want to make it crystal clear that we totally disagree with some of the spokespersons of the business community who have been sounding off alarm bells and spilling crocodile tears regarding the increase of the provincial deficit.

The name that quickly comes to mind is Conrad Black whose only claim to fame in Ontario was the selling off and dismantling the Dominion store chain. Conrad Black's blatant attempt to cheat thousands of employees of millions of dollars of surplus pension funds clearly exposes him as a fat cat with no social conscience.

Therefore, we are very sceptical about the current criticism led by both the media and the other provincial opposition parties, considering this government inherited a financial mess from the previous Liberal government to the tune of approximately $2 billion. Compounded by the federal government's high interest policy, the GST and the disastrous free trade agreement which in reality have caused havoc in the Ontario economy, we take this criticism with a fair dose of scepticism and think the old adage, "People who live in glass houses shouldn't throw stones," is totally applicable to the rhetorical lambasting of the political opposition parties.

Clearly this government had two choices. One was to cut back on government funding and plunge the province even further into recession, which is already in a disastrous state, or it could do the responsible thing and try to kickstart the economy with some badly needed infusion of government funding of crucial segments of the Ontario economy which is exactly how the Conservative government under Bill Davis responded to the recession in the early 1980s.

It is kind of odd that there are two perceptions about the Ontario economy and the current provincial deficit. On the one hand you have some corporate spokespersons being very critical of the budget, whereas the Conference Board of Canada, not exactly left wing, is very positive about the 1991 budget. One clearly has the option of either listening to the Conrad Blacks of the world or the prestigious Conference Board of Canada. We think the latter is a more credible source of financial analysis with respect to the government's budget.

Before we address the specifics of the Ontario budget, I think it is both important and relevant to discuss the role of the federal government because we feel some of the major problems in Ontario are a direct result of the Mulroney government's fiscal and monetary policy. It is ironic that the state of the Ontario economy is a direct result of the USA-Canada free trade agreement that has virtually decimated the manufacturing sector in Ontario, i.e., a loss of approximately 240,000 jobs. This was further compounded by the federal government's slavish adherence to high interest rates and their infamous revenue-neutral goods and services tax, which has been an unmitigated disaster in certain sectors, i.e., the housing sector and construction in general. What we find hard to swallow is the federal government policies which on one hand virtually brought the current Ontario economy to a standstill, while on the other the GST is a federal cash cow bringing in billions and billions of tax dollars above projected GST revenues. At the same time the federal government is actually cutting back on transfer payments to provinces in the areas of health, education and social programs. This GST revenue generated by taxing consumers and average Canadian taxpayers while virtually leaving the business community off the hook in terms of its corporate responsibilities.

We also agree that by putting spending power in the hands of the public by not imposing the provincial sales tax and the GST, $470 million will be available for consumers to spend in 1991. This kind of economic stimulus, when coupled with the sustaining and creating of 70,000 jobs and an aggressive anti-recession effort, instils confidence in the private sector. It acts as a catalyst for further investment and helps to level out the worst effects of the recession on construction.

It surely gets one to wondering what Mulroney's vision of national unity is if, in the final analysis, the working people of this country are losing jobs in record numbers as thousands upon thousands of firms are going bankrupt. This, in real, human terms, means that tens of thousands of Canadians have to suffer the many indignities attributed to unemployment.

We believe the Ontario deficit has to be seen within a larger context, and within that larger framework we do not see how the government has any other choice but to increase government spending and increase the provincial deficit.

This is a made-in-Canada recession. High interest rates and the high dollar caused the recession to hit Canada first. The long-range indicators in the United States are predicting a slow and uneven recovery. In particular, the industrialized northeast will be the last to receive the benefits of recovery.

This slow and uneven recovery as predicted usually has a mirror-image effect in Canada. One can expect, then, that Ontario, the major manufacturing centre in Canada along with Quebec, may have a similar sluggish recovery.

You have no doubt been bombarded by statistics showing this is the worst recession Ontario has experienced since the 1930s. Without repeating the statistics let me make it clear that one cannot view this budget without taking into consideration the severity of the recession. From our particular point of view, that of construction, the major industrial restructuring occurring simultaneously with the downturn in the economy has implications beyond the manufacturing sector. It directly affects construction. One needs only to look at the housing market and the fact that the government has less money to maintain and improve the infrastructure.

We now want to turn to specific items in the budget which we think are very positive for us as construction workers. Let us start off by saying we welcome the budget initiatives regarding affordable housing, especially in the co-op and non-profit housing sector, which will provide 20,000 much-needed jobs in the housing sector. We say this for two reasons. First, these housing units address the serious question of housing affordability. Second, this type of economic stimulus also provides for much-needed jobs in the housing sector.

We also welcomed the announcement of another 10,000 non-profit units over and above the original allocation of 35,000 co-op and non-profit units, which we think is another positive aspect of the budget. We applaud the provincially supported housing initiatives. The development of another 10,000 non-profit housing units has a tremendous and positive effect on the construction industry. Building statistics indicate that for every unit slightly over two jobs are created. In addition, one must see the initiatives in housing as having a ripple effect on the economy. It creates a demand for building materials, for the construction of roads, sewers, watermains, etc.

In summary, we are extremely pleased with the social housing initiatives, but we also think it is both timely and appropriate to say that we also do not think the role of the private home builders should be either overlooked or underestimated in the overall housing sector, especially in a mixed economy such as Ontario. There is a very important role for the private housing market, and the question of affordability is an issue that has to be addressed by this government and by the private housing sector. We do not think it is an either/or situation when it comes to housing. We believe social housing and market housing have a vital role to play in the Ontario economy.

While we are on the issue of housing, we also have many reservations about some of the major impediments or issues facing the housing industry, especially the question of municipal lot levies. We say this because this whole question of municipal education lot levies, development charges, is seriously hurting the housing sector and is producing a negative impact on the whole concept of affordability. Thus, we think this government should seriously look at this issue.

Last, the whole question of streamlining the land approvals process has to be seriously looked at, because the present land approval process negatively affects the delivery of social housing as well as market housing. We urge this government to seriously review the whole land approval process. Furthermore, even though it is not a direct budgetary issue, it ultimately has long-term effects on the housing industry in terms of Ontario capital expenditure, both public and private.

We welcome the government's commitment to provide $4.3 billion in capital expenditures for public facilities such as schools, hospitals and transportation systems, plus the additional $300 million in capital funding allotted for schools committed for 1994 and 1995, which we feel will provide a much-needed stimulus to the construction industry.

One final comment on the capital expenditures which concern us is the whole question of revising the currently outdated provincial fair wage policy. We, as unionized construction workers, are very much concerned about the current outdated provincial fair wage policy which, for your information, is now five years out of date. Moreover, we urge this government to revise and update the provincial fair wage policy as well as making sure that any new provincial fair wage policy is both monitored and enforced.

As construction workers, we welcome the initiatives on the employee wage protection program and we think it is high time employees now have some protection against pay claims by bankrupt employers and businesses. We also welcome the labour market adjustment initiative to help workers access and re-enter the job market and improve their skills.

We welcome the $700-million anti-recession program which, when combined with the local municipal government agencies' contributions, will total approximately $900 million. Just for your information, this $700-million program is presently being implemented, resulting in the creation of thousands of unionized construction jobs across Ontario. As construction workers, this represents responsible government, as it represents concrete advances in terms of actual new construction created from the government's anti-recession program and not rhetoric.

In essence, we feel very positive about these specific budget initiatives and for the record we commend the Ontario government for also introducing specific policies which will address the following issues: prevention of violence against women, financial assistance to farmers, helping and addressing the very special and unique needs of the aboriginal people and the people in the north, provision of loans and loan guarantees to small and medium-sized manufacturing firms, and we very strongly support the municipal programs regarding the whole environmental question.

We are not suggesting it is the duty of government to recklessly try to spend its way out of a recession. As James Frank, chief economist and vice-president of the Conference Board of Canada noted, a decreased deficit would have had an adverse effect on the economy in Ontario and in Canada. In fact, the deficit is modest, especially when one considers the conservative figures which were used in projecting the continued deficit over the coming years.

As you know and have no doubt heard from other presenters, most of the deficit comes from the financial reality of the recession: falling revenues and increasing costs in health care, social services and education. These ongoing costs have been exacerbated by the federal cutbacks.

If one considers the Ontario deficit comparatively, in terms of total spending, gross domestic product and in per capita terms, with other provinces and with the federal government under the Mulroney Conservatives, the present deficit fares well. This is one case where a comparison is not odious but instructive.

In summary, we think the 1991 provincial budget is balanced and large a very positive budget and we want to go on public record as being supportive of both the budget and the provincial government. Thank you.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Michael. We have about three and a half to four minutes per party for questioning, starting with the official opposition.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Michael, I was a little disturbed by some of your comments in that all the wisdom seemed to be on one side. In other words, everything anyone else said that was opposed to what you say is bad and what you say is good. I will give you an example. You talk about the financial mess of the previous Liberal government to the tune of approximately $2 billion. I do not want to quarrel with that. I mean, the number was a manufactured number by the Treasurer and whether it is a true number or not there is no sense arguing about it. The point is, why is a $2-billion deficit, whether it is true or not, a mess, where a $9.7-billion deficit is not a mess? It is a great thing. It is wonderful. It is something that you encourage.

Mr Michael: One reason is that a $2-billion mess was a lie. It was never announced or never presented.

Mr Phillips: It was what?

Mr Michael: It was a lie, because we were told through the media and through other sources that there was money there, not a deficit.

Mr Kwinter: The point is that when you project a deficit, as you do in your business or any other organization it is a long-term plan of what you expect will happen. Even in business, every organization at the end of that time, if it is lucky, and it really is luck, is bang on. Usually they are off. They may have either overestimated or underestimated.

I suggest to you, sir, with respect, that the $9.7 billion come March 31 next year, will not be the number. It will be some other number. If they are lucky, it will be lower and my prediction is it will be considerably higher. You do not say the Treasurer was a liar. They use the best information they have a year ahead of time as to what they think is going to happen.

My question is, when you talk about these things, there are contradictions throughout. On the one hand you say it is a made-in-Canada recession and on the other hand you talk about the problems in the United States and its recession. Did we have any impact on the recession in the United States? All of these things impact on the credibility of the arguments.

Where would you be without James Frank? Heaven must have sent him, because every single presenter who is reporting the budget zeroes in on James Frank and totally counts everybody else. They discount the rating series, they discount every other organization that is critical, as if to say: "What do those guys know? James Frank is the man who knows everything about anything. If he says it's great, then we think it's great too."

Mr Michael: We could have quoted Galbraith too, I guess. We left him out because I guess he now lives in the United States, but he is a Canadian. I guess we could have quoted Mel Watkins and a few others, but we just stuck with the one.

Mr Kwinter: Totally impartial.

Mr Majesky: I guess, Monte, with great respect, if we had quoted Mel, you would have said, "There was some specialist that you sneaked in through the back door." I thought the comparison was quite credible, Conrad Black versus the Conference Board of Canada. The brief very clearly said, "Would you take Conrad Black's vision of the world or that of Peters?" We opted for that of Peters. You can take that for what it is worth, but that is what we said in the brief.

Mr Kwinter: Why do you have to exclusively zero in on two individuals, either one?

Mr Majesky: I guess if we had the time, we probably could have come up with others, but the brief happened to be them.

Mr Phillips: Just a quick question, and that is around these, which I think are quite important to your members.

Mr Michael: That is what we were talking about.

Mr Phillips: Only a year from now will we know, but in June every single province in the country improved its employment rate except Ontario. In June Ontario's unemployment rate went up. So at least maybe there is a question that says in terms of the economic stability and growth in the province, the government may not be on the right track. I know it may be a little bit early. In terms of our members getting jobs, are you convinced, Tony, that this budget is the budget that will ensure that your membership has the best economic outlook?

Mr Michael: It is the best we have on the table right now, yes.

Mr Phillips: It is the only one.

The Vice-Chair: I am sorry, Mr Phillips. I cannot allow you to continue. Your time is up.

Mr Phillips: A year from now, I guess we will know.

The Vice-Chair: Moving on to the third party, Mrs Cunningham.

Mrs Cunningham: Just sort of a philosophical statement to start with. I think all of us realize that things are not easy in Ontario right now. There is a lot of unemployment, even in the construction trades. I am from London and have met with a lot of small business people who are involved in construction and with their workers who do not have jobs. We were particularly happy to get a couple of road projects in the city. One of them is still being held up.

It has been held up for eight months because of the environmental issue that we are dealing with the government on with regard to noise and pollution, which we have been through for two whole years. The city has had to spend $200,000 for more studies which will not do anything, and our construction people are not working, even though that program has been announced. There has been no money spent, and we cannot get started on a major construction program.

I do not think the problems we have in Ontario are going to be solved by standing up for one party or another party any more. I think it is going to take all of us working together to come forth with solutions for the very significant problems that we have. I am the mother of two boys who had jobs in the construction industry for the last four summers, and they did not get them this summer. That is how bad things are in London. I am speaking from the heart, obviously.

Mr Majesky: What is the question?

Mr Michael: I guess if all the parties were working together as they should be, then we would not be here today.

Mrs Cunningham: No, I do not think it is that simple in Ontario. I must say that I have been an opposition member here for four years now and I think I have had a positive contribution. I do not think that if we continue bashing any government, the previous government—I am a Conservative and I am saying this—we are going anywhere in Ontario.

I am happy for your remarks on page 8 where you talk about the private housing market and say you think the role of private home builders should not be either overlooked or underestimated. They will be speaking to us later on today, so we will hear from them.

I am pleased you have noted some of the initiatives of this government, but I have been here for four years and all of those programs have been supported in the four years I have been here and I hope they can be supported more.

I will say that the one thing that has been missing in the briefs before this committee, with the exception of the last one, is a cry from the public for efficiency in government. That, I think, is missing, and I think any member here would agree with me that we have a lot of work to do in providing efficient programs that support the real world, and that is the world of work, so that we can be competitive. That is the kind of stuff I was hoping to see, some ideas. On the other hand, there are four or five suggestions that we will take to our caucus as a result of your brief.

I guess I am not asking questions.

The Vice-Chair: You are making a comment; fine.

Mrs Cunningham: I have four or five positive suggestions from it, and I will take it and raise it as an opposition member in assisting the government in your policies. So I thank you for that.

Mr Michael: On behalf of the council, I also thank you.

Mr Jamison: I apologize for coming in a little late. I have a question and it deals with the amount of money that has been spent on infrastructure, housing, whatever. Just to get an idea, would you be able to tell me what the situation would be without this type of assistance in spending?

Mr Michael: Just very basically, it would be a heck of a lot worse. Taking one example, there is the creation of 20,000 jobs by the starting of the 10,000 units. That goes on. There are other examples of the same thing that would not have got started. There are a lot of developers sitting on very expensive land and it is costing them X thousands of dollars per week just to keep sitting there. This incentive initiative has got them going. They are building this kind of housing on that kind of land. That puts our people to work and it puts private industry into a working mode. So yes, there are all kinds of things that have started from that point. Some may say, "Well, it is very small," but listen, a little bit is better than none at all. This is exactly what we are very pleased to see.

Mr Majesky: Let me draw it into even sharper focus, because Monte and Gerry and I have been around before. Local 183 of the Labourers, about 17,000 strong—

Mr Michael: One of our affiliates by the way.

Mr Majesky: One of the affiliates of the building and trades council. Probably we are looking at 60% to 70% unemployment. Those are figures that I have never seen in my 25 years in the construction industry in Toronto.

Mr Kwinter: Is that now?

Mr Majesky: Right now.

Mr Michael: We have 40% unemployment.

Mr Majesky: Yes, so these 20,000 units in our area—clearly understanding, and I am not politically stupid, that there was an initiation on the part of the previous government, but these kinds of initiatives at least take the sting out of that to put these labourers back to work. We have labourers who have never seen welfare in their lives, ever, culturally and for a whole bunch of reasons, who are on our welfare, so these kinds of things, when you look at them, are real and very positive. I am not saying that they are 100% back to work, but 20,000 units puts some of the guys back to work, and the units are built by the private sector. They build it and the private sector are the builders, so they are both happy in that respect. I do not want to belabour it. That just puts it into a clearer focus.

Mr Michael: Many of these construction workers have run out of UI benefits, and it did not help to have those cutbacks that came through recently, because it put them on the welfare rolls. As Wally just pointed out, many of these construction workers have never experienced that kind of humiliation, if you wish. They want jobs at what they are good at, at what they are trained for and so on. This is kick-starting it, if nothing else, getting in the right way.

Mr B. Ward: We were told by Local 183 that because of the initiatives, unemployment has turned around into employment.

Mr Michael: Exactly.

Mr B. Ward: Just a quick comment on your thoughts for the future: Do you feel that it is going to take the co-operation, as Diane said, of all three players—business, labour and government—working together to solve our problems and tackle the challenges that lie ahead?

Mr Michael: Absolutely, very much so, and all the parties in the House must co-operate to get this economy going, but we may have to wait until 1993.

Mr Majesky: The other part is that you cannot tackle the housing industry in Ontario if you are going to be talking about high interest rates or whether it is going to be a 95% down payment. These are federal initiatives, so it takes two levels of government. This government cannot deal with down payment, so it takes three parties. Business, labour and the feds have to be on board. Whether they are or not is for another day's discussion.

Mr Michael: We appreciate the difficulties you are having in trying to wave magic wands to get things going here on a provincial basis when the federals are opposing you from start to finish.

CITIZENS FOR PUBLIC JUSTICE

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation is from the Citizens for Public Justice, Gerald Vandezande, public affairs director. Welcome to the committee, Mr Vandezande. We have approximately one half-hour altogether and whatever time you use up in your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the time for questions, which will be divided between the three parties. Perhaps you would like to commence your presentation.

Mr Vandezande: Mr Chairman, thank you, on short notice, for allowing us to appear before your committee. I have given the clerk a copy of my notes for comments this morning. I assume they have been distributed to the members of the committee. I have also given the clerk copies of previous presentations that we made to the standing committee in 1988 and 1989 because I think they are still relevant. I only gave the clerk one copy of each, but perhaps they can be duplicated because I am sure that both the government as well as the opposition members would be interested in reading some of the proposals, one of which was endorsed by the 1989 standing committee, namely the proposal for a roundtable.

A brief word of introduction about Citizens for Public Justice. It is an independent, non-partisan organization dealing with the development and advocacy of public policies from a biblical life perspective. We have dealt with questions of energy policy, social policy, tax reform, human rights, including the native self-government issues, and have served as advisers to the Assembly of First Nations and other native groups.

There is a slight correction under item III, the reference. In addition to From Welfare Dependency to Social Responsibility, the brief we presented in 1988 is entitled Toward Economic Equity and Social Justice For All.

I have also given to the clerk a major proposal that was made to the federal government in February 1986, which hit the headlines, which received the endorsement of all the churches in this country, as well as the trade unions and a number of business organizations, and which demonstrated that by an $11-billion shift within the federal budget we could make major strides towards, if not entirely eliminating poverty in this country and at the same time create a net 295,475 new jobs.

We had extensive discussions with the Department of National Health and Welfare as well as the Department of Finance. There was no disagreement as to the accuracy of the figures that we produced but whether, ideologically or otherwise, it was an appropriate thing to do. The reason I mention it is that we have, from time to time, done extensive research as to what might be done to bring about a more meaningful economy that does indeed do justice to the various socioeconomic needs of the Canadian people. It is from that perspective that I, in a non-partisan way, want to bring some issues to your attention this morning.

I want to share with you that I am an accountant by background. I used to be employed with the Bank of Montreal and with Ethyl Corp for a total of over 10 years. Figures fascinate me because they demonstrate where a people's priorities are, including a government's. That is why we participate in these and other provincial governments' hearings, because economic and social needs must be met if we are to continue to be the kind of strong and free country that we ought to be and can be. That is why we participated in the hearings of the Social Assistance Review Committee and played a major role in putting forward some specific recommendations.

I urge the committee to look at that report once more. I remember meeting with Premier Peterson, who at the time had already endorsed the report and agreed with our approach to it, as well as key members of the Conservative and New Democratic parties. My hope is that much more can be done in a non-partisan spirit, as Ms Cunningham stressed just a few minutes ago, so that we not take partisan shots at each other but tap into the best resources, insights and experience that we have in Ontario to bring about economic and social justice that does justice to our shared responsibility to Canadians to help meet the needs of people.

In that context we recommended, and this committee has endorsed, that, "The government establish a provincial roundtable on social policy and the economy, to provide for the integration of social and economic policies." That roundtable, which was recommended in April 1989 by our committee, has not yet been established. We would strongly urge, because it received nearly unanimous support from the committee, that you once again make that recommendation, because unless we integrate economic and social policies we will not have the kind of balanced development and sensible approach to budget-making that is essential in order to eliminate poverty, unemployment etc.

Major steps have been taken by Premier Bob Rae, following up on Mr Peterson's initiative, that there be two premier's councils, one dealing with the economy and quality of life, the other with health, wellbeing and social justice. We still strongly believe those two councils should work in tandem and should themselves be integrated so that we get integrative recommendations. Too often people in government, as well as in the business community and social networks, have polarized the question of economic versus social needs. I think you cannot have a balanced development of human life and of the economy unless you integrate and look at the issues at the same time so that you have a simultaneous recognition and realization of some major things that need to be done.

I draw to your attention, on page 2, the basic fundamental objective for reforms that the Transitions report recommended and that was basically accepted by all parties. I think that fundamental statement should also again be drawn to the attention of the government, particularly the Treasurer and the cabinet ministers responsible for setting the priorities of the 1992 budget.

This committee itself endorsed that approach by Transitions and recommended the complete implementation of stage one—major steps have been made in that direction—and also recommended that there be a cross-ministry cost-benefit analysis and, again, as I mentioned earlier, the establishment of a provincial roundtable. I think we need to move to that.

I looked at the list of people who appeared before this committee in the past and this year and I do not see people off the street appearing before your committee. I got up this morning—I live in a comfortable home—could enjoy breakfast, came here, had a coffee at the taxpayers' expense, can have lunch today. We sit in an air-conditioned room and all of us probably will have one or two weeks' vacation this summer with our families. There are hundreds of thousands of people who cannot have any of that this morning. In a few minutes I will draw your attention to some major reports that have been produced by the federal government, as well as by citizens of Ontario, to remind us of that bitter reality.

The reason I say that is that unless we realize that in a few months from now many hungry, homeless and unemployed people will again roam the streets of Toronto and other communities throughout Ontario and unless we realize that we all have an obligation, both government and the non-government sector alike, to come to grips with those socioeconomic ills and injustices, we really are not living up to our responsibility as a people.

That is why, on behalf of Citizens for Public Justice, I remind you of four cornerstones that we think are crucial. I want to read them into the record. These four cornerstones have been previously submitted to the former Premier, Mr Peterson. We have discussed them with Mr Rae as well as with spokespersons for the Conservative Party at the time, Mr Brandt and others, and they all agreed that they made eminent sense.

Human dignity is the first one. The right of all people to be treated with love and respect should go without saying.

Second is mutual responsibility, the duty of each to contribute to the community and the duty of the community to care for, and share with, all people.

Third is economic equity, the right of all persons and communities to worthwhile work, fair employment conditions, adequate education, health, housing and income security provision.

Fourth is social justice, the right of all persons and communities to full participation in the life and decision-making of Canada, and Ontario of course, and to adequate access to basic resources, within the context of our communal calling to practise responsible stewardship—I call that environmental responsibility and integrity—so that we move towards sustainable development and a stewardly, responsible economy. In short, what we need is socio-economic responsibility based on stewardship by all and justice for all, putting people and the environment first.

In that context, Citizens for Public Justice want to make the recommendation that you as a committee strongly recommend to the government to make the elimination of hunger and material poverty the number one priority of public policy and, second, strongly urge other provincial governments, and especially the federal government, to establish the same priority within the context of an integral socioeconomic policy approach that takes into considering the cornerstones about which I spoke just a minute ago and the need for the development of an economy and the meeting of social needs that does not make for lopsided, profit-oriented development but really thinks in terms of a responsible economy that meets the needs of all the people.

In that context, I think it is up to the government to demonstrate full employment—and by that economists allow, as you know, for a 3% to 4% unemployment rate—as well as affordable housing; a guaranteed adequate income, which is as old as the Macdonald report which produced those massive volumes on the future of Confederation; as well as better human support services such as accessible, quality child care, which was also recommended in the Transitions report.

I think this commitment should be demonstrated by further changes in the provincial budget, through recommendations from the provincial roundtable and the two councils I mentioned which the Premier has appointed. I think the roundtable should be representative of the various major stakeholders in both the economy and social policy so that there is this co-operative approach about which the Treasurer has also spoken, about which Ms Cunningham spoke a moment ago and which Mr Peterson took some initiative on when he was the Premier.

I think we need that kind of review of past policies, current policies and long-term policies so that we can say that together we are moving forward to the kind of just and responsible society that Canada so desperately needs. Ontario could be an example. In that context, it is our conclusion—and I have spent a fair bit of time going through all these records—that the 1991 budget could have done more to attack the province's serious economic ills and grave social injustices, by giving clearer, more specific preference to the elimination of homelessness, hunger, poverty and unemployment.

I want to remind you of the 1966 Canada assistance plan agreement that was entered into by all the provincial governments and the federal government. Two of the objectives formally subscribed to by all the provinces 25 years ago were the prevention and the removal of the causes of poverty and, second, that we remove dependence on public assistance. Those were the stated official objectives of that intergovernmental agreement between the federal government and all the provincial governments.

It is our submission that this preamble should be revisited, not by changing it but by affirming it, as part perhaps of the constitutional talks that are currently going on, and by implementing policies that will meet those stated objectives. We cannot continue to say to the rest of the world that Canada is a beacon for democracy and that kind of society everyone should copy if we cannot prevent and remove the causes of poverty and dependence on public assistance. We must make strong efforts in that direction. In that context, I want to draw to your attention, simply to the record—I will not read all of the recommendations of the three reports I think this committee may want to take a hard look at.

The first one, called Women and Poverty Revisited, the National Council of Welfare, a body sponsored by the federal government, came out in the summer of 1990. It is a major report with very helpful recommendations that need to be looked at. Again, it comes from a non-partisan point of view where all the stakeholders in the economy from different ideological perspectives worked together on the development of recommendations.

The second report, The Canada Assistance Plan: More Time for Cuts, dated winter 1991, again a report by the federal government's National Council of Welfare, just came out.

Third, I want to refer you to a report by the task force on food banks, called Not by Bread Alone: A Strategy to Eliminate the Need for Food Banks in the Greater Toronto Area. There are 49 very good recommendations in the report, again prepared by a non-partisan group representative of the entire community, even having the endorsement of Conrad Black and others who said, "We've got to eliminate suffering in the streets of Toronto."

We say that from our perspective as a Christian organization on the basis of the principles of compassion, equity, fairness, freedom and justice for all people. We believe that is crucial. Those are not just hollow slogans. Those are principles that we deeply believe in, that we seek to practice in our own lives. We all fall short, but we think that through a non-partisan, multiparty—that is, involving the entire non-government sector as well—this can be accomplished.

In that connection, I want to make a couple of comments in closing. As I listen to my friends, relatives, colleagues and others in the marketplace, and even listening to the discussion this morning, I think this committee could make one recommendation I developed this morning: we must help people understand the budget.

As an accountant, I used to prepare profit-and-loss statements and balance sheets. We distinguished between two kinds of expenditures: expenses, such as are incurred in running this meeting, and investments. In the last budget there was, I believe, as much as $4.3 billion in capital expenditures. Those are not expenses. We all know that, but the public does not know that. I think what we need in this province is a balance sheet showing the assets, the capital investments that governments in the past and currently are making, the distinction from expenses, money that is being spent to run the government, to meet the needs in terms of social assistance, housing, you name it, so that people know that when we mortgage, we are mortgaging investments.

Let me clarify that. When my daughter and her husband bought a house—and by the way, they were fortunate enough to buy it because relatives came to their aid raping together a down payment—they could buy a house on a $35,000 income. So when they bought it in 1989, they spent $175,000 while their income was $35,000. Do we say that they had a deficit of $140,000? Of course we do not. We say that was an investment. They took out a mortgage. Their cash flow clearly was short, so they got a mortgage. What I am saying is, they did not engage in deficit spending. Over against the investment they made there is a liability.

What I am suggesting is that, in the budget, clearly distinguish between investments for which there are assets, and then if there are liabilities opposite that, demonstrate that in a provincial balance sheet. Then make sure that the revenues indeed cover all the expenses as well as the debt charges so it is clear what the financial picture really is. I say that because that will help people understand. I am not advocating limitless deficit spending at all, but unless we get a clear picture, we will not know where we are going.

In that context, I want to stress that government alone cannot solve and must not try to solve all the issues. I think the non-government sector must do and can do much more. Perhaps I can say more about that later. Thank you.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Vandezande. We have about three minutes per party for questions. Mrs Cunningham.

Mrs Cunningham: You always give us lots to think about. We have worked together certainly since I have been at Queen's Park and I thank you for your input.

One of the statements we heard earlier in the week from one of the economists was of great concern to us because we were actually told, and we know from reading, that right now if we take a look at the big picture, we are looking at a federal government that has a tremendous debt and deficit. There are tremendous complaints that the transfer payments are not significant, are not helpful, that they have been cut back, yet those transfer payments I think made up about a third of the deficit this year. At the same time, we are looking for investment in Canada so we can pay off our debt. Unfortunately, we are looking at foreign investment in order to have the money to pay off our debt. We are going into debt every year to a greater extent. We were told there is as much as $45 billion in Japanese investments this year in our country. I am no economist, but I am a good listener, and that is one of the reasons that the interest rates are so high.

All of us I think are interested in solving the problems of poverty. In order to do that, in my office and in my former work as a social worker, a teacher and a school board trustee, anybody I talked to in my offices wanted to work. Things have never been worse in my constituency office. I am going home this afternoon rather than being here because I have so many appointments to talk to people before the weekend. People have a hard time getting through the weekend when others are on holidays and doing things and they do not have the money, as you described.

This is a tremendous challenge we have in this country, from depending on foreign money to keeping our cash flow and our country running. It is a reality. Last evening, I listened to students, and they said the public of Ontario is the least informed constituency as to the real challenges we have.

You heard the former presenters who chose to take partisan tacks, as others have, one way or another. I do not care what side they are on. What is your solution to all this? We have been working at it for years. Most of us are here because we represent a public that we care for.

Mr Vandezande: That is why I emphasize the importance of a non-partisan approach. You cannot simply lay the blame for the current situation at the door of a particular party.

Let me just be complete. What we all tend to do is say, "We need a sustainable prosperity." That is throughout this document. Previous governments have said the same thing. With all my respect for the attempts of all governments, that is not what we are interested in or ought to be interested in. We ought not to be interested in sustainable prosperity but in a sustainable economy. There is a difference.

This ever-increasing obsession with, "We must be prosperous," is wrong. That is a reduction of the meaning of life to material progress and being well off. What we need to do is look at the development of a new lifestyle that does not talk in terms of prosperity but simply being able to live meaningfully. That may mean for all of us a reduction in income, those of us who make a substantial income, and for governments to reduce their expenditures where they really do not count, and to ask ourselves, "Does this investment, does this expense, really contribute to a meaningful life for all citizens?" That does not mean that there ought not to be profit and wage earning. Of course there should be. But when you put the emphasis in a one-dimensional way on prosperity and do not talk about human wellbeing, then you get this obsession, this rat race, for more and more money and more and more profit, without asking what it does to the environment, what it does to people's needs in the community.

That is why, in that context, I think a strategy towards debt reduction both at the provincial and the federal level would be extremely important. At the time when the GST was introduced and when we met with some cabinet ministers in Ottawa, I said: "I am sure if you put it to the Canadian people, both as a provincial and a federal government, that we need to eliminate debt in this country and that certain taxes are going to be targeted towards that goal, Canadians won't bitch. But if you continue to waste as much as you do—" Let's face it, the Nielsen report demonstrated that $45 billion annually went by way of subsidies to the business community, the same business community that often says government should cut back on its deficit spending. Take $45 billion out of the federal budget and guess where you are heading.

My point is, let's examine our spending priorities. On the basis of a commonly accepted value framework, let's develop new principles and priorities and then help the Canadian public to understand what budget-making is all about, or more important, what life is all about and how we can then meaningfully go forward together. We do it on the Constitution now, after we have gone through three years of crisis. Let's hope we can also do it on the economy.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. It is certainly a thoughtful one and not simply in cold economic terms.

On the last page of your presentation you say, "the Ontario government has presented a budget that is quite defensible, considering the pressing plight of our poor and powerless neighbours." I would like to ask you what you feel the effects on our society would have been if we had not maintained spending on services, if we had attempted to balance the budget as some of our critics say we should have done, which I think would have led to more unemployment. Certainly it would either be increased taxes or fewer services. What do you feel would be the effects of that and how would you answer the critics?

Mr Vandezande: Let me put it positively. It is my deep conviction as a Christian that it is a government's obligation to protect the poor and the powerless, to come to the defence of the weak and the vulnerable. We as parents and grandparents do that. When our children and grandchildren and neighbours cannot make it, we come to their aid. When people in the Third World are starving to death, we become more generous.

What I am suggesting is that the government has the responsibility to see to it that there are no poor among us, but not by itself. The private non-government sector has its own responsibility. So my challenge to all three parties, as a non-partisan spokesperson, is make sure that in the wealthiest part of the world we demonstrate that we can practise solidarity, can practise social justice, can practise the kind of community where we really come to the aid of the underdog by appealing to each other's responsibility, by sharing our resources.

I think critics owe it to governments to come up with alternatives, and that is why I tabled with you different documents. It would have been easy for me to blast every one of you. There is enough evidence in all these reports to say that all three parties have failed. That does not help very much.

I come here this morning to challenge you to the best of my ability, and will be glad to do further research. I hope you take a careful look at the documents I have tabled in order that we can move forward together out of a spirit of common commitment to Canada and to its people, so that we put people first, the environment first, social justice first, and on that basis, build the kind of national unity, the kind of country that is genuinely strong and free where all people can live in dignity because they experience each other's solidarity, community, love, you name it. I think it can be done, but that means dropping of partisan hats and working together.

Bob Rae said it in his speech shortly after his in-laws passed on. He raised the question at his major speech in Waterloo, and I think we should hold him to it. What do we owe each other? I think we need to ask ourselves that, and this committee might well want to launch a more public education event, asking people, "What do we owe each other, and what can you contribute?" Ask not what I can get out of Canada, but ask what I can do for Canada, and especially for those poor, powerless and vulnerable Canadians who just a few months from now will again be sleeping in bus shelters in downtown Toronto.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you, Mr Vandezande. I want to commend you on your thoughtful and passionate presentation.

In your recommendations, if you could just expand for me on your ideas, you call for the government of Ontario to demonstrate its leadership by committing itself to full employment and a guaranteed adequate income. How would you propose that this would happen?

Mr Vandezande: In the document I tabled with the clerk, which is, I think, dated February 1986, there are detailed proposals on how that could be done.

Mr Kwinter: Could you just briefly tell me?

Mr Vandezande: Yes. Investment, I think, is where it is important that we do some careful checking as to what kind of investments are most productive when it comes to the creation of jobs.

We have just gone through the Gulf war. Investments in the defence industry are among the poorest you can imagine. Every economist is in agreement on that. Investments in housing, investments in child care, I think are very legitimate investments, because unless our children receive the kind of care they are entitled to, we will go nowhere. So child care is much more productive, because it is labour-intensive, than heavy technology investment. So when the government gives grants to the private sector or subsidies or tax breaks, it should ask: "What are you going to do with it? What kind of jobs are you going to produce?" It should also monitor the use of those moneys.

When I read the other day that the Massey-Ferguson plant is leaving Canada after it had gotten loans and subsidies of hundreds of millions of dollars, I would like to have an accounting of how many jobs it produced. And why are they not repaying those loans?

My wife used to be a social worker—well, she still is but she worked on the front lines. When some people, through a mistake of their own or through the bureaucracy, got too much money, they had to pay it back. Why do the corporate welfare recipients not have to give an accounting of how they use their money for the creation of jobs? Why can they leave for the United States without giving an accounting of what they have done with Canadian taxpayers' money?

What I am pleading for is that when we give tax breaks, when we hand out money, when we grant subsidies, let us ask: What is it for? Does it create jobs? Does it contribute to human wellbeing? Let us monitor, let us call them to account, and if they cannot produce, then let us not do it. I think it is crucial that we come through on that.

We need to look to those areas where labour-intensive job creation programs that contribute to human wellbeing indeed are worthy of investment, but if they are environmentally negative, socially useless, etc, let us not do it.

The details are in our February 1986 proposal. I hope the government has enough money to provide you with a copy of that, Mr Kwinter.

But our government had no trouble finding, quickly, close to $1 billion to finance our involvement in the Gulf war. Let's assume for a moment that was a legitimate enterprise. I have my serious questions around that, but that's not the issue. Can it find within its ideology $1 billion towards the elimination of poverty in socially, economically responsible investments that lead to job creation, so that you indeed strengthen the economy, eliminate injustices and enable people to participate in the life of the nation? If we can borrow money—that is what the government did—to finance a Gulf war involvement, can we not so borrow money, if that is what needs to be done, and I think Canadians are willing to pay taxes, in order to wage war on unemployment and poverty?

I think we need to come to grips with those fundamental value challenges. If we do not, we will continue to get tripped up by this ideology that constantly talks about prosperity without asking whether it contributes to human well-being in the elimination of injustice across the board.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Vandezande, for your presentation this morning. Unfortunately, your time is up.

Mr Vandezande: It is unfortunate.

Mr B. Ward: An excellent presentation; thank you, sir.

TORONTO ARTS COUNCIL ARTS AND THE CITIES

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation will be from the Toronto Arts Council and Arts and the Cities, Tom Hendry, policy director and consultant.

Mr Hendry: You just had one accountant; now you're getting another one. There is an old vaudeville joke where a man goes to the doctor and the doctor says, "Have you had this before?" and he says, "Yes, I have." The doctor says, "Well, I can tell you that you have it again." Here I am.

The Vice-Chair: Just before you begin your presentation, Mr Hendry, we have about a half-hour altogether for the presentation. Whatever time you use in your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the time for questioning, and the time for questioning is divided equally between the three parties. If you would like to commence your presentation.

Mr Hendry: A sort of overlay theme for what I wanted to talk to you about today is the notion that we have paid a lot of attention in the past to a physical infrastructure. In Ontario it has been one of the bases for our success in terms of material wealth. But we have not paid that much attention to the spiritual infrastructure. In terms of my own involvement, I put the arts and the cultural sector at the very centre of the spiritual infrastructure a society has to have if it is to have goals and do all the things the gentleman preceding me was talking about.

Culture and the arts as an area of service delivery for governments at all levels is very recent. It did not begin, really, until after the Second World War, when the Massey commission came up with the idea of the Canada Council, which went into operation around the end of the 1950s. In the 1960s the provinces got into the act and in the 1970s the cities began moving slowly into the support of the arts.

But because it is such a new area of service delivery, it is at all levels given something less than parallel areas of activity. I was recently at a conference of recreation directors, and one from a large BC city said: "You don't have to do any arguing with us. We know that the arts, if they are viewed as an aspect of recreation, do not get anything like the share the other aspects of recreation get."

Just as a general comment, I am in touch with the arts communities in about nine cities in Ontario through Arts and the Cities and I work directly with the Toronto Arts Council. Certainly there we have about 250 organizations which the city subsidizes and some 300 individual artists, and the general opinion, naturally, of what the government did this year for the Ontario Arts Council is extremely positive.

At times like this, I am sure you are well aware that the private sector tends to get very gun-shy, and the private sector is right now in Ontario the largest single source of assistance for the arts, apart from the artists themselves. They are still the primary subsidizers of the arts through forgone earnings. I will not go into how low their earnings are, but you do know that our artists are on a par with pensioners in terms of disposable income.

We noticed the budget for the Ministry of Culture and Communications this year was $332 million in total and that out of that comes 43.5% for the Ontario Arts Council, which is 13% of the ministry's total spending, and I would like to commend the government for doing that. There is sort of a law called Féral's law among people who are students of subsidy. A Quebec professor by the name of Josette Féral propounded a thesis that in general, of money designated for the arts and culture, approximately 10% goes to the arts and 90% goes to culture in various manifestations, quite often to facility support and things like that. But at 13% you are three points above Féral's law, and that is very good. We would certainly like to see the eventual pattern be something like 20% of ministry spending on direct investment in the arts.

The total budget for the province, I note, is approximately $53 billion. The MCC budget is therefore about 0.06%. There is a general feeling among those of us who, as I say, are students of subsidy that it would not be an unreasonable target to suggest that the government of Ontario, which is not terribly high in the order of spending of provincial governments on a per capita basis on the arts, think of a target of 1% of budget for the arts and culture. That would be a difference of approximately $200 million in this present year.

I would point out, by the way, that what the previous gentleman said about people being willing to pay for certain things if they know that the money is going for is borne out in fact. The Macaulay commission, which reported to the government of Ontario in 1984, did a fairly extensive survey among white-collar people and blue-collar people, and it found out that both groups were in favour of considerably increased provincial spending on the arts and that they were willing to pay a tax of up to $25 per taxpayer if it was designated to go to the arts and to nothing else. This is partly explained—I think it was Decima that did it—by the fact that a lot of the people who were talked to are people like myself.

I come from an immigrant family. My family came to Canada because they wanted to give their children opportunities they could not afford in the country in which they were born, and a lot of the respondents to the survey see an increased profile for the arts and increased emphasis on the arts as something of great benefit to their children, something their children will get here in Canada that they would not be able to afford in the country of their birth.

So we would very much like to see in future planning the notion being taken into account of the arts and culture being a very new area of service delivery, that when budgets are cut in order to get rid of the deficit which has been incurred people remember that they should be cut selectively and that some areas should in fact be increased in order to be brought to the same level of maturity as are other portions of the provincial budget.

In terms of per capita spending, right now Ontario spends on direct aid to artists approximately $5 per capita. In the city of Toronto the rate per capita is $20. We pay $5 through our payment to Metro, which is given out by the Metro cultural affairs department, and a further $15 per capita is spent through the Toronto Arts Council and through other agencies and departments of the city, notably the parks department and the St Lawrence Centre, which gives subsidized rent to the companies which play there. This investment helps to sustain an economy of about $200 million annually now. That is the non-profit sector of the arts.

We estimate that approximately 125,000 people in the Metro area are either fully or partly employed in the arts or in arts-related work in industry. For example, my next-door neighbour has a software company called Alias Research. One of its most recent big jobs was to design the special-effects software for the film Terminator 2 with Arnold Schwarzenegger. It also provides all the software for the design and testing of Volvo, Toyota and most of the major Japanese auto manufacturers. All of his employees are in some way arts-related. They are people who are design specialists, visual artists, and who can put things that are two-dimensional into the three-dimensional possibilities that software offers now.

I would like to mention one thing that a lot of people forget in terms of where increased spending on the arts should go. Our theory of arts subsidy goes back about 3,000 years. It goes back to the Roman Empire. The policy of the Roman Empire in cultural terms was a very simple one: No citizen of the empire should be disadvantaged culturally because of distance from the capital. That is why you find Roman theatres all over Britain and France and Germany and Spain. Wherever the Roman Empire went, they built cultural infrastructure and they put on their plays and all sorts of things in order that all citizens of the empire should have access to the same cultural experience that the people in the capital were having, and ideally that is the aim today of cultural subsidy and the arts subsidy, to get rid of disparities and inexperience.

What we would like to think about for the future, because obviously things are going to get better, is that we begin to think more about moving out from Toronto. At the present time we have, as I pointed out to you, a fairly highly developed arts industry, if you will, here in Toronto with an economy of about $200 million. We also have what are called the cultural industries, which are video and film and commercial music, all that sort of thing, which are probably about six times or so—four to five times, at least—the size of the non-profit economy. But in the remainder of the province, the experience of the arts is nothing like what it is in Toronto.

I would like to suggest to you that there is room for an examination of models that have worked elsewhere to cause a diversification of culture and to form partnerships in the case of the state of New York and the county governments, partnerships whereby each put up money and a good deal of very healthy development was stimulated all across New York state.

It began in the mid-1970s when Governor Rockefeller brought in very heavy funding for the arts. He insisted that of the money that was going to the arts, an appropriate portion should go to Manhattan, where most of the major arts critical mass was situated, but that the remainder should go out on a per capita basis, on a county system so that arts councils should be set up in each county and that the county itself should match some of the money from the state government and begin programs, begin residencies, bring artists into the community and retain artists who normally leave for somewhere else.

Statistics Canada projections show that over the next 20 years the only three areas of growth in the whole country are Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Everything else is going to be slowly cannibalized because people are moving to those centres of interest, of population, of employment of all the good things that cities are supposed to offer. Not much is being done to make life more interesting and a more viable thing in some of the smaller centres.

I would like to also note a model that should be borne in mind, I think, by anybody who is doing budgeting. It is this: Here in Ontario we have a dandy system of public libraries. We have very good access wherever you are in Ontario to a pretty good supply of books, thanks to a library system which has been built up over the years because an appropriate amount of money was spent on that library system. I will just give you a few figures.

In 1988 the city of Toronto paid something like $20 million towards the library system. During that year there were visits by about five million people to the libraries. That same year, the city supported the arts to the extent of about $11 million. Coincidentally, it commissioned a study by Environics which turned up the information that there were about 11 million visits to arts and culture manifestations that were in some way supported by the city of Toronto. Each visit to the library cost the city $5; each visit to the arts cost it $1.

I am not suggesting in any way that the library system is overfunded; au contraire. I think they probably, like everybody else, are in need of some money. But you can make some money once you obtain a degree in library science as a librarian and, as a result, we have good libraries well run. You can have the same amount of training as at ist and your chances of making a living that in any way would be commensurate with that of a librarian are pretty tall indeed.

This is not to suggest that libraries be reduced in budget, but rather that we must begin to think that if we pay for the money we will get the results. And the results, in terms of the spiritual infrastructure, would be very, very good for this province and especially for those parts of this province outside of Toronto and the other main centres.

We would like to see, as I mentioned, arts support go to 5% of MCC budget, but I doubt that can happen unless the MCC budget itself gets somewhere close to 1%.

In Ontario there is a network of community arts councils, some 60 or 70 of them, which have joined together and have an association. This would certainly provide a network with which to work in terms of trying out, let's say, a pilot project in matching funds with municipalities.

There is a further very strong network called OAG, the Ontario Association of Art Galleries, which has probably about 30 members across the province who are very well based in their communities and which would offer an ideal basis for a local community arts board to give out grants. What I am suggesting is that what we have to do is find a way to empower citizens in small centres to make decisions in those centres about the arts.

Leadership must come, I think, from the province to the smaller centres, because on their own there just is not enough impetus. They need to be in a position of spending 50-cent dollars or 75-cent dollars or something like that in order to get going. The whole policy can certainly come from the arts sector, but the leadership must come from the provincial government.

A further area where we can see a great dividend being paid to the province would be to find ways to extend the network of community centres by attaching to them some sort of modest cultural premises. It could be two big rooms. I know in every country in Europe there are what they call "maisons de la culture" or "Kulturhäuser" or something like that. These are mixed-use buildings where you can go and take aerobics or lose weight or you can go to a play or whatever. I think it would be very, very helpful if the community centre system across Ontario had the possibility, from its municipalities and perhaps matched by the provincial government, of somehow adding some more space dedicated to the arts so that a neighbourhood play could be put on in the neighbourhood or a neighbourhood artist could show her or his work in the neighbourhood to the neighbours. Art begins as a very personal thing, and right now it is so institutionalized that you must make the jump from the neighbourhood almost to the Art Gallery of Ontario, with nothing much in between.

A key priority right now for Toronto, and I think it is going to be spreading right across the province, is to set up effective interaction between organizations like the Toronto Arts Council and artists who were formerly marginalized, artists from culturally specific backgrounds: native artists, Hispanic artists, Caribbean, African background, Central American, some from Europe. We have a whole lot of people who for one reason or another, because of language barriers or because they felt the system was not for them, have not been interacting with our subsidy-giving bodies such as the Toronto Arts Council.

We are now undertaking a large program of induced interaction with those communities. We have added members of those communities to our board of directors and to our decision-making committees. It seems to be working out well, but that is something which is going to cost some money. Again, it is going to have to be borne in mind in the future that in terms of equity you should treat people equally, but that does not mean treating them the same. You do have to take special care to be able to approach some people in cultural terms that are relevant for them.

Another priority for us is a growing focus on individual artists all over the province. Individual artists are the unit of creativity. In the long run, the most important aspect of culture is not what is in the museums but what is coming out of the individual artist's studio or the individual writer's typewriter or, in these days, computer.

Finally, a great priority is to inject something more of the arts into education. That is going to cost some money and a good deal of goodwill. As I pointed out, we have about 125,000 people in Metro earning some or all of their living from the arts or arts-related working industry. Every one of them began their arts education after they left school. If we are indeed trying to design an education system that prepares people for working and living, we are missing out if 5% of the Metro population never spend five minutes learning something about the eventual field in which they are going to work.

That is really all I had to say. Rita Davies, our director, had planned to be here but was unfortunately called out of town. I was supposed to be accompanied by Tomson Highway, the playwright, but he was unable to make it, so I have been carrying the ball myself. If you have questions, I will be happy to try to answer them. If I do not have the information here, I will be happy to send it to you.

The Vice-Chair: We have time for one brief question from each party and, hopefully, a brief response as well.

Mr B. Ward: Just briefly, out of the budget, what would you say is the best opportunity for arts in Ontario?

Mr Hendry: Out of the present budget?

Mr B. Ward: Related to the budget.

Mr Hendry: I think they made the very wisest of decisions in putting the extra money into the hands of the Ontario Arts Council. They have a very good record of disbursing the money evenly and fairly. They operate on an arm's-length basis so you can be reasonably sure the decisions being made are not politically motivated or anything like that. They have been in need of strengthening for a very long time. They are right now at around $43.5 million, and we would sure like to see them up to about $80 million in budget, which would be about $10 per capita.

The Vice-Chair: The official opposition? Any questions?

Mrs Sullivan: I think we will forgo questions.

The Vice-Chair: Third party, questions?

Mrs Cunningham: We are fine.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Hendry, for your presentation this morning.

Mr Hendry: It has been a pleasure.

ONTARIO HOME BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation is from the Ontario Home Builders' Association, Al Libfeld, president, and Ian Rawlings, first vice-president. You have approximately a half-hour of time altogether. Whatever time you use for your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the time for questions, which will be divided equally between the three parties. So if you would like to commence, Mr Libfeld.

Mr Libfeld: Thank you. Mr Rawlings will be joining me momentarily. My name is Al Libfeld and I am the president of the Ontario Home Builders' Association. OHBA is a professional association that represents builders and developers as well as contractors and subtrades in the housing industry. A couple of years ago our member companies employed nearly 200,000 persons. That number has fallen to what we estimate is a little over 100,000 people now.

I want to take a couple of minutes this morning to talk about the general state of our industry. Then my colleague Ian Rawlings will take over and outline the sorts of steps we believe should be taken to establish economic conditions that will ensure the health of our industry and prosperity for Ontario.

The recession in the housing industry really started around the Toronto area about 18 months ago. By the second quarter of 1990, there were clear signs that it was spreading across the rest of Ontario, and by the third quarter of 1990 new home construction in Ontario had essentially ground to a halt. In April and early May of this year there were some signs that the market was starting to pick up, but for a lot of builders right now those signs are a memory.

I think we are just entering a recovery phase, but it is a very fragile recovery. In light of this, I would like to partially redirect the focus of this morning's discussions. Rather than look at specific details in the budget, we will examine some of the steps the government should be taking to ensure that the recovery can be sustained.

The demand we started seeing in April was for lower-priced starter houses. This came from first-time buyers who had been forced out of the market in 1988-89 and were looking for an opportunity to get back in. Lower prices, and just as important, lower interest rates, gave them that opportunity.

Last year, we built nearly 63,000 houses in Ontario. This year we will be lucky if we build 52,000. To get that number, we will need a steady recovery for the rest of the year.

Before Ian discusses some of the steps that will help ensure that this recovery is lasting, I want to make one last point about the housing industry. The prosperity of Ontario is directly related to the housing industry. We employ more people than any other single industry. Most of these people are working in well-paid jobs. Every house that is built creates a year's employment for roughly three people. The drop in housing starts from 93,000 in 1989 last year cost over 100,000 jobs. The nature of our industry sometime makes it difficult to see what is going on. We do not concentrate our labour force in large plants, so layoffs are not as visible. Laying off a couple of trim carpenters or not having work for a roofing crew does not get the press coverage that closing down an assembly line does, but when 1,200 builders are doing the same thing across the province, the layoffs add up.

The flip side is also true. When these companies start hiring, it does not take long for the benefits to start working their way through the entire economy.

Ian Rawlings is from Ottawa. He is currently OHBA's first vice-president and will be following me as president later this fall. He is going to talk about some of the things that will make sure we can start hiring back the jobs that have been lost over the last couple of years.

Mr Rawlings: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. Even though your backs are to the sunshine, I know your minds are going back to the lovely weather out there, so I will try and be brief. I think what we want to touch upon are some of the specific issues.

As I see it, there are basically two things that determine the affordability of a home: the cost of the unit and the cost of the money that is used to purchase that unit. I think we all appreciate that the cost of money is essentially a federal issue, so there is not much point in taking a lot of time to discuss it this morning. I would, however, urge you to make the case to the federal government that we need consistent economic policy and low interest rates. With regard to the issue of affordability, I would also urge you to take the opportunity to have the federal government follow through with the much-discussed 95% financing allowing 5% down payments on new housing.

The cost of money has a dramatic impact on affordability. Our estimates indicate that for a one-point increase in the rate of mortgage money, the size of the mortgage that a person can carry is reduced by about 7%. The consequences of that impact are that in many cases the individual or family has to scramble for a larger down payment. It may mean they buy a less expensive house or a house that is less convenient in location. The worst event, of course, is that it often means they just do not buy at all. We have some tables that give you a view of the relationship between interest rates and housing starts. We will leave those with you. I think the trend is there and obvious to see.

The other side of affordability, of course, is the cost of the house. Here we are not just talking about the cost of bricks and mortar but the cost of land as well. I think it is fair to say that in this specific area the provincial governments and provincial policies do have an impact. There are two main areas in which provincial policies could contribute significantly to containing the cost of housing. One is the planning and approvals process and the other is the tax system. I would like to talk a little bit about both of those.

We have, on occasion, heard many people indicate that with the passing of the baby boom, the demand for housing that we saw in the 1980s is something that will not be repeated. I think that is too simplistic. We can anticipate a fairly healthy net growth of population, something in the der of 100,000 people a year over the next 20 years; and we certainly know there is still a segment of that baby boom that has not made a purchase decision, so I downplay the arguments that the demands we have seen in the past are something we will never see again.

There is no question, then, that if we do not have a continued and generous supply of land, demand will quickly drive up the cost, and if we do not have the means of bringing serviced lands on stream more efficiently, this will compound the problem.

We have indicated to the government that we are very happy to see the commission set up that Mr Sewell is going to chair, to look into the whole process of planning in the province. We believe that the streamlining of the approvals process is something that can be done and will be compatible with safeguarding social and environmental issues.

There are clearly redundancies in the process in this province. They have been there for years. They continue to be there. They serve to do nothing more than slow the process down.

We think the public interest must include ensuring a supply of land that will avoid run-ups in the cost of housing. This can be done with an approvals process that works more efficiently than the one we have today, so we look forward to working with Mr Sewell's commission on this important task.

The second area I want to touch on concerns the tax system. The current structure does not provide any incentive for municipalities to assist in the development of low-cost housing. In fact, I think it is fair to say that for the most part many of the interests of the municipal governments are served by encouraging both industrial and commercial development and perhaps high-end or high-priced residential development. This pattern of development clearly requires the fewest services and provides the richest tax base.

The Development Charges Act that was introduced by the previous government, I think, was a recognition that there is an imbalance in the tax structure; but in our view the Development Charges Act does not offer an effective or fair remedy to that imbalance.

I think the government, in undertaking the review of our broad tax system through the Fair Tax Commission, has taken a step in the right direction. Our concerns with the Development Charges Act are well documented. I am not going to go through them with you today. I believe you are familiar with them. We hope that we will have an opportunity to explore this issue with the fair tax working group that will be formed to look into the issue of property taxes.

I have talked in a general way about ensuring a supply of serviced lots through the approvals process and the methods of taxation to pay for development, but I would like to be a little bit more specific.

Our association has consistently maintained the position that timely development of infrastructure is essential if growth is to be properly managed.

I do not want to go through all the arguments today, but I think from every point of view, social, environmental and economic, the best time to develop infrastructure is ahead of all other development. It is the least expensive way to do it. You are not playing catch-up, and it gives you the most control over the growth.

We have supported the concept of a sewer and water agency that was proposed in the 1990 budget. We believe it was an important step towards realizing the goals and the objectives of managing both infrastructure and, consequently, growth in the province.

The Treasurer has said, "We will make a major commitment to maintain and improve the infrastructure of Ontario with increased capital spending." I do not believe this is a problem that can be solved simply by throwing money at it. I wish it were that easy. We hope the government will take a serious look at the objectives and mechanisms that were proposed in the sewer and water agency.

Finally, I want to refer to an issue that is less tangible than the ones I have been talking about, but one that could have no less an impact on our plans for Ontario's future.

It is my understanding that the Fair Tax Commission will be looking at the general question of the economic impact of taxation. We are glad the commission is tackling this issue, but we respectfully submit that the Treasurer may want to consult a much broader cross-section of the population of Ontario on this issue. Perhaps this could be done through the commission.

I believe, our association believes and our industry believes that it is time for each of us in Ontario to step back and take a long, hard look at ourselves and our province. We need to ask what we are putting into the province, what we are putting into Ontario, and we need to ask, perhaps more important, what we hope to get out of it. I think we have to find a way to put those answers to those two questions together.

We believe that, if there is a single issue that could set the economic mood in Ontario over the next couple of years, this may be it. I hope the government will consult with the people of Ontario on a broad base and set a course that reflects their wishes and concerns, their hopes and their aspirations.

On behalf of our 4,000 member companies and the over 100,000 individuals they employ, I would like to thank you for taking the time to listen to our ideas. I hope we can have an opportunity to move forward with dialogue with the government on our ideas, and that in a short period of time we will be able to come back to you again, and speak to you on behalf of 200,000 employees in our industry. I believe we have to look forward and deal with where we go from here.

Mr Libfeld and I will try to answer any questions you might have.

The Vice-Chair: We have approximately five minutes per party. We will start with the official opposition.

Mr Phillips: I have a feeling, and I would like your thoughts on it, that an important factor in the housing market is the overall economic activity in the province, and that right now we are looking at heavy unemployment, as your document shows—9.5%; I think it is now up to 10.2%. I just wondered about your comments in terms of the budget's ability to get the total economy rolling again, and whether the house builders have any advice for us on that.

I think we are finding that we are guessing. We have one group that comes to the committee and says, "Listen, the budget is great." Another group comes and says the budget is not great. We are trying to reach a conclusion on what it is going to look like a year from now.

I would just appreciate your feeling on, first, what impact does the overall economic activity have on house demand? Second, is this the kind of budget that is going to get the Ontario economy rolling?

Mr Libfeld: Economic situations have a great effect on the housing market as evidenced by the last two years of very few sales. That is quite obvious. It is like any other industry. If we are in a recession, if we are in tough times, if interest rates are high, we will have a poorer market and we will not build the quantity of homes that are needed and are wanted within the province.

As far as the budget goes, we are not economists. We do not have the modules to look to see whether or not the billions will translate into more homes built or not, but we can only wait and see like everyone else.

Mrs Sullivan: I had a question relating to the infrastructure matters that you raised, and I note that you particularly underline the importance of the water and sewer corporation which the government has not at this point addressed, although I gather that the chairman is still sitting in an office without knowing whether he is going to be able to continue or not.

Part of the infrastructure, as well as water and sewers, of course is the provision of schools in communities. You oppose the Development Charges Act in terms of providing that kind of infrastructure. What do you see replacing it and where do you see the funding coming from?

Mr Rawlings: First of all, let me say you are quite right. We have opposed the aspect of Development Charges Act that applies to education development charges. I think it is also fair to say, if I can give us a plug on the positive side, that our industry has been consistent in that we see the purchasers of new housing participating at some level with the cost of providing infrastructure.

Quite frankly, we do not have any magic formula to provide capital for education facilities in our province. I do not think, however, it is a question of finding another group or another source to target.

I believe our industry is consistent in its view that the issue of education in the province is just too important to draw funding to support it from one specific segment of the population.

I believe it is a fundamental philosophy that has been held in this country and this province for a long time that education is important and everybody shares equally in the price and the cost of supplying education. The other aspect that goes with that philosophy of course is that everybody has equal access to education.

We see the education development charges having a fundamental impact on those philosophies. We see the education development charges creating, I believe, no small rift once again between the different religious groups in the province as to how we fund education. I think it is a sorry means of raising capital for something that is critically important to us as a province and as a country.

Mrs Sullivan: So your recommendation would be to go back to the income tax base.

Mr Rawlings: If that means it goes back to a broad tax base, then that in my view is the equitable means of dealing with the critical service of education.

Mr Kwinter: I want to get back to my colleague Mr Phillips' questions about the mood of confidence. You are in a unique industry in that I do not think you have a shortage of customers who would love to own a home. The problem is, can they afford one, can they meet the mortgage requirements, do they have the down payment? Relatively few have cash when they go and buy a house. Because of the fact that when they buy that house they are also making a major commitment which may extend over 20, 25 years, to pay for that house, there has to be a certain confidence that they are going to have the ability to continue those payments. What is the mood out there? You are out there selling houses; you are talking to people. What do they feel? Do they have that confidence? Are they concerned about it?

Mr Libfeld: After two years of very little sales, we had an extremely strong spring where quantities of homes were sold throughout the province. Presently, in the summer time, it is going through what we call the summer doldrums, but what happened in the spring gives us optimism that once the summer breaks we will have a reasonable market coming into the fall and into the new year. There are a lot of factors. Interest rates are down and a lot of the bad news, so to speak, is behind us or getting behind us. It is important, as I mentioned earlier, that interest rates stay down or go lower.

Mr Sterling: I know you are not an economist, but this morning we had the Toronto-Central Ontario Building and Construction Trades Council. Although I do not think they profess to be economists either, these are people you guess you hire, a great number of these people, because they represent 40,000 unionized construction workers in the Toronto-central Ontario region. They say, "Categorically and unequivocally we, the 40,000 unionized construction workers in the Toronto-central Ontario region publicly support the initiatives taken by the current government in its 1991 budget."

I guess my concern is that if people who might not feel that same kind of support are not making the equivalent statements on the opposite side, then perhaps the public will get the wrong impression overall. Does your organization categorically and unequivocally support this budget?

Mr Rawlings: That is a question, is it not? Without dodging your question, because I would hate to do that to a member from my home town in the Ottawa area, let me put it this way. I spent long years working for a public real estate company, and I think it is fair to say there were some hard lessons learned in the early 1980s as the public real estate companies burdened themselves with debts to a level far beyond what they were capable of ever dealing with. I think those lessons were hard learned for most of those people, and for those that did not learn them, some them are not around today. So I think in that context, we have to be very careful about the whole issue of debt.

Mr Sterling: Not to prolong that issue, the other area I am very much concerned about is that when new governments come in, there is a tendency for them to change the bookkeeping system so that basically they cannot be compared to previous governments, previous administrations. Mr Laughren has said he is going to create the Ontario capital fund, giving the impression to the people that a certain amount of the budget, perhaps as much as $4 billion, will be going to capital works. However, he does not include in his accounting procedure depreciation for public works which are depreciating because of physical deterioration etc. Being in the building industry, you would well understand that buildings do depreciate in real value. Perhaps the land increases in value, but government's land does not increase in value in a real way as private land does. Do you think that is a fair method of keeping books?

Mr Rawlings: I will repeat Mr Libfeld's statement that we are not economists. However, certainly dealing with things such as municipal infrastructure, it is to me frightening that there still remains a large number of municipalities that have not yet realized they are sitting on a tremendous asset of infrastructure and they continue to not deal with it as an asset and look for a proper return on that asset.

There is a large number of municipalities whose sewage treatment facilities do not operate on the basis that they pay for themselves. The water treatment facilities do not pay for themselves because they are something you deal with when they break, but you do not treat them as an asset. I guess that is an indirect response to your question.

When we are talking about infrastructure that can be depreciated over a long term, that is one part of the solution, but it really comes down to a broader sense of treating our infrastructure and our capital investments in a far more businesslike way, and in many cases I think it is appropriate.

Mr Sterling: I think he points out in his document that in the early 1960s about 10% of the budget at that time went towards creating infrastructure. The 1960s was a great time for building highways, as you may now recall. Now it is down to about 4%.

My concern is that the public does not get the wrong idea in terms of capital expenditures, that you are building a new sewer system and you say, "Okay, that's new and therefore shouldn't be today's expenditures, but should be depreciated over the next 20 years." But, as you know, the city of Ottawa has a tremendously precarious sewer and water system which has not been repaired or taken care of for the last 25 years, because municipal politicians chose not to face that situation.

In my view, those assets should be depreciating at a very rapid rate right now and if you do not put one side of that on the books, then I think the public will get the wrong view in terms of the capital operating account. Anyway, that is not a question; that is an opinion.

Mr B. Ward: What do you think about that?

The Vice-Chair: I am sorry, the five minutes is up. We will move on to the governing party, Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: Welcome, gentlemen. It is good to see you both again. I appreciate the time you have taken to put together your brief and for coming forward.

I would like to ask you if you categorically and unequivocally condemn every single word in the budget? No, I am being very rhetorical. What I would like to ask you, however, is along the lines of the approvals process. It is interesting for those of us sitting here that in your presentation, and I would like to quote: "We believe the public interest includes ensuring a supply of land that will avoid run-ups in the cost of housing. This can only be done with an approvals process that works more efficiently."

That comes from you as the Ontario home builders, and before you, earlier this morning, we heard from the building and construction trades council that—of course, I have lost it. Sorry, I do not have my finger on it. I moved it to be a smart-aleck and lost my quote. However, they made a similar statement regarding the lands process and talked about the need to expedite that process to bring on more housing.

My question to you is twofold. First of all, in light of the fact that you seem to have a common ground there and that this government has attempted to make co-operation and partnership a cornerstone of decision-making for the future, albeit people can argue how successfully to date—in that spirit, would you feel comfortable in working with the labour organizations to that end in conjunction with government? If so, could you maybe throw out a couple of the concrete ideas you are looking at when you talk about streamlining the process and whether there is a dollar figure attached?

Mr Libfeld: Ian and I will both answer that. Number one, the reason we have common ground is that a lot of those 40,000 members of the group you met earlier work for our firms in various capacities. Some of them, quite a few of them today, are not working and are looking for employment elsewhere, or they have just got back to work and want to keep their jobs. They understand supply is important. Without the quantity of land in the system we cannot deliver all the choices of homes the purchasers in the province want.

Within Ian's brief he mentioned that a water and sewer corporation could possibly answer some of those problems as to the infrastructure, who is going to be paying for it and how it is going to be paid, and get up to speed and make a commitment towards infrastructure that has not been made in probably 20 years in this province. We have systems that date back to Confederation, and it is really serious. As far as the points on the approvals process, Ian will answer.

Mr Rawlings: Yes. I am not proud. Anybody who understands the issue of the approvals process to the extent that they realize it is a disaster, I will work with them to try to improve it, quite frankly. There is no question there are any number of opportunities we have taken as an industry to meet with successive governments and give them our ideas; specific, definitive, cogent, clear ideas on what you could do; some no cost, no consequence; some that might take a little more conviction to solve some of our problems. We will continue to do that. We welcome any opportunity—that is my business. I am an urban planner and it is frightening to me the process I deal with every day. It is a mess, and it can be fixed. It can make some dramatic improvements in our industry and in the way we do business. The best opportunity to have some meaningful impact on the issues of affordability, the issues of protecting our social interests, our environmental interests, is to sit down and deal with the approvals process. No question, I am convinced.

Mr B. Ward: I have one other question. The Fair Tax Commission is forming working groups to examine different segments of the tax sectors in the province. Have you requested participation on those working groups?

In your brief you mentioned that the recession in the housing industry occurred in the Toronto area 18 months ago and then, in the second quarter of the 1990s, spread. It is always easier to examine our past than it is to project the future. What do you feel were the leading economic indicators that created the recession 18 months ago?

Mr Libfeld: To answer your second question first, GST, free trade, high interest rates.

Mr B. Ward: But GST did not come in until 1990.

Mr Libfeld: But the threat of GST and what meant—your first question again was?

Mr B. Ward: So GST and interest rates started going up.

Mr Libfeld: There was uncertainty as well as the recession.

Mr B. Ward: The other question was about the Fair Tax Commission.

Mr Libfeld: We have representation on one of the committees that is meeting now and we have requested representation on other committees as well.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation, Mr Libfeld and Mr Rawlings. This committee is recessed until 1:30, when we will have the next presentation.

Mr Libfeld: Thank you very much for the opportunity of meeting with you.

The committee recessed at 1214.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1340.

The Vice-Chair: We are running a little bit behind. We do not have everyone here, but we have representation from all three parties and I guess we should proceed or we will get even further behind.

REGIONAL MUNICIPALITY OF PEEL

The Vice-Chair: Our first presentation this afternoon is by Frank Bean, chairman and chief executive officer of the regional municipality of Peel. Welcome to the committee. You have approximately a half-hour altogether. Whatever time you use in your presentation will be deducted from the time for questions, which we will divide equally between the three parties. If you would like to commence.

Mr Bean: Thank you very much. I would. I will not take near the half-hour for the presentation. I believe members of the committee have copies of my presentation. I would like to walk you through it, and I will be brief.

First, let me thank the members of the committee and you, Mr Chairman, and the clerk for allowing Peel to be presented today to make this presentation on a nice, sunny summer afternoon. I am sure many of your constituents and probably many of mine believe we are on a long summer's recess and are unaware of the work that gets done in committee. If they would only watch question period. It is too bad they do not really have a better understanding of what work is done at committee.

I am sure every member of this standing committee is painfully aware, some more than others, maybe, that the 1991 Ontario budget is a very contentious document. According to pollsters, the public and credit rating agencies in Canada and the US do not like the budget, and social service interest groups who advocate increased spending do not think the budget went far enough. I imagine James Frank from the Conference Board of Canada must sound like a voice in the wilderness about now.

Some observers might try to explain the widespread public discontent over the budget as an unavoidable by-product of the governance process in a large and diverse province like Ontario. After all, governance in a democracy is all about compromises and tough policy choices that do not necessarily please everyone or even anyone.

To be sure, the post-honeymoon reality of governance in Ontario can explain part of the public's negative reaction to the budget. However, I believe the negative reaction signifies much more than the end of the Rae government's honeymoon. I believe public honeymoons with government in Canada ended a long time ago. The public has become far too cynical for honeymoons. Now they judge us, your government and my government, day by day and issue by issue.

In the case of the 1991 Ontario budget, my colleagues and I believe the public views the $9.7-billion deficit and the spiralling accumulated debt, $77 billion by 1994-95, as evidence of too much government, unreasonable levels of taxation and needless duplication. In my view, the public views constantly expanding deficits as an easy way out, an admission that its children's taxes are going to pay for today's services. The typical taxpayer, Jane Q. Public, does not run her personal finances in this way. I have learned to be ambivalent. She lives within her means and tightens her belt when times are tough, and she expects governments to do likewise. From John Q. Public's perspective, it was bad enough hearing about multibillion-dollar deficits from Mike Wilson. Now the public is learning the deficit virus is spreading from Ottawa to the province.

I suggest that if provincial politicians put their ears to the ground and listened to the public, something we municipal politicians do pretty darned well, they will hear the beginnings of a stampede towards an obvious solution to big government and persistent deficits, a province-wide tax revolt. We are all hearing rumblings of that out there right now. On this question of revolts, municipal governments can act as distant early warning systems for other levels of government. Let me tell you, we are picking up plenty of activity on our political radar screens.

The tax complaints we hear about most often focus on two main issues: inadequate political accountability and needless program duplication. This entanglement is a big part of the solution on both issues.

Governments in this province, all governments, are going to have to sort out the existing mess of entangled roles and responsibilities. Governments are going to have to simplify the way they deliver and finance services. They need to demonstrate to the taxpayer that they can deliver value for the tax dollar. Right now the taxpayer finds it nearly impossible to hold individual governments accountable because it is unclear exactly who is responsible for a given service. Welfare funding is a perfect example, or maybe I should say an imperfect example, of our entangled intergovernmental relationship. In the middle of a recession, Ottawa cuts its share of welfare funding by capping payments from the Canada assistance plan, thereby causing a hike in provincial and municipal welfare contributions. Shortly thereafter, the province's budget increases its basic social assistance payment rates—20% of which we municipalities must fund.

I suspect the municipal taxpayers do not care or even know about the federal cap on CAP or the provincial welfare rate increases. All they know and care about is the property tax increase that flows out of these policy decisions their elected councils had nothing to do with. If governments are going to correct this accountability problem, all three levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, are going to have to work together to disentangle their respective roles and responsibilities. Disentanglement will permit voters to make informed choices about the quality and indeed quantity of public services they receive. Democracy in a federal state like Canada demands no less than informed choices.

I say to you that if the province really believes in disentanglement—and this is something I have talked about for many years and, I suggest to you, through various governments—the process that led to the Back on Track welfare reforms is the wrong way to go. While not strictly part of the 1991 budget, Back on Track clearly illustrates the need for careful consultation by the province on programs where responsibility is shared between different levels of government. In that sense, the Back on Track process provides a lesson on process for future provincial budgets.

In more recent days, I will give some credit to the ministry, the government. In my view, they certainly have not changed their philosophies about Back on Track and I do not think this minister ever will. But they have realized they cannot accomplish some of the things they thought they could by August, and that in recent days there has been, and I hope will continue to be, some dialogue with municipalities and AMO, the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, on how this will or can be implemented. But even that is after the fact and not before the thing was mandated.

I have come to the conclusion many of their recommendations make the welfare reform process more complicated and more adversarial for persons applying for assistance. In many ways, Back on Track, far from disentangling and simplifying what now can be an inhumane, bureaucratic maze, will entangle and further complicate the delivery of welfare, aside from the costs.

Peel supports many of the recent changes that have given the poor a more reasonable allowance to live on, changes that have also provided recipients with financial incentives to work. However, the single greatest step towards welfare reform still lies before us. The province needs to fund 100% of welfare programs from the progressive income tax base and allow municipalities to fund hard services on the property tax base. In this way, income can be properly redistributed by the province, and benefits can be standardized province-wide. I am not suggesting there is a free lunch for us and the municipalities either. I think we should pay our way, but I think there should be discussion on how we can disentangle.

I must say I was disappointed to see that the 1991 Ontario budget had nothing to say on the issue of provincial-municipal disentanglement, yet we had much input prior to the budget's coming down. Even a statement of support in principle would have been helpful. However, I am marginally encouraged that discussions between the province and AMO on disentanglement are continuing to move forward. I will be even more encouraged when the province broadens the process and deals directly with regional chairmen to remove general welfare assistance from the property tax base in exchange for regions taking on additional hard-service financing.

Make no mistake. Disentanglement is the number one priority on the regional agenda, not just my region. I just returned from a meeting of regional chairmen last week and it is something we were unanimous about. A successful disentanglement exercise is necessary if tax revolts across the province are to be avoided. Disentanglement is not a partisan issue; it is simply a question of good government. I urge all parties in the Legislature to support this much-needed reform.

On the question of fighting the recession, municipal governments understand the province's determination to be seen to be doing something constructive. Recessions hurt people in very real ways. Families are split and careers are shattered. Recessions are a serious business. Fighting recessions should also be a serious business.

Accelerated capital works spending is a time-honoured method of stimulating a weak economy. Surely the bonding agencies, the Bay Street types and the public at large understand this and consider debt financing of tangible capital assets as an investment in the future. The problem is that the Treasurer's $6.3-billion increase in 1991 spending features only $1.1 billion in capital spending.

In the minds of our old friends Jane and John Q. Public, might be acceptable for people and governments to borrow money to finance a new house or a new car. However, borrowing money to pay for the groceries is not deemed good financial planning by any stretch of the imagination. Premier Rae was not elected to provide programs taxpayers cannot afford to pay for. The public expects tough choices about resource allocation and understands that services are not free. "Pay as you go" has to be the philosophical rule of the day when it comes to provincial and municipal budgets.

We now see signs the recession is easing, small signs albeit. When the economy recovers, will an extra $35 billion in provincial debt over the next four years be a help or will be a hindrance? It seems to me that governments that choose to buy into a view of the economy, that have an obligation to buy in all the way, stimulate weak economies with deficit-financed spending and moderate strong economies by running budget surpluses. To continue running large deficits though an economic recovery would be economically irresponsible and, I believe, ultimately politically disastrous.

I guess the lesson I urge this standing committee to take away from the ongoing debate about debt and recession-fighting strategies is the following: Governments that want to intervene in a weak economy had better be awful sure of their timing and had better be willing to make tough spending decisions during the subsequent recovery. Time will tell if the current government is up to this fiscal challenge. If the Ontario government fails to meet this challenge of being fiscally responsible across a whole business cycle, the credit worthiness of all governments, the province may be adversely affected. This is a particular concern for Peel region. We are one of a select few municipal governments with a better credit rating than the province. Peel's credit rating is triple A on both boards, the highest possible designation. It has been for some time and continues to be.

As we all know, "competitiveness" is the new economic buzzword. The budget contains a policy paper on this subject. I am told the government of the day does not like the word "competitiveness." They see it was a code word for staff cuts and wage rollbacks. I, for one, like the word "competitiveness," balanced by a concern for social justice. I like the notion that wages should expand only as quickly as productivity improves, that is, CEO wages as well as factory wages. The decline in Canadian competitiveness concerns me as a Canadian citizen and as a holder of public office in a prosperous community. I agree with the Premier that key actors in the economy, business, government and labour, need to work together to improve our competitiveness.

Municipal governments have a significant role to play in Ontario efforts to remain economically competitive. To the extent that provincial-municipal disentanglement will make Ontario's governments more efficient, economic competitiveness will be improved. Just try to be competitive without first-rate water and sewage services. Just try to be competitive without a comprehensive road system to haul goods into the American market. Just try to be competitive without properly planned communities.

Most important, just try to be competitive without governments committed to balanced operating budgets and reasonable tax and regulatory policies. Disentangled municipal governments can be a part of the competitiveness solution because we can provide the least amount of the necessary government at the lowest possible cost. Municipal governments must and do balance their operating budgets every year. They borrow money only to finance capital works like roads and sewers. Debt-servicing levels are strictly regulated by the OMB.

This commitment to "pay as you go" financing is not the product of elected municipal politicians who are somehow more disciplined or visionary than their federal or provincial counterparts. In fact, municipal fiscal responsibility is largely the product of legislation. We are legally obliged by the Municipal Act to balance the budgets—many of you who have been at the municipalities well know this—so this is what we do. We balance budgets, and we would not want it any other way. This legal requirement protects our politicians from themselves during weak moments when interest groups are pressing hard for new programs we really cannot afford. That did not happen in your day, Mr Stockwell.

Mr Stockwell: No, it never happened in my day.

Mr Bean: I suspect there may be a lesson here for all governments to consider, the lesson of legally mandated budgets. Operating budgets should balance over the life of the business cycle, perhaps over a five-year period. It might be easier for federal and provincial politicians to allocate resources if they built some budgetary fences around themselves. Fences that guarantee a "pay as you go" approach would win out in the medium to long term. Legally mandated limits work for municipalities. Perhaps they could work here or in Ottawa. Such limits may be the only way to ease public cynicism over the ability of governments to manage the country's finances.

To summarize, let me say I think all levels of government have to do better. We have to do better. Our programs need to be simplified and made more efficient. Our various roles and responsibilities need to be disentangled and made clear to the taxpayer who bankrolls our efforts. Our budgets need to balance over the longer term of an economic cycle, and debt should only be used to finance capital investments, not operating expenditures. In short, governments need to govern in the name of the general good, not in the name of any particular special interests.

As an aside, I do have some good news. I should not preach disentanglement unless I practise it, and indeed in Peel we have for some time. We are seeing some signs where not just our area municipalities work more closely with us but our school boards, and in working out purchasing and combined tendering processes, there is a way, and we are finding a way within our responsibility and indeed the authority that we have, without permission from any other level of government. We can and must practise what we preach, so while I preach, and many of you have heard me maybe far too often over a dozen years talking about this kind of thing, we in Peel and our constituent municipalities and other levels of government are seeing some signs of progress. It can be done.

I hope my comments are somewhat helpful to the committee and the government. I hope the next year's provincial budget reflects the schooling in real-world governance the NDP government is now receiving. I hope I do not need to appear before the committee again next year and at least have the same message.

Let me say to you that I think the bottom line in my presentations as they come before the various committees at Queen's Park—through various governments, I underline again; it is not just this one—is communication. We have asked for that for a very long time, through various ministries, through various premiers. We believe even though sometimes the pill is bitter, we can deliver the services to the taxpayer. At least we can say we were part of it.

It is easy to blame another level of government, and all of us do that far too often. It is easy for you to blame the feds and us to blame you and everybody blames everybody else, and I can tell you, and you know, that your constituents are saying, "A pox on all your houses, because you're all to blame," and, you know, we are.

We want to do our part in Peel. My colleagues in other regions also want to do their part. We are happy to meet with committees and ministers at every opportunity, through AMO, through a regional chairmen's group and individually.

Thank you, Mr Chairman. That is the full cup of my comments. I am available.

1400

The Vice-Chair: We have approximately two and a half minutes per party, starting with the third party.

Mr Stockwell: The $700-million program was bandied about quite often by the government and its suggestion was that it would be an anti-recession program. How did that work in Peel? Was it an effective use of the money? Did you start new programs that would not have been done previously?

Mr Bean: The short answer is no. There were no new programs started that were not scheduled anyway.

Mr Stockwell: I have not talked to a municipality that has not given me that answer. So in effect it is a capital works program, but it is very difficult to get a capital works program up and going in a few short months, as I would see it.

Mr Bean: Exactly.

Mr Stockwell: The other question is disentanglement. I hear that quite often. I agree with balancing your budget during a term of five years. The trouble is that provincially we do not really know how long the term will be. But I do not disagree with that. I also agree that debenturing, as municipalities term it, capital works at the provincial level should be the only thing borrowed for. Your operating budget you should pay as you go.

The disentanglement makes a rather interesting debate. You are suggesting maybe the municipalities could take over roads work and the provincial government could take over social services.

Mr Bean: Sure. What I am saying very succinctly is that if we want to develop, and Peel does, and we are, then we should be able to pay as we go. If we want to bring new development in, we should be prepared to pay a bigger share of the hard services, where we have some control. If a municipality cannot afford to do that or chooses not to do that, then it chooses not to develop as quickly as we would. At least we have some control. With welfare, of course, we do not.

Mr Jamison: Thank you for your presentation. In your presentation I hear the word "restraint" and so forth. You mentioned as you gave your report the freeze from the federal government, which showed a cutback in their—

Mr Bean: A cap on CAP.

Mr Jamison: That is right. When we met with AMO just a few short days ago, AMO lauded our ability to make a transfer in a difficult time. Couple that with the tax coalition group, or groups, that are out there and I would like to ask you, what in fact would you have had to do as a municipality if that 5% increase in transfers to the municipality was not there? What would you be doing at this point in time, or how would you have dealt with that as the region of Peel? Again, it was interesting to hear AMO laud the government for doing that. What it would have meant to your taxpayer group in relation to the coalition is what I am talking about.

Mr Bean: Let's take Peel this year. We had no increase in our property tax base on all line departments save and except welfare and police. The police are more than half of our budget and we had a sizeable increase in police. In all the other departments, including social services—that is seniors and day care and all of those things—we came in at a zero increase in our budget. We then had to come up to about 6% because of welfare and part of the police.

So to answer your question, if the kick had been more severe to us, we had no choice; our property tax base would have had to make up the differential. With the trickling down, if you will, from the feds to you and you to us, we would really have just been in worse shape than we were. We were in bad shape because of welfare and we would have been in worse shape.

I guess what I am flagging in here is that I am saying to this government, have a very serious look at Back on Track, because if you think this year was bad, wait until you see what municipalities say to you next year with Back on Track implemented, which is going to make it worse.

Mr Jamison: My question was, what would it have meant to your ratepayers?

The Vice-Chair: Sorry, Mr Jamison. I have to move on to the official opposition.

Mr Bean: A couple more per cent.

Mr Phillips: Two quick questions. I really appreciate your thoughtful presentation, and the budget is going in a direction that is not consistent with your recommendation in that there are four years of very substantial deficits.

My first question is, I think this budget was designed to kind of get the economy going again. I would like your feeling on how well you think that will work in terms of getting the economy going. I ask you particularly, because you are historically in the fastest-growing area in Canada and you will see either a pickup or a slowdown probably faster than anybody.

On my second one you may not be able to give me an answer today, but I would appreciate your thoughtful comments on the capital account fund proposed in the budget which says that the province should be spending $5 billion to $6 billion a year on capital and therefore will spend $1 billion to $16 billion over the next three years but will only show about $1.2 billion in expenditures. I would like your thoughts on both of those.

Mr Bean: I think the second one is much more difficult and I will probably want to reflect back on it and give a more thoughtful answer to the committee another day.

But you are quite right. The region of Peel, and the other one is the region of York, are the two fastest-growing regions and we see indicators more quickly, although in Peel we are fortunate that our growth is not just single large industries; there is a good cross-section. I hope what this province has done will show some stimulation.

I guess the point I would make to you is that I think there has to be dialogue. Just as our treasurers all talk to each other and our chief administrative officers all talk to each other, I believe the government, the ministries, should be getting the dialogue from the municipalities, both AMO and through various committees of treasurers, as an example, while they are thinking about legislation. We talked about that when your party was in government. I think we could help shape the legislation and then at least we would have to take some responsibility too.

So the short answer to your first question is that I hope indeed it is going to work. I think we see some signs in Peel now that there is some turnaround. There are some positive things in the building industry right now in Peel. We are very large in housing. We have a large housing department. So there are some positive indicators on the horizon right now.

On the second one, I think I would like to get back to you on it.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Bean, for your presentation today.

ONTARIO TRUCKING ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation is from the Ontario Trucking Association, David Bradley, president; John Sanderson, vice-president of corporate development; and Paul Hammond from Muskoka Transport Ltd. Welcome to the finance and economic affairs committee on post-budget hearings. You will have approximately half an hour overall for the presentation. Whatever time you use for your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the ne for questions, which will be divided equally between three parties. So if you would like to commence your presentation.

Mr Bradley: We are pleased to be here this afternoon. I would just like to indicate that John Sanderson is the vice-president, corporate development, at CP Trucks in Willowdale; He is not with the Ontario Trucking Association. He is a board member. Paul Hammond is the president of Muskoka Transport in Bracebridge; that is a smaller, family-owned company.

We did appear before the committee back in January, and you will recall at that time our message was that the trucking industry was reeling from the impact of deregulation at both the federal and provincial levels, from the impact of the recession and from the impact of the government of Canada's monetary policy, the high dollar and high interest rates.

At that time we were seeing bankruptcies in the trucking industry escalating, we were seeing employment decline and we were seeing the flight of trucking companies involved in the transborder business, at least part or all of their operations, to US bases. While we put a number of proposals and issues before the committee at that time, really our message was two key things, "Please, don't raise taxes on this industry at this time and please, if you can, find the way to provide some short-term, temporary relief to save those jobs and to maintain this essential service in the province." We met with the committee, as I mentioned, and so with the Treasurer and other people in government.

What has happened since January? Things did not get better through the course of the winter and continue to this day. Bankruptcies in the Ontario trucking industry in 1990 were up 156% over 1989. For the first five months of 1991 they are up again, by 74% over the same period in 1990. Employment in the trucking industry declined by over 9% in 1990, and that is against a national average drop of 2%. In the trucking industry, I think, has been more severely hit, particularly in this province, than other industries.

As I mentioned, we have seen the bankruptcies up 74% but really starting to hit in terms of the family businesses and some of the major employers in the trucking industry. Since January we have most recently seen Taggart Transport in Perth close its doors. That is a 70-year-old family business. It employed 260 people at the time of closure. A couple of years ago that company employed about 500 people.

In the same part of the province, in April we saw the bankruptcy of GTL Transport, one of the top five trucking companies in Canada, throwing in excess of 600 people out on the street in Ontario.

As well, we saw Bill Thompson Transport, an innovative and efficient carrier in St Thomas go bankrupt. That company employed 500 people in Ontario.

The flight to the United States of trucking companies involved in the transborder business has continued unabated. It is not something they want to do but is something they have been forced into doing. Now most of the major transborder carriers would have a US subsidiary. I mention to you that the growth now in the transborder market is going to be on the US side. Interesting. You take the example of Bill Thompson Transport. It went bankrupt in Ontario and is now operating out of Pontiac, Michigan, employing US drivers, using US equipment and paying taxes in the United States.

Against that backdrop then, you can see why we as an industry were somewhat shocked and felt somewhat betrayed by the April budget in which the Treasurer announced a 31% increase in the tax on diesel fuel. He indicated at the time that he was aware of the industry's problems and that there was a recession on, so he would stage that tax increase in two parts, a 1.7-cent-a-litre increase on the day of the budget and a further 1.7 cents a litre to come on January 1, 1992, but still a 31% increase in the tax on fuel.

As you can imagine, that has a significant impact on our industry. In many operations fuel represents up to 30% of operating costs. We estimate that when the full tax increases come in that is going to add $2,000 in tax cost per truck per year to operate that vehicle.

What the committee needs to understand is there is no real ability at this point in the trucking industry to pass that cost along to the consumer. We have a hyper-competitive state and I think the government recognized that in terms of bringing in the moratorium on intraprovincial licences. But that is not going to have an immediate impact. It is a significant gesture, but we still need time. We cannot pass those costs along to the consumer.

Nor is there really any scope at this point in time for the industry to absorb that kind of cost increase. Profit margins are thin or non-existent. The trucking industry in Ontario has been operating at a loss for the last three years. For many companies, many family companies, many owner-operators—the one-man, one-truck operation—currently hanging by a thread, this tax measure contained in the budget is going to force some of those already on the brink of failure into bankruptcy. I cannot say to what extent it had an impact on Taggart and some of the other ones I have mentioned. Certainly there are a lot of factors that go into this, but it is a factor none the less. It is also one that is taking away from many companies right now the hope of surviving during the current period.

The Treasurer indicated in his statement bringing down his budget, however, that the reason he was bringing in this tax increase was in the interest of fuel efficiency and fuel conservation. In other words, it was an environmental tax. In the trucking industry we think it is a laudable goal to be trying to improve fuel conservation and efficiency, and certainly our industry has been working hard over the last couple of years to clean up our act with respect to the environment and to do a better job than we have been doing, but we have been doing a good job and I do not think that has been fully recognized.

There are some other factors that I think need to be taken into account, because while the goal of improving the environment may have been the justification for this tax measure, I argue that really the tax measure is going to work in the opposite direction and is going to impede the ability of the industry to improve its environmental performance.

The reason for that is that there has been a lot of work under way with respect to fuel emissions from the heavy trucks. Recently we have been meeting with truck engine manufacturers. There is data contained in the brief that will show you there are two pivotal years. One is 1991 and the other will be in 1994, where the engine manufacturers have had to adapt to new standards—these are the Environmental Protection Agency standards in the United States—for emissions from heavy trucks. These have not been adopted as legal standards in Canada, but the manufacturers here are voluntarily complying with those.

The 1991 heavy truck engine is emitting 50% less emissions of NO_x and particulates. In 1994, when the next round of improvements comes into being, you will again see further significant reductions in emissions. There are some very exciting things under way. As well, by 1993 or 1994 we are going to see the introduction of clean diesel fuel in the trucking industry. That is a low-sulphur-content diesel fuel. In fact, we will see a reduction of 90% in the sulphur content of diesel fuel by weight. As well, by the mid-1990s we are going to see the introduction of particulate traps. These are traps that will appear on a truck and will, in effect, capture any emissions that are still getting out at that time.

These are exciting things on the environmental front. However, they do not come without a cost. The new truck engine I mentioned currently is an increase of about 15% over previous model years; the new clean diesel, when it comes into being in the mid-1990s, is estimated to add up to five cents a litre in increased cost on diesel fuel; and particulate traps will add about $15,000 to the cost of a truck. Expensive stuff.

The other side of the coin is that when one talks about fuel efficiency and fuel conservation, I guess the justification for the tax was: "Penalize them. Put a cost on that pollution and they will have to become more fuel-efficient." The fact is that since OPEC, the trucking industry has doubled its fuel efficiency, a remarkable performance, but now, as the engine manufacturers are moving into making cleaner, less-emission engines, there is a tradeoff between fuel efficiency and fuel emissions. The facts are that the technology will not permit further substantive increases in fuel efficiency, certainly not on the order of those we saw in the 1970s and 1980s. If you want improved reduction of fuel emissions, you are not going to get further major improvements in fuel efficiency.

There will be some scope for further improvement. That can come through driver training, new tires, aerodynamic flaring, those kinds of things, but substantially the technology is such that there is not much more they can do with the truck engine for the foreseeable future to get much more efficiency out of it. In effect, the tax is a penalty to which the trucking industry is not going to be able to adjust. It is as simple as that.

I have mentioned the cost of these new engines and that 1991 is an important year and 1994 is an important year. The bare facts are that very few, if any, truckers right now have the money to invest in this equipment. Most of the equipment that you would find out on highways is mid-1980s vintage. Adding a further tax and taking away whatever profit there is in the industry now by virtue of this tax measure is simply going to make it that much more impossible for the industry to meet this environmental challenge and, at the same time, to invest in equipment that would assist us in our competitive situation. New equipment is more productive. They should be somewhat more fuel-efficient, the 1991s, than what is available in the mid-1980s models.

Look, if we really do want to keep this essential service, trucking, in Ontario, if we do want to maintain those jobs and try to bring some stability to the industry and we really are serious about the environment, then do not just give us words on paper about fuel conservation; understand and work with the industry in trying to bring about those technological enhancements.

Our recommendation to the committee would be that you recommend to the Treasurer that he repeal the 31% increase in the tax on diesel fuel. I realize that is difficult for Treasurers to do, but again, if we are serious about the environment, if we are serious about the jobs, then let's go on with the business of making those things work. As well when we visited with you in January we recommended that the government introduce a temporary exemption from the retail sales tax on heavy trucks and trailers, parts and labour. That, I will remind you, is something that was introduced during the 1982 recession for the trucking industry. We are asking that it be introduced again.

Both of those measures, I think, would help. They would not solve the problems of the trucking industry—not all of them are the provincial government's responsibility—but they would certainly help to put the industry on a more viable and competitive footing and, at the same time, help us to meet the environmental challenges that lie ahead.

Our response at the time when the budget came out was that we thought it was insensitive and regressive with respect to the concerns of the trucking industry, and we still believe that to be the case. Other people said stronger things or took even stronger action. You will recall the blockades of May. The Ontario Trucking Association does not do its business that way. We launched the "Axe the Tax by Fax" campaign to try to bring all those involved in the industry—the workers, the unions, the carriers, the suppliers—to the attention of the Treasurer. He did meet with us and discussions are ongoing with his officials, but I certainly think a recommendation from this committee would go a long way in terms of maintaining a viable domestic trucking industry in Ontario.

I thank you for the time. We welcome any question you might have.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation. We have about four minutes per party. We will be starting with the governing party.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I wanted to ask you basically for some background information—it might be in here, but I do not see it, flicking through the pages—about the relative freedom to do business in Canada and the US. My understanding, under the deregulation that went on under both the federal and provincial governments, is that US carriers are free to operate here, to bring goods here and to move them from province to province. I seem to recall that you do not have the same nt. You may have in certain states, but you do not have right throughout the United States for a Canadian truck transport goods to the United States, pick up goods there and move them to another state, whereas the American trucking companies have the right to do that here under the regulation that went on under part of the free trade agreement. Then the previous provincial government introduced some legislation which was to more or less parallel federal legislation. Could you give me some background on that?

Mr Bradley: Yes. Essentially, you are correct, although, as with most issues in trucking, it is a little more nuanced than that. The United States deregulated its interstate trucking industry in 1980, which meant it was easy for Canadian truckers and for American carriers to get licences to operate into and out of the United States for cross-border trucking. In Canada, in 1988, the Canadian federal government deregulated inter- or extraprovincial trucking here in Canada, which gave anybody easy access to licences to operate into and out of Canada. So in that sense it was more or less equal from a licensing situation. Ontario, however, they took deregulation one step further and deregulated intraprovincial trucking, that is, movement within the province.

In the United States they never followed through with that second round of deregulation. Currently, only seven states are deregulated, and they are places like Arizona, Wisconsin and Alaska. None of the contiguous northeastern states are deregulated. In fact, they still maintain regulated environments, which means it is next to impossible for a Canadian or anyone to get a licence to operate, say, between points in Michigan or between points in New York.

There is the licence aspect of that, but there is also a customs and immigration aspect, and there are restrictions on Americans operating within Canada, just as there are restrictions on Canadians operating within the United States. Certainly, the licences are available and under certain limited circumstances they can conduct what is called botage here.

Ms M. Ward: That would make the Canadian costs higher, in the sense of a Canadian truck company going down there and taking goods, and the American company bringing goods up here and then doing some local shipping, you might say. The local component of it would reduce their costs of shipping up here, would it not?

Mr Bradley: The Americans have a cost advantage over Canadian trucking companies, so to the extent that they compete with us on the transborder market, they are able to take advantage of that lower cost base, and to the extent that they would be able to operate intraprovincially, which is limited, then they would be able to take advantage of it there. But there are not too many Americans right now who are operating intra-Ontario. Those who are have cut out operations here.

Mr B. Ward: I want to go back in the past a little bit. In the 1980s, I can recall a number of protests against the federal government, against deregulation, privatization, a number of federal policy issues. It seems to me—I am not a trucker, but I do have a neighbour who is a trucker—that what is killing the industry is the implementation of deregulation on top of free trade, on top of a high dollar, high interest rates, because the licences increased massively under deregulation. I was just wondering if your organization in the 1980s publicly supported or publicly opposed the implementation of deregulation and/or free trade.

Mr Bradley: We publicly opposed. However, when those things became a political reality, both at the federal level and here in Ontario, we tried to make the best of a bad situation by working with the legislation to try to put some safeguards in for the industry and also to ensure that we had a level playing field before we entered into deregulation. That has not happened, and some of the things we forecast at this table three years ago, sadly enough, have come true.

But at the same time, while the federal government has a major responsibility here, I would not let the Ontario government off the hook to say, "It's all Ottawa."

Mr B. Ward: I am not saying that.

Mr Bradley: Ottawa has to do something, but the provinces essentially regulate transportation in this country, and tax transportation as well. I come back again to the tax measure, that a trucker, whether he is an interprovincial or intraprovincial trucker, still pays the Ontario diesel fuel tax.

Mr B. Ward: Does the trucking—

The Vice-Chair: I am sorry, Mr Ward. The time is up.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to raise some questions about your efforts to try to lessen the impact of the budget. I recall that when you appeared before us in the pre-budget hearings you had severe problems then. You were looking for some sort of government help to allow you to stay competitive, to allow you to stay in business, and then as a result of the budget, whatever problems you had were exacerbated by this 31% additional cost.

When the Treasurer announced that, I immediately rose in the House to question the one aspect of it, which was the gasguzzler tax and what it would do to automobile production in this province. He then said to me it was of no impact. He saw no reason to change it and notwithstanding that he would look at it, he would expect that he would not change it. He said that publicly. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology said exactly the same thing: that it had virtually no impact on production of automobiles. As a result of an intervention by Bob White—who initially approved it until he started to get feedback from his members—it was changed, and they made a total about-face. My question to you is, do you not have access to the same kind of clout to get them to rescind this thing for the truckers? Obviously, any business that is in trouble and then suddenly has a 31% increase in one of its major costs can only suffer worse than it was before. What progress, if any, are you making in trying to get this changed?

Mr Bradley: Obviously, we also took note of what happened with the gas guzzler tax and it was quite distressful to us. That was part of the motivation behind Axe the Tax by Fax. When we met with the Treasurer during that week it was not only OTA but we also had representatives of the trade unions, from the trucking industry, the owner-operator associations and suppliers.

We have met with the Treasurer. We are continuing to meet with his advisers. We are bringing the same case forward that we brought to you, but there has been no decision yet. There is another study under way right now in the trucking industry and he has indicated he wants to wait until that study is released some time in early September. I cannot answer your question about why for them something happened and something did not happen for us, an industry that is suffering just as badly and seeing jobs leave the province. I do not know, and it concerns us.

Mr B. Ward: Just a point of clarification: I think the statement was made, "It is an immediate increase." and I do not believe that is true. I would like that clarified.

Mr Bradley: No, it is. Half was midnight on April 29, the other half will be on January 1, 1992.

Mr B. Ward: So it is not immediate.

Mr Bradley: Not immediate, no—15% now, 15% later.

Mr Stockwell: It never ceases to amaze me with this government that when someone comes in and wants to talk tax increases provincially, the government members want to talk about federal politics and deregulation. I think they have missed the point. Clearly the whole point of your deputation here was to try to emphasize the fact that taxes were draconian by nature. The letter you received from the Treasurer was interesting. I guess you slept easier when you got this letter, because he is going to do a study. That must make you feel a lot better, because you are going to have it back in July. I see in your report that with these tax increases we are going to be the third highest tax jurisdiction in North America, so they are going to do a study to see if you are right. Any comments on the study yet?

Mr Bradley: The study is something the Ministry of Transportation embarked upon some time ago when the minister of the day wanted to get a handle on the transborder competitiveness situation. I anticipate that study will show that Ontario-based carriers are at a competitive disadvantage with their US competition.

Interjection: Yes, that is part of the puzzle, but the problem is not only—

Mr Stockwell: So what? Have they promised to do anything about it should they get back a study that says, "Yes, we are the third highest"? So they do a study—big deal. Have they given you any commitment that they are going to act on that study?

Mr Bradley: No.

Mr Stockwell: No. So it is just empty promises.

Mr Bradley: Time will tell, but obviously we would like to see some immediate action.

Mr Stockwell: Take my word for it, you have got a bag of air on that one. The next question I had is: You made your appeal obviously vocally or on your fax campaign; have you had any meetings subsequent to that with any of the ministers or ministry officials?

Mr Bradley: Yes, we have. As I mentioned to you, discussions with the Treasury people and the Ministry of Transportation are continuing.

Mr Stockwell: Last, I personally think this environmental stuff was just a red herring. I think this is just a tax grab, plain and simple. It is a nice way to grab some money and apply it to a deficit that was $9.7 billion, which would probably be at $11 billion if they actually used the numbers. Have you been able to convince the ministry that you are embarking on the environmental concerns it has had some years ago, that you are working diligently to ensure that truckers are cognizant of the environment and are doing their best to ensure that the diesel fuel dilemma you are faced with should not be hinged on environmental—

Mr Bradley: That is the focal point of what we are trying to bring to their attention. Whether we have been successful I guess we will find out if the government sees fit to make an adjustment on the diesel fuel tax side. You used the words "tax grab." You may use those words, but it will not at this present time. But it would seem rather strange to me, given the facts we put forward. In fact it is our belief that this budget impedes our ability to help enhance the environment. What was the purpose of the tax? Is it really to help the environment?

Mr Stockwell: I do not think anyone buys that.

Mr Bradley: Because if it is, it was the wrong measure. You either adjust it or it is to raise revenue.

Mr Stockwell: You can take some comfort in the fact that obviously their policies are written in pencil, because Bob White got them to erase the car tax. Potentially if you can bring enough pressure on this government, they may erase this. I doubt it, but they might. So continue pressuring them; you may be successful.

The Vice-Chair: Okay, thank you very much for your presentation today. We appreciate your coming before us.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation will be from Canadian Auto Workers, Local 1967, Nick De Carlo, president. Just to go over the procedure, I have approximately a half-hour for the entire presentation. Whatever time you use for your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the time for questions, which will be divided equally between the three parties. So if you would like to comment on your presentation.

Mr De Carlo: Our local has 3,500 members active employed at McDonnell Douglas and an additional 800 members who are retired. The current government must be applauded for having the courage to invest in new efforts to create jobs in this province. It must be applauded for not attacking the social services and the health care and education system that protects my membership and all the people of Ontario.

A massive attack on the deficit would have been the easy way out, the way favoured by business and the wealthy. Notice how companies repeatedly run to the government for handouts, money they somehow feel is rightfully theirs, while they blame the rest of us for forcing up government spending and creating the deficit. The wealthy ners and directors of these companies take more pay and tax breaks while they object to the workers, who pay most of the taxes, increasing or even maintaining their pay. Workers, according to them, are supposedly ruining the country. Attacking the deficit was not the route chosen by this government. They did not listen to the business class on this issue and we can be thankful for it.

None the less this report is critical of the Ontario government for not going far enough in addressing those issues that will build an alternative to the economic deterioration that is facing the province and the country today. The government of the day did not attack or deal with the issues that will develop the democracy necessary to give the people of our province a real say in their future. They did not take a direction in taxation that would shift the tax burden away from workers and put it more fairly on business, as they promised they would do. The Ontario Federation of Labour as well as unions and locals affiliated to it, as we have, have been and will be making presentations to this standing committee. This presentation agrees with the basic premise of those presentations, so we want to start with some quotes from the Ontario Federation of Labour.

The Ontario Federation of Labour makes the following points regarding the economic climate, the worst recession in 50 years. The point there is that manufacturing jobs have dropped much more dramatically—the statistic is missing on the brief—compared to jobs that dropped 7.2% in 1981 and 1982. Ontario's rate of job loss has been over twice that of the national average, accounting for 80% of the national loss in jobs. Many of these jobs are gone forever. In 1990, 65% of reported permanent layoffs were due to partial or complete plant closures. In the first five months of this year, 59% were due to partial or complete plant closures. By contrast, in 1982 only 24% of the permanent layoffs were due to shutdowns. The remainder were the result of companies temporarily reducing their numbers of employees.

Manufacturing jobs are hard to replace. The average wage for manufacturing jobs in Ontario is $630 per week, considerably more than the industrial average of $542 per week; and the average in the service sector, where most of the jobs have been created over the last decade, is $511 per week.

We are experiencing major industrial restructuring as well as a downturn in the economy, and I do not think that the impact is much in dispute.

The role of the federal government: Mulroney economics and the recession. Ontario's 1991 budget does try to do something different. As Treasurer Floyd Laughren said, "We had a choice to make this year—to fight the deficit or fight the recession. We are proud to be fighting the recession."

Unlike the federal government, the Ontario government did not abandon its responsibilities to working people, their families, and their communities. Let us look at what the Mulroney Tories have done. Cutbacks: Federal government cutbacks hurt Canadians in all provinces, but they have cost Ontarians the most. Cutbacks to established programs, to the Canada assistance plan and other programs, will cost the people of Ontario over $1.6 billion this year alone. The result is increased pressure on the provincial programs, such as welfare and social services, designed to alleviate poverty.

The freeze on established programs financing could well mean the gradual death of medicare as a national program enjoyed equally by all Canadians by the 1996-97 fiscal year.

The Canada-US free trade agreement: Three years into the Mulroney-Reagan trade deal, we have lost hundreds of thousands of jobs—especially highly paid manufacturing jobs—and seen dozens of plants and factories close. The same people who brought us the Canada-US free trade agreement are at it again trying to integrate the economies of Canada, the United States and Mexico.

We support the Ontario government's position. The Ontario Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology said, "A possible trilateral trade deal between Canada, the United States and Mexico would be a harmful extension of an already flawed Canada-US free trade deal."

The goods and services tax: The GST is one more dimension of the Tory big business agenda for Canada. It involves a massive shift in who pays tax in Canada, from corporations to individuals. The GST will be paid by consumers to the tune of about $9 billion a year in Ontario alone.

Since its introduction, it has become clear that the GST is hurting people even worse than predicted. According to the GST consumer information office, the average family will pay an extra $570 a year in GST, about 50% more than predicted in government studies that were used to argue for its introduction—Globe and Mail, May 3, 1991.

The GST is the wrong tax at the wrong time on the wrong people. Although a provincial government cannot get rid of it, the NDP government refused to harmonize Ontario's retail sales tax with the GST, and refused to piggyback the provincial sales tax on top of it. That decision alone is important for our members and for the people of Ontario.

High interest rates: For years the federal government has kept interest rates high, claiming this was necessary to fight inflation, to support the Canadian dollar and to attract investment. High interest rates, they claim, are essential to lowering inflationary pressures which, among other things, force interest rates up.

They have got it backwards. High real interest rates hurt working people and hurt the economy. They add significantly to business costs by raising the cost of capital, and they kill jobs.

In the meantime, of course, high interest rates maintain the Canadian dollar at artificially high levels, especially vis-à-vis the United States. This undercuts the competitiveness of Canadian goods and services in the United States, and adds to the devastation caused by the free trade deal. Amazingly, it is the Tories and their big business backers who complain the loudest about Canada's lack of competitiveness.

Cutbacks affecting social services, free trade with the United States, a North American free trade agreement, the GST, high interest rates—this is the sorry legacy of the Tory government in Ottawa.

It is these difficulties that working people in Ontario have to overcome. The provincial government's budget helps us in our fight.

The Ontario 1991 budget: fighting the recession. The Ontario budget moved in the opposite direction to the Tories. Mulroney's answer is to raise taxes and cut services, making the recession worse.

The answer of the Ontario government is to fight the recession:

By sustaining and creating 70,000 jobs, so that the province lost 260,000 jobs instead of 330,000 to federal government policy.

By undertaking the most aggressive anti-recession effort in all of Canada through increasing overall spending by 13.4%.

By creating the $700-million anti-recession program which, when combined with the contributions of local government and agencies, will bring total spending exceeding $900 million.

By maintaining health care and education despite cutbacks from the federal Tory government.

By responding to the need for action in such areas as worker protection, pay equity, social assistance reform, affordable housing and the environment.

By putting spending power in the hands of Ontarians—by not imposing the provincial sales tax on the GST, $470 million will be left in the pockets of consumers in 1991—and enriching the Ontario tax reduction for low-income earners.

By creating a $215-million social assistance reform package that is designed to provide benefits for those who are in greatest need, to help people get into the labour force, to increase fairness and accessibility, and to provide further relief to overburdened municipalities.

By providing tax relief for the poorest of Ontarians by initiating the largest enrichment in the history of the Ontario tax reduction program—this $50-million enrichment means the number of low-income earners whose Ontario income tax will be eliminated or reduced will increase to 700,000 for the 1991 tax year.

By allocating $48 million in 1991-92 to help lay the background for self-government of native peoples and resolution of land claims, for support of research and negotiations, with $20 million to be spent on community infrastructure such as water and sewer systems, and $5 million for 400 new child care spaces on reserves.

By making $125 million available to Ontario's transfer agencies—both to major agencies, such as municipalities, school boards, hospitals and universities and colleges, and to other agencies—to assist them with the cost of pay equity; plus an unprecedented level of provincially supported housing activity for the development of another 10,000 non-profit housing units, which will cost the province approximately $150 million in annual operating subsidies when completed.

Ontario's deficit in perspective: In all of the discussion of the province's budgetary deficit, little attention has been paid to its causes. Most of the deficit comes from the financial reality of the recession: falling revenues; increasing costs in health care, social services and education. A very large part of it is the impact of cuts in federal transfer payments. The cumulative impact of federal cutbacks to established programs financing—health and post-secondary education—and to payments for social services under the Canada assistance plan is costing Ontario $3.6 billion in 1991-92 alone.

Ontario's projected deficit of $9.7 billion is moderate considered in perspective with the record of recent Conservative governments. The Ontario deficit is comparatively low in terms of total spending, in terms of gross domestic product, and in per capita terms with other provinces with federal Conservative governments.

Here is a chart which breaks down, by region, the deficit, the share of spending, the share of gross domestic product and the per capita. I will not read the figures. I think they are clear and they can be referred to.

Spending money now is critical to stimulating economic growth, to responsible fiscal management, and to helping our fellow citizens in difficult economic circumstances. The figures above demonstrate, Ontario spending is not out of control. In fact, it is less than other provincial governments spent to get out of the last recession.

Ontario's public debt charges—the interest cost of carrying its debt—are low as a share of its total revenue. The federal government spends 36 cents of every dollar of revenue as interest on its debt; spending which only serves to benefit investors and bond dealers. In contrast, Ontario spends less than 10 cents of every dollar of revenue on interest costs—less than every province except Alberta and British Columbia. These costs will rise to 11.6 cents next year, still far below the federal rate, and less than the debt charges of most provinces.

In summary, there have been actions taken that actually tend to stimulate the economy, which is the exact opposite of the budget initiatives of the other governments in Canada.

Those are all facts and information that have been presented by the Ontario Federation of Labour, and ones that this presentation supports.

There are many, as I am sure the members of this committee know, who are praising the Ontario government for taking that action. The social planning council refers to some in its presentation to this committee.

"The budget was a confidence builder," says chief economist and vice-president of the Conference Board of Canada, James Frank. Reducing the deficit "would have led to a significant delay in the recovery and contributed to further increases in unemployment, bankruptcies and low output."

"I believe most people in Ontario, including many business people, have had enough of the recession and weak housing starts, sluggish automobile sales, dropping employment and increasing bankruptcies."

"Had measures been taken to hold the line on operating expenditures, which rose by $5.2 billion, or on capital expenditures, which rose by $1 billion, we could easily have ended up with a much longer recession," Frank says.

"I think it is a move in the right direction to do something for a province that has been particularly hard done by in recent years," says Informetrica Ltd president Mike McCracken.

From a CP newswire story, April 30, 1991: "Ontario's new-fangled socialist government has brought an old-fashioned style of economics back to the Canadian political ene with its first budget. Despite a record $9.7-billion deficit that has business and federal politicians crying disaster, that traditional thinking may be just what Ontario needs to survive the worst recession in half a century.

"It's absolutely the right thing to do in a recession," says John Smithin, an economics professor at York University's business administration faculty in Toronto. Instead of taking money out of the economy, they're dumping more back in. This is a welcome change from the way Canadian governments have reacted."

"Albert Breton, a University of Toronto economist says: 'The NDP's $9.7-billion deficit isn't a monster. Obviously the business community reacts from a perspective that is unfounded practically in macroeconomics,' he said. 'I think the NDP did okay.'

"Although Breton said he does favour deficit financing as a rule, 'We're in a deep recession, and I don't think it's doing anything that is damaging to the economy—on the contrary. Because of a recession that's outside any government's control, any Ontario government regardless of stripe, would have had to run a deficit or dramatically slash programs.

"In fact, only $1.5 billion of the NDP's budget is new spending. And only 11% of each dollar Ontario takes goes to pay off interest on the debt—compared with 30 cents on the dollar that the federal government spends to pay interest on its accumulated debt.

"Former US and British leaders Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher also helped to bring deficits into disrepute with their anti-tax, free-enterprise economic policies; but other countries—including Japan, with the most successful capitalist economy in the world—followed Keynesian policies."

Inevitably, there must be government intervention in an economy, particularly one like the current Canadian economy, if we are to develop control over the economics of the country. This requires some basic changes, which cannot take place overnight. This presentation argues that the government of Ontario must take the first steps in that direction.

There are three aspects that need to be developed: (1) a community and worker role in developing the economy; (2) a method for bringing together the expertise, resources and planning necessary in order to develop alternatives; and (3) a source of funding.

These three aspects can be applied on the levels of small communities, municipalities and regions. They can be applied in an overall development plan or they can be applied more specifically to plant shutdowns or to cases where conversion may be necessary for environmental reasons.

Let's take a look at plant shutdowns. There have to be legislative changes made to require companies to provide information and to explain the basis for closing down an operation. This would give the community, the workers and the government the right to take a look at it. They should have the opportunity to establish that the plant does not need to close and to take the appropriate action or, if it is established that the operation is not viable, to develop alternative uses for the plant.

In the case of a small plant, the immediate community, including the workers in that plant, through the union that represents them, should first of all be guaranteed an explanation. The provincial government should then be prepared to provide expertise to that community and the workers to assist in developing a plan. The expertise should be in areas such as financial and market analysis, engineering, transportation, research, etc. The government can tie into universities, community colleges and various training programs to provide this expertise. There can therefore be a process of consultation and evaluation that would develop a plan to keep the operation going or to convert it.

In the case of larger industry, the workers and the provincial government should be guaranteed an explanation for the closure. The provincial government should set up a task force composed of experts from government, academia and the communities and unions affected. Their role would be to develop a plan for maintaining operation or conversion.

In the case of whole sectors that are jeopardized, like transportation or the aircraft industry, the government could approach unions and have them involved and ask them to come up with alternatives, again providing expertise for analysis and assessment.

In the longer term, permanent elected boards should be set up on a community and municipal level which are mandated to develop work projects and industry in their respective areas. In this case, rather than waiting for plants to shut down, they would take the initiative to create jobs and new production. They would combine involvement of workers and communities with planning and expertise in order to develop new jobs and new opportunities for the community.

The goal in these task forces or local planning groups and boards would be to develop democratic involvement and participation. It would be to find alternatives which do not penalize the workers or communities involved. The involvement of unions and communities is essential because it gives people a real role in determining their own future. Involvement of the people is what this country should be all about. Involvement will build enthusiasm and participation in any efforts to transform or redevelop. This enthusiasm and participation will ensure that the alternatives actually work. Involvement can also ensure that proposals and developments are environmentally sound and beneficial to the community. They can also, I believe, be used as a basis to do some research and build co-operation in terms of new types of production, environmental alternatives, any number of things that we do not really put much into in terms of research and development.

But plans are not enough. In many cases, funding and investment will be required.

On a larger scale, money can come from two sources: taxing corporations and developing investment pools. Ultimately, corporations will have to be forced to pay their fair share of taxes. That will go a long way towards eliminating any deficit.

It can be argued that if we tax corporations, it will speed up their movement out of the province. That is a real concern. On the other hand, we will be for ever at the mercy of these corporations if we do not do something. In the immediate future, tax loopholes should be closed and the government should prepare the groundwork for a minimum tax on corporations.

Investment pools can also be developed. This would require a method for providing a guaranteed return, much like savings bonds, and/or a tax deductible investment for citizens who put money into the pool. The pool would have to be properly managed and have a range of investments in order to ensure its viability. They would be mandated to provide low-interest funding for projects outlined above.

Money from these investment pools would be available to fund worker and community projects for converting or maintaining a plant or for investment in operations that might otherwise shut down. Funding would be made available to elected community boards to initiate local projects which would develop jobs.

A process of worker and community involvement, combined with innovative means of funding and a step-by-step restructuring of the tax system, can start a process which will in the long run set the basis for a true Canadian- and Ontario-based economy. It will diversify and develop our economic base, develop expertise and create skills and jobs.

It will also give us, as workers and citizens of the province, a stake and involvement in our own future. As it is now, we are at the mercy of international companies that constantly blackmail us at the workplace level and at the government level. And it will alleviate a tax burden that our members are finding increasingly difficult to bear.

Our members are being taxed more and more. The increasing taxation provides no real guarantees.

There is no doubt that the business agenda internationally and in Canada is to deregulate the economy, cut social services, reduce environmental and safety standards, lower wages, and deskill the workforce. There is no doubt that they will use their powerful economic clout to do just that. Governments, presumably the most powerful institution in the country, responsible to the citizens of the country, are vulnerable to this power, and will be increasingly so unless steps are taken to turn things around.

The budget, praiseworthy for staving off the business agenda, is only partially in the right direction. It is clear from some of the steps promised but not taken, for example, taxation of corporations, that the government is vulnerable to pressure from business, which controls investment and the media.

The government of Ontario needs to have the courage of its convictions. It has to come up with new and creative ways to give our province back to us, the citizens. Unless they are able to come up with radically new strategies to get back some measure of control over our vast human, social and natural resources, then our choices will continually narrow as we are forced to bid on fewer, less-skilled jobs and an increasingly marginalized and unbalanced economy. If it fails to address these issues, it will ultimately disappoint the workers who have supported it.

I would just add at the end that the plant I represent has a workforce of 3,500. In the 1950s, it had 15,000 people and it designed and built the most advanced plane in the world. In the period of time since then, we are now at a point where we are a subassembly plant essentially. We manufacture wings that are sent to California. We do none of the research and development. Though it creates jobs, it is nothing compared to what we used to have. It is a very graphic illustration of where the country has come, the choices that we had and the choices we failed to make and if we continue on this path, where we are going to end up.

Also, in the aerospace industry right now, the potential sale of de Havilland and whatever will happen with that again, it is a real attack on an industrial base and one of the few areas where there is research and development left in our country. I feel very strongly that if we do not start addressing these problems, although it is important—that action has been taken around the budget because it does offset some of the problems we have—there is a lot more that has to be done.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you for your presentation. You have time for about two minutes for each party, and I believe we are starting with the official opposition.

Mr Kwinter: I get conflicting messages. You tell me on the one hand 15,000 employees have gone down to whatever the number was, and you are talking about big business. Throughout your whole presentation, it is anti-business. Big business is bad, these guys are terrible, you are glad they did not give in to the business agenda, we have to make sure that everything is back in the hands of the workers.

On the other hand, you are complaining that big business is moving out, cutting back, shifting. When I was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, I brought Honda to Alliston, I brought Toyota to Cambridge, I brought Suzuki to Ingersoll, and I brought the paint plant to Oakville. In total, it created about 6,000 jobs, but in every one of those sort of sales pitches we were competing with other jurisdictions.

Unless there is an environment to bring those people here, to create the kind of jobs you want and the jobs you are saying we are losing, you are not going to get them. So you have to come to some kind of terms with the fact that as much as you hate big business, they are the same guys you want to create the jobs you want. How do you deal with that?

Mr De Carlo: I think the whole report addresses this issue, and it is interesting that the point you are making is exactly what I am talking about.

The presentation I made points out that as long as we are at the mercy of precisely that argument, where we do not have any alternatives but to bid whether Honda or Toyota or General Motors or Fiat is going to come here, we do not have much of a future because our future is dependent on somebody outside the country, at whose mercy we are left.

The alternative is to develop a pool of capital and involve the people of this country, who are quite capable of building an economic future for our country, in a process that will build the research and development, the infrastructure economically in the local level, so that eventually we will be able to develop our own companies and our own solutions to these problems.

One final thing. There is no doubt that companies are leaving, and you said why: because they are looking at the of competitiveness or whatever, and we have to take it into account. We cannot just overnight change that, we have to build some alternatives or we are finished.

Mr Stockwell: Where did you mention competitiveness in here?

Mr De Carlo: I do not know. Where did I mention it?

Mr Stockwell: That is what I am asking you. You just spent a whole bunch of time talking about crap, in my opinion, and this is pap. All you are missing is the seven-year program, us living on communes and developing a manifesto.

Where did you talk about competitiveness? You never even answered the question.

Mr De Carlo: Which question?

Mr Stockwell: Competitiveness.

Mr De Carlo: What about it?

Mr Stockwell: How are we going to attract industry if our tax positioning and our potential for attracting it is being undermined by provincial governments and their tax cuts? How are you going to attract anybody when you cannot compete?

Mr De Carlo: I am sorry, but I guess you missed the point.

Mr Stockwell: I guess so. I guess I totally missed the point. In fact, probably 80% of the people in the province missed the point here. I mean, the NDP could have written this, for crying out loud. They probably did.

The Vice-Chair: Moving on, the governing party. The question.

Mr Jamison: Thank you for taking your time and making the presentation. I think everyone should have the opportunity to do that and should be well received at this committee level for taking the time and putting together a report, whether it be acceptable or not to any individual on this committee.

My experience with the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology—and I would like to preface what I am going to say, preface a question really in these terms, that I am pleased to see you have connected the policies of various government levels to the situation at hand. When I met with, for an example, the steel industry in this province, an industry that is not able to get up and move as readily as other manufacturers—if I asked them to identify one problem, it is the problem with export markets in conjunction with the level of the dollar.

Having said that, what are your feelings on that particular question and, coming back to our budget, with the 700-million expenditure on infrastructure in this province? Do you feel that may have shortened the recession we are in?

Mr De Carlo: Yes. I think that is a point made in the report that, yes, it helps to shorten the recession. Although I guess that is what it does, it helps to shorten it, it does not really lay the basis for the future in terms of preventing similar situations from developing.

As far as the dollar goes, I believe the policy should be for lower interest rates and to allow the dollar to drop lower. The problem is we are in a vicious circle, though, because the whole issue of interest rates and money flowing in and out of the country and the level of the dollar is very much tied to what kind of economic base we have in the first place. In the short term there are different policies that can be taken to alleviate this. I think the whole idea of the Mulroney government is the pure idea of competitiveness and it does not really solve our problems.

On the other hand, if we do not build up these economic alternatives in terms of the future economy, then we will still be to some degree at the mercy of the international flow of money in and out of the country and we will not be able to adapt our interest rates or our dollar in the way that necessarily suits us as a country.

The Vice-Chair: Mr De Carlo, thank you very much for your presentation. Unfortunately, the time is up.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL LAW ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation is from the Canadian Environmental Law Association, Ken Makuch, counsel. Perhaps you would care to come forward. Before we begin, just a reminder: There is a half-hour time limit and whatever time you use for your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the time for questioning.

Mr Makuch: I would like to clarify the role I will be playing here today. I am an environmental lawyer who represents clients who are generally citizens' groups. That has been the Canadian Environmental Law Association's role for some 21 years now, so the gloss I will be putting on my remarks is specifically with regard to environmental concerns as they are addressed by the budget and in a peripheral way on the free trade agreement. My presentation will take about five minutes. I have a script I have prepared and will read to you. It should leave ample time for questions at the end.

The Canadian Environmental Law Association has worked on the side of environmental protection for approximately 21 years. Through that period we have witnessed many promises by governments at all levels to address public demands for greater action on environmental protection.

The long-awaited green plan turned out to be somewhat of a disappointment. This seems to be part of the federal government's agenda to dismantle its federal responsibilities on the environment and shift the burden to the provinces. In effect, it amounts to an abdication of fiscal responsibility for social wellbeing and environmental protection. The inevitable result has been greater pressure for spending by provincial governments—of course the Ontario government—at a point in the business cycle where it seems that it is most constrained in trying to do so. Unfortunately, there is little room for austerity, given the myriad of environmental problems we face as a nation. However, our latest government has made some humane choices that will pay off in the long run.

As to the budget itself, there are three issues. The first I will deal with is energy, the second, solid waste, and finally a few remarks on free trade—.

Ontario's industries continue to argue for cheap supplies of energy from Ontario Hydro megaprojects, and they suggest they will cease to be competitive to the extent that does not happen. Of course, that will result in job losses. We are very concerned about that, but it would seem the production of energy is really an inherently polluting activity, especially nuclear energy. So we would like to see it go another way. It would appear that our arrogant misuse of resources has stolen economic security from future generations and left them a legacy of poisoned air, land and water.

We call for the more efficient use of energy resources. I believe that would benefit corporations as well, and it would reduce environmental strain. It also makes solid economic sense and I will explain why.

We use more energy per capita in this province and per unit of economic output than most areas on the planet. That includes nations with stronger economies that we are attempting to be competitive with. Therefore, the budget proposal that $10 million be allocated for energy efficiency is an environmentally and economically sound approach.

The NDP's decision to halt further expansion of nuclear energy facilities also makes sound fiscal, as well as environmental, sense. The taxpayers will be saved millions of dollars, subsidies for reactors that have generally operated at only 60% of capacity. You would hardly call that efficient.

Nuclear energy is prohibitively expensive. It costs twice as much as energy generated from fossil fuels and up to 12 times as much as energy derived from efficiency improvements. At this point, nuclear advocates tend to suggest that more Darlington-sized reactors would reduce the risk of global warming, the impacts of which environmentalists like to prognosticate. But in tight budgetary times it would be fiscally irresponsible of the government to invest in new meganuclear generating stations. A dollar spent on efficiency is seven times more effective in curbing CO₂ emissions, which are the major cause of global warming. For that reason, those moneys should not be spent on nuclear power.

As well, one can only imagine how large government expenditures would be once the bills for the secondary costs of nuclear energy production came due. Consider the dollar values associated with the long-term expenses of health care for uranium miners and reactor employees, as well as citizens affected by radon gas exposure, the cleanup of sites polluted by radioactive mine tailings, the costs of waste disposal and, finally, dismantling and capping obsolete facilities.

On the issue of solid waste I have only a few remarks. We support many of the initiatives taken by the government in the area of waste reduction and management. I have been very critical of a few endeavours Mrs Grier has undertaken lately to the extent that they affect public process, so my biases are not completely with the NDP. Landfills and incineration both result in damaging impacts on the environment. Waste must be minimized through the 3Rs—reduction, reuse and recycling. The proposed Ontario waste reduction act will also go some distance in dealing with solid waste measures and we hope it is a progressive approach to garbage.

In the budget, the government announced it would be doubling its financial contribution to municipal 3R programs. As well, $28 million is being set aside for new and expanded blue box and composting programs. These areas that should not suffer from austerity. Commitment to 3Rs should be incorporated into industrial and economic plans and that is already being done. My experience on national packaging protocol indicates that industry is very willing to get involved in these measures because ultimately they are cost saving. That is what 3Rs is all about: making garbage disappear, and the cost associated with infrastructure of garbage disposal also disappears.

Now a word on free trade and then I will wrap it up. Federal government policies have played a large role in limiting what the Ontario government can do with respect to the recession. Whether they will play out to some economic prosperity is still left to the winds in some ways. It seems that the goods and services tax and the free trade agreement have been responsible for keeping us in a recession while the US has started to climb out. We support a critical analysis of the free trade agreement but we do not necessarily believe in abrogation of the trade agreement in principle; it needs some modifications.

We have monitored some of the subtle and not-so-subtle effects, and through my participation with federal government people the assurances are being given that environmental costs can be dealt with if they become subject to the negotiations of the North American free trade agreement. That is what we are hoping.

It seems the free trade agreement also poses a serious challenge to national sovereignty over natural resource management and environmental protection. This is something not discussed very often. It would appear that projects, for instance James Bay II and the Mackenzie Valley gas pipeline, can cause significant environmental damage. The necessity of serving export markets is not something that would object to in principle because it means money and jobs, but I submit there are processes that could take place that would allow for a more environmentally safe approach to all of this.

Similarly, there is a problem with harmonization. Generally what happens in harmonization talks or discussions during free trade agreements is you have harmonization downward of environmental regulation. That has happened under GATT with an institute called Codex, which is really seeking lower health and safety standards that everyone in the international community can live by.

The effect is that countries with higher standards, like Canada, are really being induced to adopt lower standards, and that is something our citizens simply should not be putting up with.

One example would be pesticides. Under the free trade agreement, the negotiations taking place suggest that we will probably be going down to a US standard. That raises obvious concerns because the US uses seven times as many pesticides as we do, and I would imagine most of those pesticides cannot meet our standards. That is where some tinkering would be required with respect to the free trade agreement.

In conclusion, the abovementioned concerns reflect overall support for the environmental initiatives undertaken by the Ontario government over the past nine months. We recognize that in recessionary periods it is sponsible to demand massive expenditures on environmental protection and natural resource management. However, committee members should realize that when push comes to shove we advocate greater expenditures rather than fewer expenditures on the environment, even in recessionary times. Given the mandate of this committee, that is something I want to discuss in any detail. I give my speaking list out to other people.

That is essentially the substance of my presentation. I am willing to entertain questions, of course.

The Vice-Chair: We have approximately 15 minutes together, about five minutes per party. Unfortunately, I have lost my place. I believe we started over here last time. Okay, the third party.

Mr Stockwell: No questions.

Mr B. Ward: Just a quick comment from an environmental standpoint: Do you think our government perhaps is moving along in the right direction in the budget, but could be moving at a faster pace?

Mr Makuch: I think my expectation is that even after all the lobbying that environmentalists have done for various reforms, the budget is quite restrained in some of the measures we are calling for. I would cite specifically expenditures for improving enforcement activities within the Ministry of the Environment. From speaking with their officers, those people seem to be working night and day to get their jobs done, and still it is being left to non-governmental organizations like ours to take polluters to court.

I do not think anyone would object in principle to the idea that polluters should pay for environmental harm, but the real problem becomes one of enforcement. I would much rather be doing other things besides going to court and helping the MOE with those sorts of prosecutions. I would like to see funding in some areas that have not been dealt with.

Mr B. Ward: There has been criticism by some groups or organizations about government spending during tough times, that it should be cutting back, etc. How would you respond to that criticism in your request that you think additional funds should be added to the Environment ministry.

Mr Makuch: I think the criticism from the business community that deficits definitely are a negative inducement to investment is valid. Nevertheless, it would appear that Ontario has decided it wants to take a lead role in environmental protection measures and in developing strong environmental policies within the business community. That is the way the world is going.

The United States is adopting a similar tack and my perception is that in international trade agreements some room will be made for environmental measures in the future. So to the extent that Canadian businesses are encouraged to comply with stiffer environmental regulations, they will have a stronger competitive advantage internationally. It will mean our goods will not be the subject of trade restrictions caused by a poor environmental process in industrial environmental processes.

Ms M. Ward: I would like to take a slightly different approach—rather than the regulatory and penalties and so on, more of a positive—and ask you to comment on what you might see as opportunities for new product development and new technologies in the environmental area, whether you see any of that going on, and where there are new industries or where there is an opportunity for new industries springing up to develop new processes for the protection of the environment. Basically, is there an opportunity there for new businesses in the environmental field? What is there now and what do you think there could be? How might government contribute to that?

Mr Makuch: I suppose there are three areas I can think of right away in which Canadians can take a lead role.

In the first place, citizens seem to be very interested in programs like blue box programs. What that means ultimately is that if we are involved in our disposal processes to the extent that we are making them disappear, industries themselves will take on that mantle and will be encouraged to be more environmentally sound in their practices. If those programs were introduced in the industrial area and came out of that enthusiasm the public has, then I suppose the positive impact is that we would cut down on a number of the normal costs associated with industrial or commercial activities.

In terms of offering opportunities for new industries, it would seem to me that in the area of recycling there are a number of industries developing and coming on side as a result of some of the measures being taken by the Ontario government. It would seem that a lot of garbage that actually goes into our disposal sites can be recycled and used. Industries with creative impetus can use those materials as a way of developing all kinds of new products, certainly in the area of rubber products; witness the number of tires being disposed of daily. All that new creative energy can certainly be put into developing our recycling industries, and the number of uses that come from disposable products like tires is quite incredible.

There is an expansion area there that can take place and is already taking place. Next to that, the number of environmental consultants, environmental lawyers and people who are becoming experts on the environment is increasing all the time. That would seem to me to generate a lot of money within the economy. I think as well that a number of US and European firms are starting to turn to Canadians for the wisdom we are developing and the programs we are using.

Those are all areas I think can contribute to our economic productivity in the province.

Mr Hansen: I know we are talking about municipal taxes and you really have not hit on it, in a sense, on the recycling. Recycling is great, but it costs money. What municipalities are complaining about is the cost of recycling. We are looking at reducing the amount of recycling; in other words, something you reuse again in that particular area.

I notice you mention nuclear conservation. If you conserve $1, it actually returns $7. I sort of missed it; I was leaving the chair. I am looking at cost savings. In other words, for industry that comes to Ontario, if we are in a conservation mode then that costs less for business to operate here in Ontario because of the cost of hydro. Could you go into that? It was just a short sentence there.

Mr Makuch: I think the basic idea is that as consumers, not industrial consumers but residents, we are energy pigs. In the industrial sector, in the commercial sector, for much too long it seems as though the costs of producing energy have really been subsidized by taxpayers themselves. In other words, we are even charging energy prices that are lower than the actual costs of producing energy. That is something Hydro is trying to rectify.

But the basic idea I am getting at, and the one that you are referring to, is that if we can become a world leader in terms of energy-efficiency initiatives, and we are heading that way, then we will be able to show industries that want to locate in Ontario how they can achieve production levels that are the same as they might be elsewhere, but it will be cheaper because we will have the energy conservation infrastructure in place that allows their energy costs per unit of production to go down.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Makuch, I would like to ask you about the feature of the budget that dealt with the environment as it relates to automobiles. When the Treasurer first made his announcement on what he claimed was an environmental measure, he imposed the gas guzzler tax that was supposed to inhibit the purchase of cars that had emissions over a certain level. There was a feeling among environmentalists that if they had instituted a program to get rid of automobiles that were over 10 years old, they would get rid of 50% of the problem.

As a result of representations that were made to him by the industry and by the head of the auto workers' union, they rescinded that tax and have now applied it to virtually all cars. Of over 200 automobiles, I think there are less than 10 where, without getting a tax, you give a $100 credit if you buy that car. Do you feel there is going to be any impact on the environment as a result of that measure?

Mr Makuch: This certainly is not my area. I guess I could make a few general comments and then ask you to clarify the end part of your concern. It would seem to me that the way of automobile industries and the way of economies based on automobiles is quickly passing us by, but I am not one of those environmentalists who would suggest we should get rid of all our cars and develop mass transit systems as the only means of getting around in society. We must recognize the reality that a lot of people depend on the production and use of automobiles for a living.

Within larger municipalities like Toronto there are obvious problems created by automobile congestion. Some measures should be taken to reduce the amount that we use cars. I think that can be accomplished by measures other than taxation, although it seems that taxation works in a very direct fashion to inhibit the use of automobiles. My position on the use of cars generally is that cars do contribute to global warming. That is creating a massive problem in terms of climate, perhaps not for our generation but certainly for our children and their children. So some measures have to be taken in that area.

It would seem to me, though, that aside from taxation there may be other measures as a way of dealing with problems of global warming. The earlier measure in which very large automobiles are being taxed, or automobiles which use a disproportionate amount of fuels are being taxed, seems to be a wise measure. As to whether or not one wants to do that with subcompacts, if that is what you are suggesting, I have a little bit of trouble with that idea.

Mr Kwinter: If I can just clarify it for a minute, if you buy a Bentley Turbo at $220,000 and you have to pay a tax of $4,000—

Mr Stockwell: It is $7,000.

Mr Kwinter: All right, $7,000. I think the person who is going to buy a Bentley Turbo is not necessarily going to be deterred by the fact that instead of paying $220,000 he has to pay $227,000. He will go out and buy it. He will gripe because he is paying what he considers to be a ridiculous tax, but he will buy it.

On the other hand, to tax virtually every car in Ontario at a minimum of $75—as I say, with very few exceptions every car has at least a $75 tax on it. What is the purpose of that $75? It cannot be an environmental tax, because someone is not going to say: "I'm not going to buy that car. I'm going to buy another car." You are not going to stop everybody in the world driving these little cars. The point I am trying to get at is that even though this tax is being sold as an environmental tax, it has nothing to do with the environment. I was just wondering if you had any ideas of a more effective way of dealing with the problem.

Mr Makuch: Again, I am not going to try to second-guess people who are experts in the area. On your first point, it seems to me that perhaps the cars that are the most expensive should be taxed the highest simply because the people who can buy the most expensive cars are the ones who are least hurt by that form of taxation.

Your second suggestion seems to indicate that if it is only a $75 tax, then it is not going to do much good anyway, so perhaps you are suggesting it should be a $300 tax or something. I do not believe that is what you would suggest for a moment. But the idea that it should be the same for every type of vehicle regardless of the kind of efficiency that is packed into its design does not seem to me to make sense on the face of it. I am certain there are people within the NDP who could explain better why this policy is being invoked.

Mr Kwinter: The point I was really trying to make was that I think they are kidding the troops. If you want to raise some extra revenue, just say: "We're putting an extra $300 on every car," a minimum of $75 on virtually every car. Do not tie it into the environment when it has nothing to do with the environment.

Mr Makuch: If I could just respond very quickly, I think it has to be understood that by taxing vehicles and calling it an environmental tax, you are calling attention to the fact that vehicle usage does cause negative impacts upon the environment. To the extent that is happening, it is an environmental tax and it is packaged and sold that way.

I suppose my second comment is that if McDonald's is producing quasi-effective measures and calling them green measures, then if we are not going to prohibit McDonald's from calling them green measures, we certainly should not be preventing our governments from calling them green measures.

CO-ALITION FOR THE SUPPORT OF THE SOUTHEAST ASIAN YOUTHS

The Vice-Chair: We will now move on to the next presentation, by the Co-Alition for the Support of the Southeast Asian Youths. David Chu is a counsellor and Tom Wong a student. Welcome to the finance and economic affairs committee and post-budget hearings on the budget, the hearings on the budget afterwards.

Just to let you know, you will have approximately a half-hour altogether. Whatever time you use for your verbal presentation will be subtracted from the time for questions, and the time left for questions will be equally divided between the three parties.

Mr Chu: First I would like to introduce myself. My name is David Chu and this is Tom Wong. We are both members of the Co-Alition for the Support of the Southeast Asian Youths. I am here also in my capacity as a youth employment counsellor for Metro Youth Job Corps. We are pleased to have the opportunity to present our views on the provincial budget. We believe the budget was a positive action during this period of time and support other organizations that back the budget, such as the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto.

This budget provides the indication that the present Ontario government is concerned about its citizens during these recessionary times. Funding is needed to assist in the alleviation of the short-term emergency situations of high unemployment, permanent loss of jobs and shortage of affordable housing. The budget provides some funds targeted towards job creation and retraining for laid-off workers, but I find that youths have been excluded from this budget. In these recessionary periods, it is extremely harmful to exclude this group. During times of recession, the job market becomes tight for these youths and there is more competition for the jobs.

The State of the Child in Ontario report provides documentation highlighting the stresses these youths face. Support structures have to be expanded to assist these youths to go as far as possible in the educational system. The strong correlation between high level of education, achievement and high income levels are understandable. Housing, social and family support and financial support are required in assisting youths to stay in school.

Youths who are no longer in the educational system require assistance as well. School dropouts and early leavers require assistance through the opportunity of participation in training and apprenticeship programs to provide skills for these youths to obtain productive work in an increasingly technological workplace.

My position as a Metro Youth Job Corps employment counsellor allows me to have contact with a disadvantaged consumer group. This group does not have a powerful, concerted voice. The view from the front lines is not pleasant.

I am quoting the latest unemployment figures published by Statistics Canada this spring. The employment rate for the 15- to 24-year-old group for males is 20.3% and translates to about 94,000 jobless. Add the unemployment figures for 15- to 24-year-old females and that is another 10.6%. The unemployment figures for this 15 to 24 age group would be 144,000 in Ontario. The actual unemployment may even be higher, as many of these youths would have long given up searching for a job.

The Toronto Star had a recent article entitled "Jobs in Centre of City Drop by 6,000." This just reinforces the plight of the youths who are in the Metro job corps program. These youths tell me they want to work, that they want a job, but there is just not enough work available to them that they have adequate knowledge and skills for.

There has been an indication from the federal government that as the major funder of our program, it would tighten up on its spending, that spending restraint was in order because there were tough economic times. Canadian Jobs Strategy was cut $100 million and job training programs, which include youth training programs, are threatened. The provincial government is required to offset the federal pullout.

The provincial government should be applauded for its efforts; $32.5 million for training and assistance in finding work for laid-off workers is a positive step; $32 million for adult literacy programs, with an emphasis on training in the workplace, is a good investment. New legislation to ensure fairness in the workplace for aboriginal people, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities was a step in the proper direction, as well as a new system for advocacy to protect the rights of vulnerable adults. These are encouraging ventures to assist a depressed population.

New education and training partnerships must be created for the youths, because in the planning of policies to reduce disparity, the youth population is probably the most needy. Please ensure that the cost of economic adjustment is not borne by those least able to shoulder the burden, this province's silent youth population.

Mr Wong: CASSY is an umbrella organization that is composed of agencies or individuals who service or who are interested in working with the Southeast Asian youth population. We believe our role is to assist Southeast Asian youths, particularly the Cambodians, the Chinese, the Laotians and the Vietnamese, to access existing services and to advocate the creation of new services if the required service is unavailable.

CASSY members have produced a report entitled The Unattached Youth: Lost Between Two Cultures, A Study of the Southeast Asian Immigrant Youth in Crisis. The literature is clearly in agreement that the greatest threat to identity is not the feeling of belonging to two cultures, but of belonging to none. The Southeast Asian youths at risk lost between two cultures is becoming more and more evident. They are referred to as unattached youths. These youths are susceptible to a number of key problem areas: family relations conflicts in terms of life decisions and role reversal, problems in school, problems in peer relations and youth gang criminal activity. Intervention with this population requires that the traditional methods be culturally sensitive, while practices may need to be transformed to be culturally relevant.

It is crucial to understand some of the cultural backgrounds and systemic obstacles that Southeast Asian youths face in Canadian society. Southeast Asian youths face cultural and linguistic barriers in seeking services. The documents, Family Services for All, A Summary of Actions: Access to Health and Social Services for Members of Diverse Cultural and Racial Groups in Metropolitan Toronto and the Multicultural Resource Guide: Mental Health and Related Services, establish the problems the ethnocultural communities have in obtaining services from mainstream social service agencies. The mandate of the mainstream agencies is to service everyone, but they fail as they only service one ethnocultural group, those who are Anglo-Saxon. That is from Family Services for All and A Summary of Actions.

There are some excellent ethno-specific social service agencies. Unfortunately, the ethno-specific agencies are underfunded and must spend precious staff time resources to work on project proposals due to the lack of permanent operations funding. The problem of overutilization by the minority population means that there are waiting lists and that clients suffer.

We have a list of recommendations. Perhaps Dave could read that.

Mr Chu: We would like to have greater co-operation among the school boards to provide more English-as-a-second-language programs for youths and their families; greater emphasis on activities that promote more interaction with the police force and the youth population; co-operation between different levels of government and the private sector to create more employment opportunities for disadvantaged youths; recognition of the need to involve youths themselves in the formation of new training programs and policies; training programs to assist service providers to be more culturally sensitive to the fast-growing ethnically diverse population; more accessible, culturally sensitive and linguistic services for the ethno-specific and age-specific populations. These are our recommendations.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. We have approximately 15 minutes altogether for questions. I believe we are starting with the governing party this time.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I do not know if this is really a question or not, just tying your recommendations back to something you said. In your comments you said the mainstream agencies service only Anglo-Saxons. Maybe you can expand a little bit on that and give us some examples or something. Also, in your recommendations you are calling for training programs for service providers.

I guess the reason I picked up on that is that in one particular part of my riding I would say there are people from almost every country in the world, and I know it is one of the problems the agencies have. There is a neighbourhood service; Flemingdon Neighbourhood Services happens to be there. They happen to be next door to me right at my office. I know one of the problems they have is getting translators and so on, and they do worry about whether they are reaching the people who need their services. They certainly try to provide service to people of all cultural backgrounds, but I know they do recognize the problem.

Do you feel that is really a widespread problem, that such agencies are not reaching all cultures and linguistic groups? Where do you see the training programs being provided and under what auspices?

Mr Chu: Maybe I can address the second part. We did not write what we were saying about the specific agencies not providing services. It is in a report.

Ms M. Ward: No, I did not mean to say, "This agency does not do it." I did not mean at that level.

Mr Chu: Right.

Ms M. Ward: How serious do you see that part of the problem being?

Mr Chu: Just from my experience at a large community centre that services the east end of Toronto, we have a lot of oriental clients, but we do not have the different dialects needed to satisfy all our different populations. Many times a person with a specific dialect is not reflected in the demographics or is not highly visible. It comes in who we cannot serve. We have no way of assessing what we could do with that client. It is just a problem.

Ms M. Ward: Would it be possible to have a floating pool of translators or people who could communicate with different languages? How do you see that solution to it, because obviously you cannot have someone in each agency who can speak each language.

Mr Chu: No, we were asking for more ESL, and we were also saying that a lot of the mainstream agencies do not provide the service and we do not want to cut that service. It is just that they should be the ones who train the people with the language skills, and then in that way we could maybe have this pool, but as such we do not have this now.

Mr Wong: Perhaps I could sort of tackle the first part of your question. I will provide an example. For instance, in some cultures they are not very straightforward in their problems. For instance, a woman goes to see a doctor and she says she cannot sleep at night. She feels she has evil spirits. Naturally, a medical doctor who is trained in the western method of medicine is going to wonder, "Perhaps we should do a psychological profile on this woman." Now, the reason why this woman said it was a spirit thing was because in our culture they are not very straightforward with their problems. She could be having problems with her husband, marital problems, but marital problems are a shameful thing. You do not bring it outside your family. A doctor who is trained just in western medicine probably would not catch on to that and would think that perhaps this woman should be psychologically assessed.

Ms M. Ward: So it is cultural sensitivity training that is needed for the people at the agencies also.

Mr Wong: Certainly training and linguistic skills are required, both in combination.

Mrs Sullivan: I would like to start with some questions. You indicated that you were funded by the federal government. Can you tell us what the level of funding from the feds has been?

Mr Chu: It has been 83%.

Mrs Sullivan: Where does your other funding come from?

Mr Chu: Metro.

Mrs Sullivan: So you have not received funding at all from the provincial government.

Mr Chu: No.

Mrs Sullivan: How many clients do you serve?

Mr Chu: My personal case load this week is about 60.

Mrs Sullivan: How many would the agency serve?

Mr Chu: Our unemployment unit, with the summer programs on now, is probably double, almost 150.

Mrs Sullivan: Did you say 150?

Mr Chu: This month.

Mrs Sullivan: Okay, 150 young people; good. How do you work with existing institutions, whether they are social service agencies or places like community colleges, in terms of introducing students into post-secondary education, or with the high schools? Do you have any kind of relationship with them?

Mr Chu: Yes. That is considered a successful bridging. Anybody we can put back into the education system we are encouraging. There is just a long period of time where a lot of these people have left school and have no intention of coming back or they have been out so long they have problems catching up. There are also problems with language and literacy that make it really hard for them to catch up.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in your support for initiatives in the budget in relation to laid-off workers and so on. As I read the budget and see the impact of that assistance, it is really only for those people who have already been entered into apprenticeship programs. One of the areas that we see as being difficult is that there are no new positions opening up for apprentices, nor is there any initiative to attract new apprenticeship positions. Are you seeing the same thing?

Mr Chu: Yes. We are finding private businesses just do not have the time to train anybody without the skills. The skill levels these people entering at the apprentice level have just do not have any advantages to the business that is offering an apprenticeship.

Mrs Sullivan: The other thing I was kind of surprised about related to your comments on the injection of funding into the economy for job creation. Do you understand that funding injection was all for very short-term jobs?

Mr Chu: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly through that period of time we have not seen a decrease in youth unemployment, and those jobs which were funded were largely in the construction sector, whether it is water and sewer or roadbuilding, in areas that do not traditionally attract youth. I guess what I am asking you is, where do you see the initiatives that are particularly important to you in this budget that you have indicated you support?

Mr Chu: I am not saying that I see they have actual moneys this year. I am seeing that there is a commitment that they support the underprivileged and people in need at this time. I have also seen that they have a commitment to do something in the future for the disadvantaged and I am hoping they keep in mind that the youth population does not have a strong voice. One of the reasons I am here today before this committee is to voice that concern. This is what I deal with daily. They tell me they want to work. They just have no way of doing this.

Mr Phillips: I will follow up a little bit on that. Before the budget came out, and the Hansard will show I raised the issue of youth unemployment in the House, I had been terribly worried about it. I pored through the budget. There is not one mention in the budget of youth unemployment. Youth unemployment right now has doubled. It is up to 20% and for me is a major concern, because if young people do not see an opportunity for hope and a future, we run the risk of losing a generation.

You people are very close to this thing. In what way do you see jobs being created for young people as a result of this budget, and is it beginning to have an impact now on the clients you are dealing with?

Mr Chu: In some of our job training programs it is just making our clients a little more competitive. I mean, there is not a lot of full-time employment, but there is a rise in part-time. That is encouraging.

Mr Phillips: There is a what?

Mr Chu: There is a rise in the part-time employment figures. These people are now getting at least some hours on weekends, which they were never able to get before, maybe because of some of the laid-off positions and downsizing.

Mr Phillips: In terms of the future, the next two to three years, because the budget is kind of a longer-term document too, did you see things in there that will create jobs?

Mr Chu: Yes. I saw the commitment that they did want to put some effort into creating new education and training partnerships and I am encouraging that these partnerships should be with the community and the private sector.

Mr Wong: I would like to add a quick comment. Yes, I totally agree with you that youth unemployment has increased over the summer. I know this from firsthand experience. A lot of youths are desperate for any jobs out there and unfortunately there are none. I think the problem is more highlighted for the minority youths, because they face a bigger restraint in that they have cultural and linguistic barriers. There are some employers who would not want to hire minority youths, and that has been documented in many reports.

Mr Stockwell: I do not understand what your point is. We all know there is youth unemployment and we know it is high. What is this budget doing to alleviate the situation and what do you recommend we do to alleviate the situation? What is the point in retraining somebody if no job exists?

Mr Chu: It does not exist at this time, but we are hoping that somewhere, in some way the economy will pick up so there will be job openings. A lot of these people we are talking about, the youths, have no job experience whatsoever. They do not have a place to stay. They are telling us they need education and affordable housing in order to keep a job.

Mr Stockwell: But what is the point? They are not getting a job anyway. There are no jobs out there, you are telling me.

Mr Chu: We are making a job for them.

Mr Stockwell: What is that?

Mr Chu: In getting a job, in training themselves to be—

Mr Stockwell: That is noble and I like the term. Everyone always uses that term and it is a lovely term, except it does not put food on the table.

Mr Chu: It works.

Mr Stockwell: You have to get a job.

Mr Chu: Yes, and it is a job that can do it.

Mr Stockwell: It is not just the recession. The plant closures you are talking about are permanent plant closures. They are not layoffs any more. You think maybe we are losing a lot of jobs because of overtaxation and uncompetitiveness?

Mr Christopherson: And maybe the recession?

Mr Stockwell: I said the recession up front. Yes, maybe the recession, but maybe we are overtaxed. Maybe businesses do not want to continue. Maybe we are not competitive. Has that ever crossed your mind?

Mr Wong: I disagree. Although they may be trained right now in positions that will not be offered as employment after the training program is over, at least it gives the youths something to do that will help with their self-esteem. Right now a lot of these youths feel they are losers, that nobody is willing to help them. Through a training program like that, it helps boost their self-esteem. It helps them interact with other youths.

Mr Stockwell: I am not arguing that point. That is good, that is noble and it is a good thing to do. But at the end of the day they finish these retraining programs and there are no jobs available. What was the point?

Mr Wong: Certainly some training programs have job-searching skills and that would help them afterwards.

Mr B. Ward: It gives them a chance.

Mr Stockwell: I understand all this stuff. I understand it gives them a chance, job-searching skills. The question I am asking you is, where in this budget to do you see any real job creation? Where have you seen any job creation happening in the last 10 months? You came in to endorse this budget. Show me in this budget where we see some job creation.

Mr Chu: I do not see money specifically laid out for new jobs, but what I see is a commitment that they want to at least listen. What I am saying right now is we have to do something for them. I know there are not a lot of jobs. I feel for the clients I have now. They tell me this daily. But it is better for them to learn and at least get some kind of job-readiness training to be prepared for the actual event that there is a job.

Mr Stockwell: Okay, I agree with that. I agree with what you are doing. I guess I have got a bone to pick with the government.

You service 150 kids right now. What is your budget to service 150 kids?

Mr Chu: Our budget for kids? We pay them $5.40 an hour.

Mr Stockwell: No, what is the budget that you receive from government?

Mr Chu: I am not sure on that. All I know is the breakdown of it.

ONTARIO CONFEDERATION OF UNIVERSITY FACULTY ASSOCIATIONS

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation is from the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Association. Bill Graham, president, and Marion Perrin, executive director. We will begin the presentation. Welcome. We have approximately half an hour for the presentation. Whatever time you use for the verbal portion will be subtracted from the time for questioning, which will be divided equally among the three parties.

Dr Graham: Thank you for inviting us to appear before you. With me is Marion Perrin, who is the executive director of OCUFA, and Heather Webster, who is on our staff.

In May 1991, OCUFA received an invitation from the Conservative Party leader Mike Harris, urging us to join him in a "fight." He exhorted us to "tell the Premier what (we) think of his $53-billion budget by making a presentation to the finance and economic affairs committee of the Legislature." OCUFA is, of course, no stranger to the committee. We make yearly presentations as part of the pre-budget consultation process.

In recent years our submissions have lamented the declining government commitment to higher education and have urged increased financial support to the provincial universities. We have cited surveys conducted by the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education which show public support for increased education spending. In one study, almost half of those who supported increased funding said they would do so even if it meant higher taxes. We have urged the government to consider the imposition of a minimum tax on profitable corporations and have suggested that revenue thus generated be spent in areas such as education and health.

It would be highly inconsistent, then, for us to be in concurrence with Mr Harris's view that the government ought to cut taxes and reduce government spending. We believe the NDP government had no choice but to respond as it did to the recession and to the widespread misery it has produced. The fact cannot be ignored that the economy of Ontario is in desperate straits largely because of the ruinous policies of the federal government. The enmity of the business community toward the Ontario budget is thus, we believe, misplaced.

It is encouraging, however, that there are voices of reason within the business sector. We note that Confederation Board of Canada economist James Frank has called the budget a "confidence-builder" which will help lead the province out of recession. Economic consultant Michael Cracken also approves of the budget, calling it "a move in the right direction," and corporate consultant Ted Ball has said that critics of the budget have not been completely fair.

Ball pointed out to a group of executives recently that $3 billion of the deficit is directly related to the depth of recession—reduced revenues, cuts in federal transfer payments, increased welfare costs due to unemployment and so forth—while $3.2 billion represents the cost of maintaining existing services. Only $1.5 billion is being spent on new services. We agree with Mr Ball's conclusion that there is nothing wrong with deficits if they represent investment in "initiatives which will enhance our future ability to create wealth."

OCUFA applauds the government's attempt to assist victims of recession and to set the stage for economic recovery. We are particularly pleased that the government has made equity and fairness a priority in its approach to government. We have written to congratulate Mr Rae and the Minister of Colleges and Universities, Richard Allen, on initiatives they have taken with respect to native education, improved campus safety and violence against women.

When the government first made its announcement with respect to funding for the province's universities, OCUFA was disappointed that the funds provided fell short of the very substantial amounts needed to begin to make up for past shortfalls. We recognize that the NDP has been more generous than other provincial governments and also that the government's ability to do more is seriously impaired by the decision of the federal government to freeze transfer payments to the provinces. This policy will cost Ontario's universities and colleges a total of $1.4 billion by the end of 1995. It is crucially important for the government of Ontario to make major financial commitments to post-secondary education, and at the same time to fight federal cutbacks in transfer payments.

It is astonishing that the federal government is pursuing such policies while at the same time saying that it acknowledges the important role higher education has to play in enabling Canada to compete more effectively in global markets. Harvard economist Robert Reich has explained eloquently the significance of economic globalization in his highly acclaimed book The Work of Nations. Reich argues that as money, technology, ideas and jobs flow ever more freely across national borders, all that will remain rooted within national boundaries are the people who comprise a nation. It is the knowledge and skills of its citizens which will be the nation's primary assets and a nation that does not invest in its people will not prosper.

Reich challenges conservative economic theories which favour lowering taxes for the wealthy, making cuts in public spending and reducing budget deficits in order to create a pool of national capital for investment. He also challenges the widely held view that national economic activity is divided between the public and private sector and that the public sector spends the money while the private sector earns it and invests it. Reich believes that the increasingly unimpeded movement of capital worldwide means that "reductions in public spending and tax cuts for the wealthy...investors are coming to have little direct bearing on how much private capital is invested in the nation's factories, equipment, and research and development."

On the other hand, he states: "There is...a growing connection between the amount and the kind of investments that the public sector undertakes and the capacity of the nation to attract worldwide capital. Herein lies the new logic of economic nationalism." Reich argues that the knowledge and skills of a nation's working people and the quality of its infrastructure "are what makes it unique, and uniquely attractive, in the world economy. Investments in these relatively immobile factors of worldwide production are what chiefly distinguish one nation from another; money, by contrast, moves easily around the world."

"A workforce that is knowledgeable and skilled at doing complex things, and which can easily transport the fruits of its labours into the global economy, will entice global money to it." As people's knowledge and skills increase and experience accumulates, "a nation's citizens add greater and greater value to the world economy—commanding ever-higher compensation and improving their standard of living." Without proper knowledge, skills and infrastructure, however, "the relationship is likely to be the reverse—a vicious cycle in which global investment can be lured only by relatively low wages and low taxes. These enticements in turn make it more difficult for the nation to finance adequate education and infrastructure in the future."

It can no longer be disputed that to succeed in the knowledge-based global economy, Canada needs a better-educated population. The federal government's recently released discussion paper Learning Well...Living Well recommends that by the year 2000 Canada double the number of its post-secondary graduates. It is simply not possible for Canadian universities to further increase their capacity without a significant infusion of funds. The education of Canada's young, and the further education and retraining of those already in the workforce, is taking longer and costing more.

At present, 22% of the jobs require 17 years of education and training, but it has been estimated that by the end of the decade 50% of jobs will require this amount of preparation. The jobs of the future, then, will require a higher level of knowledge and skills, knowledge and skills which will become outdated approximately every five years.

Failure to make the kind of investment in education and infrastructure that has been advocated by Reich and others will result not only in economic disaster, but in social turmoil as well. Reich further notes that American society is becoming less equal and less just, the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer. The widening gap in American incomes is directly related to levels of education. In 1980 male college graduates in the United States earned 80% more than high school graduates; by 1990 the gap had nearly doubled.

Particularly disturbing in Reich's work is his description of an increasingly polarized American society, where the "symbolic analysts"—that is, those who enjoy a high standard of living because they are in jobs which add high value to the world economy—are steadily "disengaging" or "seceding" from the rest of American society. These people are increasingly choosing to live in suburban or exurban communities where they enjoy vastly better schools, housing, health care, recreational facilities, municipal services and safety and security than do most Americans. Reich notes that the same phenomenon exists with respect to wealthier neighbourhoods within large cities:

"Several (American) cities have authorized property owners in certain upscale districts to assess one another a special surtax for amenities unavailable to other residents, like extra garbage collection, street cleaning and security. One such New York district...raised $4.7 million from its members in 1989, of which $1 million underwrote a private police force of uniformed guards and plainclothes investigators. The new community of like incomes, with the power to tax and the power to enforce the law, is thus becoming a separate city within the city."

OCUFA does not believe this is the kind of society that is appropriate to Ontario, or to Canada. We urge our leaders at both levels of government to abandon the type of thinking which favours greater concessions for the wealthy while cutting public services. It is vital that we think instead of making the kind of educational and infrastructural investments which will improve our people's standard of living by enhancing the value of what they contribute to the world economy.

Along with more public investment, Canada and Ontario need to consider the question of tax reform. OCUFA urges the federal government to introduce a tax system that is more fair and responsible. This might include initiatives such as restoring progressive income tax rates, increasing tax rates and closing tax loopholes for wealthy individuals and corporations, abolishing the GST and introducing a tax on net wealth and transfer of wealth. We also urge that the federal government guarantee in the Constitution the provision of shared funding to the provinces for health, education and social assistance as part of a Canadian social contract.

On the provincial level, OCUFA looks forward to the findings of the Fair Tax Commission. We repeat our call for the creation of a minimum tax on profitable corporations, with a portion of the revenue thus generated being allocated to universities in the province. It is only fitting, since corporations are major beneficiaries of university education and research. We note that while the business community is prone to fly into a frenzy at the suggestion of higher taxes, tax rates are seldom a consideration when businesses make location decisions. The cost of property, the availability of skilled labour, the ease of transportation and the supply of energy are cited by business as more important variables.

In conclusion, OCUFA reiterates its approval of the general direction of the initiatives announced in the Ontario budget and urges the government to resist conservative cries to reduce the deficit at the expense of public expenditure. In fact, we believe that the government must do much more in the way of investing in education, job training, infrastructural development and social services. We urge the business community and the conservative thinkers in government to abandon the vestigial thinking which is the true source of our uncompetitiveness and join with more progressive thinkers in making Ontario a place of social justice and sustained economic prosperity.

In other words, we want to point out that there is a direct correlation between the level of education, knowledge and skills and the people's wealth and prosperity, that you cannot have a wealthy and prosperous society without having a well-educated society in our day and age. Education is the key to economic and social wellbeing.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation. We have approximately six minutes per party for questioning. We will be starting with the opposition.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in the highly articulated brief from your association relating to the budget. You mentioned that this morning we heard from the University of Toronto, and yesterday from York University, about their responses to the budget. Much of their feeling was comparable to yours, although in both cases the universities themselves were more dramatic.

In the case of the University of Toronto, it was not the university itself that was represented; it was the faculty association, the student council, the administrative associations and so on that were involved in their presentation. It was a universal presentation. They commented directly and highly negatively, relating to the fact that there had been no more than the transfers to the universities at the rate of inflation, plus minimum capital transfers for such things as asbestos removal and so on. In other words, there were no initiatives to meet what everyone in the universities has described as underfunding of more than $400 million on an annual basis, to base. You have not mentioned that at all in your brief and I am quite taken aback by that.

Dr Graham: I do not believe we have not mentioned that. We have appealed to the government to put more money into education, including post-secondary education. It is certainly true that provincial expenditures in 1991 have grown faster than grants to universities. I think that universities received about 8% of revenues this year, if you take the direct grants plus the employment equity subsidies, whereas the total budgetary expenditures were up by about 13.4%. We do not dispute that whatsoever.

What we certainly look forward to and expect this government to be sensitive to is the increasing need for highly educated people. It is no longer the case that a high school education can provide an adequate base for people earning jobs and producing wealth in our society. We continue to be, as we always have been, critical of the funding levels for the support of post-secondary education.

We do recognize, however, that there is more than one component to this problem. It is more than simply a question of the provincial government doing something. As you know, the federal government has been cutting back dramatically in the cash portions of the transfer payments, which has seriously affected the ability of all provincial governments across the country to support their post-secondary educational institutions. You will note that in one of our graphs, the total loss as a result of the freeze on transfer payments is, up until 1995, $1.4 billion. That is a lot of money taken out of this province's ability to pay.

We want to stress that this government should do everything it can in concert with other provincial governments that there are some changes made. These discussions are going up in September, apparently, in connection with the national unity debate. We expect to see our government on the table arguing vigorously for increased transfer payments, and then passing the results of those payments on to post-secondary institutions in Ontario.

Mrs Sullivan: You do not see a dichotomy in your quite effusive support for the budget and the fact that one of the needs of the universities were addressed in it?

Dr Graham: I would not say that none of the needs of the universities were addressed in it. There were some very good initiatives undertaken by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. We want to applaud them for their initiatives regarding native education and regarding what they have done for women's safety. We think more has to be done. We certainly are not applauding the level of funding. We are encouraging this government to spend more on higher education. We do not think it is adequate, of course.

Mr Phillips: What we are finding in these hearings is kind of two camps, as you might expect. One group, like myself, comes in and says, "Hey, the budget is pretty good," and then the other camp comes in and says—the challenge I think we face is that we will not know for a while. We will not know for maybe a year or two years. It is a bit like forecasting the weather a year from now, storms or sunny weather.

I appreciate what your association is saying, that you like the budget. The concern other groups have is that there are two sides to the budget. There is the spending side, and then there is the revenue side, how to raise the resources to do all the things that we want to do. I think the troublesome part of the budget for many people is a belief that the federal government is bankrupt. If you think you are going to get a lot more money out of them, forget it. Realistically, they do not have money. You are not going to get much more money out of the federal government.

I guess you are pretty much convinced that this budget is in the the long-term best interests of your group and will create the economic wellbeing in the province that will be able to fund the necessary investment. If a year from now we are back here sitting, as we probably will be, what will be your expectations about the economic climate in the province that this budget will create? I think the budget calls for 4% real growth next year and some substantial increases in taxes to do the things that it wants to do, but how does your group see the economic wellbeing next year?

Dr Graham: Of course, we are not crystal ball gazers any more than the government is. When you say that we applaud the budget, we do applaud the direction of the budget. We do not applaud everything in the budget. We do not support the levels that post-secondary education is receiving. We think post-secondary education should receive higher levels of funding than it has received. But we do support the overall direction that the budget is moving in; that is, using whatever moneys are available to create wealth.

We would hope that over another year's time there would be some results. I do not think we ought to go on a one-year scale on this. I think, certainly from what economists in our university sector have been saying, that it may take longer than a year to climb out of this situation. Perhaps you have seen the paper that was written by a number of economists in the universities in Ontario to comment on the general direction of the budget.

Mr Phillips: I am not sure I have seen that.

Mrs Sullivan: Mel Watkins's group.

Dr Graham: I think you are going to see that it will take longer than a year to see a turnaround. Generally what we want to see is the Fair Tax Commission also going to work on our situation.

1620

Mr Sterling: I always find the presentation of statistics somewhat amusing in terms of how people take percentages of whatever and put them together, and that kind of thing. I wonder if you could provide for me and the committee the actual increases in university funding over the last five-year period; in other words, take 1984-85 as your base year and start from there, and provide the committee with an actual amount that you have received.

The other part I would be interested in knowing is how the enrolments have been increasing over that period of time, because I think there is a considerable part to be put forward by that.

I attended two universities for two different degrees, one in engineering and one in law, and now I have two kids in university. I sit here and say, would I rather have my kids taught in a classroom of 250 or 500 or whatever, or would I rather have them saddled with a long-term debt situation which they are going to have to face and pay up? Because I am going to come to the end of my working career in maybe 10 or 15 years.

Mr Christopherson: In three years.

Mr Sterling: Not three years. You guys should be worried about that. I have been elected five times, fellows.

Mr Phillips: Here is your insurance policy right here. You are here for a long time, Norm.

Mr Sterling: I guess what bothers me, and I think what bothers my kids, is, is there no plan to pay this off? As Mr Phillips says, you may complain that the federal people are not transferring money here, but there is a good reason for that. They have no more money. They are in a desperate financial situation. We in this province have increased our spending at an enormous rate over the last five years. We are supposed to be one of the richest provinces in this country, so what do you do if you are in their position? You have to throw it back on somebody else's shoulders. That is done. You have to face it. So what is the plan to pay this back? How are we going to pay it back?

Dr Graham: Pay which back?

Mr Sterling: They are planning $9.7 billion for this year and then $8 billion next year, then $7 billion and $7 billion, or whatever it is.

Dr Graham: Our argument is that education is one of the highest wealth-creating conditions any society can have. I think general studies will bear out that the better educated a society is, the higher its production of wealth and the higher its standard of living. You can look at this across Europe, across Asia, and see that the general standard of living and the general wealth of a country have a direct relationship to the level of education in that country and to how seriously that particular country takes higher education and the training of its citizens and its workforce. These are the people who generate and create wealth and add to wealth in the global economy.

Mr Sterling: I do not know whether I might challenge you on that or not challenge you on that. I think there are a lot of other factors involved. The motivation of individuals is an important factor as well, regardless of the intellectual capability and the education a person has received. But what concerns me is that we have everybody coming in front of this group and saying, "Your investment"—in your children, for example—"is important because you will save money because of that." "Your investment in day care is important because you are going to save money on that." Our investment in preventive health measures is going to save us money, and your investment in higher education is going to save us money.

I listened to all those arguments when I was a minister in Mr Davis's government, and I have not seen the saving of money yet. I do not know whether our government, if we were still the government, would have saved any money, but somewhere along the line the buck has got to stop. There has to be a line drawn. When do we draw that line? You have a vested interest in your community and the people who are receiving public dollars. The majority or 100% or 80% of your money comes through this channel. But I do not understand how groups and universities—it is tough, but your professors are earning $60,000 or $80,000 or whatever it is they earn. There are a lot of people out there who are earning a heck of a lot less than that or who do not have jobs. How can you come at this time and say, "We ain't got enough"? Is there not some kind of burden upon those of us who do better to say; "I've got to tighten my belt. We're just going to have to spread out what we have a little thinner"? I do not understand that. Am I way off base?

Dr Graham: It would seem to me that you are because you are not thinking about how wealth is created in this society. Our argument is that wealth is created through the direct correlation between education and skills development of a people in that country, so we are not talking about a small sector of people who have been traditionally associated with universities. Universities have in the past been rather elitist institutions, educating the sons mostly and later the daughters of the middle or upper class or wealthier classes. In fact, universities and community colleges have to be much broader in their accessibility to a larger range of people. That is certainly the case.

We are talking about a situation in which, as I said, high school is no longer an adequate form of education for the creation of wealth in this country. You cannot have a highly developed society without having a pretty highly educated workforce. That is simply a fact of the kind of knowledge-based economy we are moving into at the end of the 20th and beginning of the 21st century. It seems to me that we simply have to have another look at education and say that higher education is not simply something to add to the income of a few people, but something to add to the income of the entire citizenry and to raise the level of standard of living of the entire population.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for your submission. I do not thank you just because you are speaking positively towards the budget, but because I think you have presented a fair, reasonable and balanced professional opinion.

I notice members opposite laughing and smiling at my comment, which just underscores what their approach has been with everyone who comes in and supports the budget. It is either that these people are economically foolish and do not understand because they cannot conceive of the higher concepts of the economy, or they have a vested interest in not coming in and doing the government's bidding. We have approached these hearings with a great deal of excitement at the opportunity to have a diversified representation of the province come in and explain why they think this budget makes an awful lot of sense and why running a deficit, which is no one's first choice, is the right thing to do. And why, quite frankly, this is a good budget for bad times.

What I would like to ask you ties into what Mr Sterling has talked about. I am pleased that he got into that area because that is the kind of thing I wanted to ask about, the idea of investment. The people from the University of Toronto made the same statement this morning, and I guess they could be charged with the same self-interest that you have been confronted with. But what I would like to ask you as professionals, are you aware of models of monitoring or evaluating, in concrete dollars, money that is invested in higher education and skills development and the resulting wealth generated at the end of the system?

I say that because government spending is different in the 1990s than it has been in the past. A lot of the deficit generated by the federal government, quite frankly—I am not being partisan—was to serve political needs because greased squeaky wheels. We do not have that luxury. Money that we spend has to give a return to the entire province, to the entire economy, or we are in deeper trouble than we are already in. Are those models available? Is there a standard model that is accepted that we could use as a government, and that other governments would use also, to show that money spent is actually money invested and here is the return at the end of the day?

Mr Graham: There are a number of studies, including Professor Reich's book which I recommend to you. You could perhaps come up with some other studies or models which we would be happy to pass on to you.

Mr Christopherson: It is a valid question Mr Sterling raises; that is, just about everybody who comes in says this is an investment in the future. The reality is that we have to look at spending that way, but we all deserve some kind of evaluation that we agree on ahead of time to see whether or not we are getting that return or whether indeed it is just political expediency.

Dr Graham: Professor Reich's book is one that I recommend to you. It has been a highly acclaimed book. He is a professor of economics at Harvard University, a well-respected, by no means left-wing, Mel Watkins or whatever onomist and nevertheless recommends what we have ted from his book.

Mr B. Ward: As we close off this first week of hear-, I cannot say I have not been surprised with the num- of groups coming in to give presentations both for and nst. We have received very diverse groups in support e budget, business organizations, social organizations, viduals, labour organizations. Perhaps you could tell us tle bit about OCUFA. I understand it is representative 2,000 members from the teaching, research and profes- al library staff throughout Ontario.

Mr Graham: That is right. We are a confederation of faculty associations in the 15 universities and other ocated institutions in Ontario. We represent on behalf he faculty associations and faculty members in our ario universities. We do not represent community col- e teaching staff, but we represent the professors and demic librarians, most of them, in Ontario. We repre- t them to the government and we are in constant con- with the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. We are sulted regularly by the ministry on matters relating to versities.

Mr B. Ward: Your organization feels our government n the right track.

Dr Graham: We believe the general direction of the lget is on the right track. As I emphasized before, we ainly want to see a continued and expanded commit- nt to post-secondary education in the upcoming budget. are quite afraid that there might be further cutbacks in e-secondary levels and we think that would be disastrous.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for your pre- tation today. We just have a couple other points of busi- s to take care of before we adjourn. One of them is ething I wanted to bring forward. Unfortunately, I do eel I should do that sitting in the chair, so I am going ask Ms Ward to come forward to be Chair while we get his one point of business, and if there is any other I will ne back into the chair, if that is all right.

Mr Sutherland: The one thing is that I believe it was Tuesday I indicated that the leader of the third party had ggested he wanted to balance the budget. Mr Sterling k strong exception to that and used unparliamentary guage; he withdrew it. But realizing that Mr Sterling s been around here a long time and his memory is probably y good and sometimes my memory is not, I went back d I checked through all the Hansards to try and find ethod I could substantiate that from documentation. I guess ind of turns out that we were both right, Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: That worries me. Can I object? If I am the same boat as this guy, I am in trouble.

Mr Sutherland: On June 25, 1991, Mr Harris read o the record a petition. It was a petition by a resident of ilton, the one by the male nurse, and it had several ousand signatures. The petition indicated: "We will not erate any more tax increases. The proposed budget ould push the accumulated debt.... Ontario is already the ghest taxed jurisdiction...." Then we have the following ntences: "The taxpayers of Ontario want the provincial government to know that we want a balanced budget now. We do not want increased spending. We do not want higher deficits." Then Mr Harris says, "I too have affixed my signature to this petition and I congratulate" the person who got this petition together.

Mr Sterling: Boy, are you reaching.

Mr Phillips: You are supposed to say you are sorry.

Mr Sutherland: No, what I am saying is that, affixing his name to the petition for a balanced budget plus his indications—

Mrs Sullivan: No, every member must sign his peti- tions.

Mr Sutherland: No, you can present it without affix- ing. At any rate, let me say that was the only reference I could find in the Hansard, so we will leave it. That is the record and I just wanted to have that put forward, as that is the record. We will let those people judge whether he di- rectly said it and whether he believes in that or not. I just wanted that correction brought forward at this time.

Mr Sterling: If I had searched the records as dili- gently as the member has and came up with so little evi- dence—I do not believe it is any evidence of Mike Harris saying he wants a balanced budget—I would have apolo- gized. That is all I have to say.

Mr Phillips: If I might add, I listened carefully to Mr Harris and I honestly do not remember him ever even implying he thought the budget should be balanced this year.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, as I say, that is the only refer- ence I found there. I just wanted it put on the record that this is how it is, and people can judge from there.

Mr Jamison: Did he ever use a figure?

Mr Sterling: No.

The Acting Chair (Ms M. Ward): Did you want to comment on that, David?

Mr Christopherson: Not on that one; another matter. We all want to get out of here. I am not going to hold us up.

To clear up some unfinished business, during the Labourers' International Union of North America presenta- tion there was a discussion about Mr Frank and whether he was on his own or whether he was representing the coun- cil. It was an important point. We all agreed to have it researched. We have a report from our researchers which indicates Mr Frank has said he is representing the position of the Conference Board of Canada and I would suggest, or I would like to request, that we send this to the pre- senters with a covering letter acknowledging that question was clarified and attach it.

Mr Sterling: I could not quite understand the wording of the sentence regarding the phone call you had made. I talked to Mr Frank and pointed out that since personal opinions are not published by the board, the article can be construed as representing the position of the board.

The Vice-Chair: Would you like clarification on that?

Mr Sterling: Yes. What does that mean?

Mrs Sullivan: It means a job next week.

Mr Rampersad: It is very simple. The board does not publish personal opinions. Consequently it is to be taken that Mr Frank would not say outright that this opinion was the opinion of the board, but he hinted very strongly. The logical conclusion is that since personal opinions are not published by the board and since this is a board publication, therefore it is construed—

Mr Kwinter: If this man is representing the conference board, why would he not come out and say, "This is the opinion of the conference board"? Why would he suddenly say, "I won't come right out and say that but it can be construed." That is absurd; it either is or it is not. Why would he not say: "Absolutely. I speak on behalf of the conference board"? Everybody who comes forward says, "The conference board says this," and he is saying, "I'm not exactly saying that, but it can be construed that the conference board is saying that." What is the deal with him?

Mr Sterling: So there is no conclusion.

Mr Christopherson: Come on, do not play games.

Mr Kwinter: Play games? I am serious. Why would he not come out and say "Yes, of course this is the opinion of the conference board"?

Mr Christopherson: If anything he should say, "It should be construed," not, "can be construed," because there is no other conclusion.

Mr Kwinter: Why would he not come out and say it?

The Vice-Chair: Order, please. Mr Sterling, you have the—

Mr Christopherson: Can you imagine the heat he is under from the right wing? You know it.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Sterling has the floor.

Mr Sterling: I want to ask the researcher, you asked Mr Frank outright if this was an opinion of the board. Is that correct?

Mr Rampersad: I asked him first if it was his opinion or the opinion of the board.

Mr Sterling: And he would not answer the question.

Mr B. Ward: What did he say?

Mr Rampersad: I am afraid I cannot tell you word for word what he said, but his point was, the good diplomat that he was, that the board does not publish personal opinions.

Mr B. Ward: So anything published is the opinion of the conference board.

Mr Rampersad: This particular publication is a publication of the board.

Mr B. Ward: There we go. Good enough for me.

Mr Rampersad: And the board and what is published in this—

Mr Christopherson: But David should have used word "should," not "can." You concluded there is no conclusion to reach. Therefore, when you advised us, instead of "can be construed," there is an argument used—

Mr Kwinter: Yes, but you said he would not come out and say it was not—

The Vice-Chair: Okay, hang on a second. Let's have some order back here. Ms Ward.

Ms M. Ward: Everybody else is giving their opinion on this and I would like to give you mine as to why he is saying—you asked him whether it was his opinion or the opinion of the conference board. The way I would interpret your reply, he is basically saying: "Don't be so bloody blank stupid. The board does not publish personal opinions, so obviously it is the opinion of the board."

Mr Sterling: I do not agree.

The Vice-Chair: We have the issue on record that Mr Christopherson raised.

Mr Christopherson: They are not crazy and they are not on our payroll. It must be a mistake. Right, guys?

The Vice-Chair: Mr Christopherson put on the floor that we should send a copy of the report back from the research to the Labourers' International Union. That is the issue we are dealing with.

Mr Sterling: I disagree with that, because the report does not indicate that Mr Frank was confronted with saying "Is this the conference board opinion?" Mr Frank refused to answer that question.

The Vice-Chair: You are changing it just to suit what is here.

Mr Christopherson: No. That is all I said before, send this here, with just a covering letter that, "Further discussion you heard at the meeting, attached please find the results of our research department's discussion with Mr Frank," and then let them draw their own conclusions so that we do not spend taxpayers' money debating semantics.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. If that is fine, then seeing to other formal business—no one has any questions for the clerk at this stage with any of the information they have been given for the touring? Okay, we are now adjourning. We just have the subcommittee to meet a bit.

Mr B. Ward: If any questions should arise, we can call them tomorrow, right?

The Vice-Chair: Yes.

The committee adjourned at 1643.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 12 August 1991

The committee met at 0836 in the Valhalla Inn, Thunder Bay.

ELECTION OF CHAIR

The Vice-Chair: Good morning. I call this meeting of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to order. We are here in Thunder Bay having our hearings on budget.

Before we hear our first presentation, I would like to inform the committee that the clerk has received the resignation of Mr Wiseman as Chair of the committee and therefore the first order of business is to elect a new Chair. I ask for nominations.

Mr B. Ward: I nominate Ron Hansen.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Do we need seconders? We do need seconders. Are there any other nominations? Seeing none, I declare nominations closed. Therefore, Mr Ron Hansen will be the new Chair and I shall yield the chair to you.

The Chair: Thank you, and I thank my nominators.

1991-92 BUDGET

DRYDEN AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: To start the business of the day, we call on the Dryden and District Labour Council for its submission to the committee. When you come forward, please identify yourself for Hansard. You will have one half-hour and after your presentation the remaining time in the half-hour will be split among the three parties to ask questions.

Ms Wall: Good morning. I am Alma Wall, president of the Dryden and District Labour Council. This is my first term as president and this is my first major submission. I would like to welcome you to Thunder Bay. We are glad to see this government making a real effort to reach out to the people of Ontario by holding these hearings across the province. We appreciate your efforts.

I wanted to keep the tone of this presentation on a positive note, but in preparing this submission I found that though the problems we face in the northwest are much the same as in the rest of the province—unemployment, plant closures, privatization, etc—most of our communities are re-industry towns. When a plant closes in the northwest, the community is faced with the challenge of keeping the town vital and viable. The financial and emotional stress placed on these communities is tremendous. We believe this budget is a major step forward in addressing these problems.

This recession is, without question, the worst recession to hit the province since the Great Depression. Job losses in the province have totalled 214,000 in the first year of this recession, compared to 89,000 in the first year of the 1981-82 recession. This constitutes a drop of 4.3% in employment compared to a drop of 2.1% in 1981-82. The number of jobs in the manufacturing sector dropped by 97,000 in Ontario last year compared to a drop of 76,000 in 1981-82.

This constitutes a drop of 9.9% in manufacturing jobs compared to a drop of 7.2% in 1981-82. Ontario's rate of job loss accounts for 80% of the national loss in jobs.

Many of these jobs are gone for ever. In 1990, 65% of reported layoffs were due to partial or complete plant closures. In the first five months of this year, 59% were due to partial or complete plant closures. By contrast, in 1982 only 24% of the permanent layoffs were due to shutdowns. The remainder were the result of companies temporarily reducing their number of employees.

Manufacturing jobs are hard to replace. The average wage for manufacturing jobs in Ontario is $630 per week, considerably more than the average industrial wage of $542 per week and the service sector wage of $511 per week, where most jobs have been created in the last decade.

During the current recession, bankruptcies in Ontario, business and personal, have soared. Business bankruptcies increased by 73% in 1990 compared to 1989. In the same period, personal bankruptcies increased by 83%. In the first two months of 1991, there were 24% as many bankruptcies in Ontario as in all of 1990. This indicates that we are experiencing a major industrial restructuring as well as a downturn in the economy. The implications for the future are considerable, not only in terms of levels of employment but also in terms of living standards and social services which we all need.

Brian Mulroney is among those who do not like the Ontario government's budget. "This Ontario initiative represents quite a departure from the policies of most governments in the world in dealing with these kinds of problems," he said. Mulroney is right. Ontario's 1991 budget does try to do something different. As Floyd Laughren said: "We had a choice to make this year—to fight the deficit or fight the recession. We are proud to be fighting the recession." The Ontario government did not abandon its responsibilities to working people, their families and their communities.

Let's look at what the Mulroney Tories have done for us, or should I say to us. Federal government cutbacks hurt Canadians in all provinces, but they have cost Ontarians the most. Cutbacks to established programs, to the Canada assistance plan and other programs will cost the people of Ontario $1.6 billion this year alone. The result is increased pressure on the provincial programs, such as welfare and social services, designed to alleviate poverty. The freeze on established programs financing could well mean the gradual death of medicare as a national program, enjoyed equally by all Canadians, by the 1996-97 fiscal year.

Three years into the Mulroney-Reagan trade deal we have lost hundreds of thousands of jobs, especially in the highly paid manufacturing sector, and have seen dozens of plants and factories close. Whatever happened to "jobs, jobs, jobs"? Not long ago, I heard someone say that our Prime Minister was looking across the lake to the American shores as he uttered the words "jobs, jobs, jobs." Whatever happened to the training and adjustment measures the Tories promised to help the victims of free trade? So far, all the Tories have done is to eliminate their share of contributions to the unemployment insurance fund and raise premiums for employers and workers.

The same people who brought us the bilateral Canada-US free trade agreement are at it again, trying to integrate the economies of Canada, the United States and Mexico, a trilateral agreement. We in Ontario already know what that means: Lost jobs as manufacturing plants flee south; big business pressure to limit and cut back on social programs that provide a subsidy to Canadian employers; increased pressure on cultural programs and supports; and an overall willingness to have our economic policies dictated from American boardrooms.

They seem to have learned nothing from the devastation of our economy over the last three years. On February 5, 1991, the Minister of International Trade, John Crosbie, stated, "There is no intention to renegotiate the provisions of the Canada-US free trade agreement." However, in testimony before a congressional subcommittee, United States Trade Representative, Carla Hills, had this to say: "Finally, both the United States and Canada agree that the US-Canada free trade agreement sets a floor for commitments between the two countries. Trilateral negotiations will give us an opportunity to improve and expand the US-Canada free trade agreement."

The Ontario government's position is clear. On February 11, 1991, Allan Pilkey, then Ontario's Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, said, "A possible trilateral trade deal between Canada, the United States and Mexico would be a harmful extension of an already flawed Canada-US free trade deal.... The free trade agreement has not worked for the people of Ontario and we fail to see how the extension of a deal to Mexico can possibly be of any benefit to our industries and our workers."

The goods and services tax is one more dimension of the Tory big business agenda in Canada. It involves a massive shift in who pays tax in Canada, from corporations to individuals. The GST will be paid by consumers to the tune of about $9 billion a year in Ontario alone. Since its introduction, the GST has proven to be more detrimental than first predicted. According to the GST consumer information office, the average family will pay an extra $570 a year in GST, about 50% more than predicted in government studies. The GST is the wrong tax on the wrong people at the wrong time.

Although a provincial government cannot get rid of it, the NDP government refused to harmonize Ontario's retail sales tax with the GST, and refused to piggyback the provincial sales tax on top of it. That decision alone is leaving $470 million a year in the pockets of Ontario's working people.

For years, the federal government has kept interest rates high, claiming this was necessary to fight inflation, to support the Canadian dollar and to attract investment. High interest rates, they claim, are essential to lowering inflationary pressures which, among other things, force interest rates to go up. They have it backwards. High interest rates hurt working people and hurt the economy. They add significantly to business costs by raising the cost of capital.

In the meantime, high interest rates maintain the Canadian dollar at artificially high levels, especially vis-à-vis the United States. This undercuts the competitiveness of Canadian goods and services in the US and adds to the devastation caused by the free trade deal. Amazingly, it is the Tories and their big business backers who complain loudest about Canada's lack of competitiveness.

The sorry legacy of the Tory government in Ottawa—cutbacks affecting social services, free trade with the United States, a North American free trade agreement, the GST, and high interest rates. It is these difficulties working people in Ontario have to overcome. The provincial government must get helps us in our fight.

In the context of recession and federal government cutbacks, the provincial government had to make some tough choices. In putting the wellbeing of people before the deficit, they moved in the opposite direction of the Tories. Mulroney's answer is to raise taxes and cut services, making the recession worse. The answer of the Ontario government is to fight the recession through:

1. Sustaining and creating 70,000 jobs. This means the province lost only 260,000 jobs instead of 330,000 jobs under federal government policy;

2. Undertaking the most aggressive anti-recession effort in all of Canada through increasing overall spending by 13.4%;

3. Creating the $700 million anti-recession program. When combined with the contributions of local governments and agencies, total spending will exceed $900 million;

4. Maintaining health care and education, despite cutbacks from the federal Tory government;

5. Responding to the need for action in such areas as worker protection, pay equity, social assistance reform, affordable housing and the environment;

6. Putting spending power in the hands of Ontarians. By not imposing the provincial sales tax on the GST, $400 million will be left in the pockets of consumers in 1991, and enriching the Ontario tax reduction for low-income earners;

7. Creating a $215-million social assistance reform package that is designed to provide benefits for those who are in greatest need, to help people get into the labour force, to increase fairness and accessibility, and to provide further relief to overburdened municipalities;

8. Providing tax relief for the poorest of Ontarians, initiating the largest enrichment in the history of the Ontario tax reduction program. This $50-million enrichment means the number of low-income earners whose Ontario income tax will be eliminated or reduced will increase to 700,000 for the 1991 tax year;

9. Allocating $48 million in 1991-92 to help lay the groundwork for self-government and resolution of land claims for support for research and negotiations; $20 million to be spent on community infrastructure such as water and sewer systems; $5 million for 400 new child care spaces on reserves;

10. Allocating an additional $12 million for new shelter beds and enhanced services for women who are victims of domestic violence, and an increase of more than $8 million expand and enhance services to women and children who are victims of sexual assault;

11. Making $125 million available to Ontario's transfer agencies—municipalities, school boards, hospitals, universities and colleges, and other agencies—to assist them with the cost of pay equity;

12. An unprecedented level of provincially supported activity for the development of another 10,000 non-profit housing units, which will cost the province approximately $50 million in annual operating subsidies when completed.

Big business spokesmen, the media and the opposition parties have all criticized the budget for its deficit. When the NDP came into government, it discovered that the budgetary deficit plus confidently predicted by the Peterson Liberals was $2.5-billion deficit. Since then, facing the worst recession in 50 years, it has made tough choices while managing taxpayers' money carefully and compassionately.

In all of the discussion of the province's budgetary deficit, little attention has been paid to its causes. Most of the deficit comes from the financial reality of the recession: falling revenues, increasing costs in health care, social services and education. A very large part of it is the impact of federal transfer payment cuts. The cumulative impact of federal cutbacks in established programs financing—health and post-secondary education—and payments under the Canada assistance plan—social services—is costing Ontario $1.6 billion in 1991-92 alone.

Last year, provincial revenues fell at the same time as more people required social assistance. Welfare costs have doubled in the last three years. More than half of the people receiving social assistance are single mothers with children at home and people with disabilities who have difficulty finding work at the best of times. Forty-two per cent of social assistance beneficiaries are children. The average stay on social assistance for persons classified employable is 4.5 months. So we say to those who do not like deficits, and we are among them, what would you cut, funding for schools, hospitals and community care for seniors? Where is the economic wisdom in increasing the unemployment lines and welfare case loads?

Ontario's projected deficit of $9.7 billion is moderate if considered in perspective with the record of recent Conservative governments. The Ontario deficit is comparatively low in terms of total spending, in terms of gross domestic product, in per capita terms with other provinces and with the federal government under Conservative governments. In Ontario the 1991 per capita deficit is $992, in Alberta in 1987 the per capita deficit was $1,713, in Saskatchewan in 1986 the per capita deficit was $1,188, and in Canada in 1991 the per capita deficit was $1,149.

Spending money now is critical to stimulating economic growth, to responsible fiscal management and to helping our fellow citizens in difficult economic circumstances. As the figures above demonstrate, Ontario's spending is not out of control. In fact, it is less than other provincial governments spent to get out of the last recession.

Ontario's public debt charges—the interest costs of carrying its debt—are low as a share of its total revenues. The federal government spends 36 cents of every $1 of revenue as interest on its debt, spending which only serves to benefit investors and bond dealers. In contrast, Ontario spends less than 10 cents of every $1 of revenue on interest costs—less than every province except Alberta and British Columbia. These costs will rise to 11.6 cents next year, still far below the federal rate and less than the debt charges of most provinces. Ontario lost its triple A rating, but so did the Liberal government when it first came to power. It did not regain it until four years later.

In preparing this brief, I have carefully avoided citing any individual cases in northwestern Ontario, as I was only contacted on Thursday and asked to present here this morning. So I was unable to thoroughly research any cases and to be able to answer questions on those cases accurately. However, I have attached a news clipping which relates the story of one small businessman and his family.

Gord and Linda Griffiths took over the running of the Clover-Belt Country Store five years ago. Last fall the gas pumps had to be removed due to age. The removal and disposal of the pumps was expensive and as the cost of replacement was in the neighbourhood of $20,000 the Griffiths made the decision not to replace the pumps. This spring Canada Post decided to change the terms of the agreement for the operation of the post office at the store. The Griffiths were told there would be no negotiation of the six-page contract. As the agreement resulted in a wage reduction of approximately 62%, the Griffiths decided not to renew the contract and to close the store.

The Griffiths family also owns and operates an abattoir and butcher shop. With four federal ministries and four provincial ministries watchdogging the industry, each one imposing their own rules and regulations, the Griffiths family is unsure of the future of the abattoir and butcher shop.

Government regulation, privatization and lack of government funding has resulted in the closure of one business and is threatening the future of another. This is in only one family.

Since the article was published another business just outside the community has assumed some of the postal services once provided by Mr Griffiths and his family. Had the same arrangements been made with Mr Griffiths that were made at the new location, Mr Griffiths would probably have been able to keep his store open and operating and would right now be providing an essential service to a small, rural community.

In conclusion, we would like to thank the government of Ontario for holding public hearings on the budget and providing us with an opportunity to present our views on the economic situation.

In talking with my members, I found they were well aware that Ontario's economy, like others around the world, is undergoing and needs restructuring. Our members want an efficient economy which provides secure, well-paid jobs at high levels of employment. They want an economy which is highly productive, yet is environmentally as well as socially sustainable, an economy in which the benefits of growth are shared fairly.

In our view, the budget is a major step in the right direction. It represents an investment in the people of Ontario to lay the groundwork for sustainable prosperity in the 1990s. The Conference Board of Canada forecasts released May 21 confirm that while Ontario has been worst hit by the current recession, it will lead the country in economic growth in 1992.

Thank you for the opportunity to make this presentation to this committee. The next few years will provide many challenges for all of us. I look forward to working with you in the future.

Mr McLean: Thank you for your presentation. The question I want to ask you is with regard to the gas tax. Do you agree with the proposal in the budget for the 3.4-cent increase in the gas tax?

Ms Wall: I am sorry?

Mr McLean: The budget increased gas taxes substantially and I am wondering what your opinion is on that increase in gas taxes. There were some commitments made that the price of fuel in the north would be levelled out with the fuel in the rest of the province. That has not happened and in fact the gas tax has been increased. I wanted to know what your opinion was with regard to the increase in taxation.

Ms Wall: Gas prices here in the north have always been high. We do not like it.

Mr McLean: I did not see anything in your brief about the details of the budget. That was why I asked the question. I thought to bring that issue up would be important for people of the north because they are very concerned about the price of gas.

I guess I will go on with another question and it has to do with skills training—

Mr B. Ward: I do not mean to interrupt. I just wanted clarification. How much time does each party have, Mr Chair?

The Chair: We have about three minutes for each party.

Mr McLean: The last administration was kind of keen on skills training programs in Ontario. This administration, I have noticed, with Mr Pilkey when he was in the ministry—and I guess it really comes under Mr Richard Allen, the Minister of Colleges and Universities and Minister of Skills Development. Are there training programs in the north?

Ms Wall: Yes, there are.

Mr McLean: Is it through the high schools?

Ms Wall: It is through the community college, Confederation College, here in this part of the northwest.

Mr McLean: Is it fairly active, with a good enrolment?

Ms Wall: I would say yes. There is a lot of participation.

Mr Nelson: There has been some reduction in services in training workers. For instance, at Quetico Centre they previously trained heavy equipment operators. There was a reduction from 48 prior to 1984. It went down to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 24 and then they eliminated the program at Quetico Centre.

Mr B. Ward: When the budget originally came out there was a large amount of criticism from groups and organizations, but since then there has been more support, especially since these hearings have taken place. We spent a week in Toronto and now we will be touring the north. More and more business groups, social organizations, economists from across Canada, indeed the Conference Board of Canada itself, have come out in support of the budget and said the province is heading in the proper direction during these tough economic times. If our government had not taken the action it did from an economic standpoint in battling the recession and trying to cushion the blow that workers and businesses face because of these tough economic times—recognizing you are not economists, you are working people and you understand things that go on in the north—if we had not taken the initiatives we did, would you think the impact would be?

Ms Wall: I shudder to even think of it. What has been happening has not been working and hopefully these measures are going to help us.

Mr Nelson: As was pointed out in the brief, the suggestion of closure of schools, hospital beds and so forth is just unthinkable to the people in northwestern Ontario.

Mr B. Ward: In fact, if our government had tried to answer the critics and had cut back on our health care, cut back on our social programs, cut back on our job creation, things would be worse than they are now, recognizing that things are bad.

Ms Wall: I work for a board of education. This would have been much worse. If we had had any major cutbacks in education, the implications would not have been pleasant.

Mr Nelson: I would like to clarify what I was saying before regarding the program at Quetico Centre. That was under the federal program that cut back that particular training program.

Mr B. Ward: The federal government cut that back.

Mr Nelson: Right. I was not able to complete what I was saying.

Mr B. Ward: Perhaps you could expand. What is the program? It is run by the federal government.

The Chair: Sorry. Mrs Sullivan.

Mr Nelson: I will never get to tell the story.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in the emphasis on job creation and the sustaining of jobs which the budget includes. I would like to know, specifically from the point of view of this community, where jobs have been created and where they have been sustained as a result of this budget.

Mr Nelson: You are asking the Dryden labour council to respond to what is going on in Thunder Bay?

Mrs Sullivan: In your own community, where have jobs been created as a direct result of this budget?

Mr Nelson: I think they have been maintained in areas of education, health care and social services. Those jobs that would obviously be cut and no longer exist there, providing—

Mrs Sullivan: Where did the threat of their being cut come from?

Mr Nelson: As was pointed out in the brief, if you have time to read it—

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, I have.

Mr Nelson: There has been a deficit left over, there have been cutbacks at the federal level, and as a result of the choice to the government, as far as we understand anyway, was to either make cutbacks to reduce the deficit or fight the recession. That is what this labour council and the other labour councils are trying to support, that we are fighting the recession versus cutbacks.

Mrs Sullivan: Have there been new jobs created in Thunder Bay as a result of this budget?

Ms Wall: I cannot address that issue.

Mr Nelson: In a small community there probably are a lot of jobs being created as a direct result of the budget. However, when these people are working, people in other industries benefit and maintain their employment, such as in grocery stores, lumber yards and so forth. If people are working, then as a direct result of being able to work there is a ripple effect on the economy. These other jobs may very well have fallen by the wayside and would not have been there to support the economy of the community. But because of this budget, these people are working and those dollars are in the community instead of unemployment insurance and welfare, which would be a direct drain on the provincial and federal resources.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation before the committee. It was well appreciated.

RACE RELATIONS THUNDER BAY

The Chair: The next person to appear is Lynne Sharman. You will have 15 minutes as a presenter. Try to leave some time at the end for questions from the three parties.

Ms Sharman: I am here to represent Race Relations Thunder Bay, and I am specifically addressing and supporting the $7.5-million allocation to the anti-racism strategies that were implemented in the budget.

Race Relations Thunder Bay is a community advocacy and lobbying group working to develop and monitor anti-racism strategies in the following areas: We address education initiatives and advocacy; employment equity initiatives—these are all on a community basis; complaint resolution and advocacy; women's initiatives and advocacy; and media and cultural initiatives. This is in the city and district.

Past initiatives included extensive lobbying of the Thunder Bay Police Commission in 1989-90, particularly with regard to the perception and treatment of Ojibway and Cree residents of this city and the absence of native police personnel.

In 1991 our organization has focused on the review and revision of draft race and ethnocultural relations policies introduced by both boards of education. Our recommendations include the introduction of compulsory native studies from junior kindergarten to grade 12, from both a historical and contemporary perspective, with a whole-system recognition of the Ojibway and Cree people, who are in fact the host nation of this region. It is this nation of people who have experienced systemic racism in every conceivable form over the past 200 years—intellectual, economic, spiritual, physical, emotional and cultural.

In Thunder Bay neither the public nor separate school boards have policies or procedures in place that protect elementary and secondary native and visible minority students from overt or subtle—hidden curriculum—forms of discrimination and harassment. At the June Native Community Forum on Education Issues in Thunder Bay, co-sponsored by the provincial Ministry of Citizenship, 60 native parents attended and related their children's stories and their own sense of powerlessness to effect change due to entrenched systemic barriers. Parents described over and over again their children experiencing incidents of intimidation by principals, teachers and peers, originating in the absence of respect for and acknowledgement of beliefs and rights that run counter to those of the dominant majority.

Because the formal mechanism for remedial action does not yet exist on an institutional basis, a parent advocacy network has been formed and funding is being made available to provide the materials and resource persons necessary to proactively create a culturally healthy learning environment for native and visible minority students.

Racism is the root cause of the problems that the provincial government is now addressing, with its allocations to the Ministry of Citizenship, Ministry of Education, Ministry of Colleges and Universities and to the minister responsible for native affairs, on behalf of Ojibway and Cree people. The change is tangible in this region already and it is a positive and dynamic one.

Even to those people who have been living in a recession for many decades in northwestern Ontario, and that includes native people, women and visible minorities, the economic backsliding of the past decade has been disastrous. It is reflected in northwestern Ontario's high incidence of alcohol and substance abuse, domestic and sexual violence against women and children, the high dropout rates in secondary schools and the high rate of incarceration of young native men and women.

If the budget had not produced a financial commitment to the inherent right to self-government of native people, if funding had not been allocated for community infrastructures such as water and sewer services on reserves, if the funds were not provided to the Ministry of Education to address self-identified elementary and secondary school needs in the northern native community, the provincial government would have had blood on its hands, because people have literally been killed by racism in northwestern Ontario, some by suicide, some by escaping into alcohol and substance addiction, and some by committing criminal acts, knowingly and unknowingly. The silent bloodletting has been acknowledged finally.

It is ironic then and perhaps predictable that racial equity should be financially and legislatively introduced to northwestern Ontario now. As a society we are struggling in a post-technological employment era. The training and education that should have begun 40 years ago is being put into motion in the latter stages of post-industrial and post-technological manufacturing and distribution macrosystems. The equity the province is ensuring with this budget is a last ecological and spiritual shudder, and we are relieved that you heard the cry in Toronto. It obviously did not pierce the walls of last week's Conservative Mardi Gras.

In terms of Race Relations Thunder Bay, the $7.5 million in funding announced by the province for anti-racism strategies over a two-year period indicates this government's willingness to adopt a leadership role in the eyes of the rest of the country. There is a sense of vision inherent in this budget, evidenced by the development of much-needed implementation guidelines with the creation of a provincial anti-racism policy, with the public sector anti-racism strategy with increased aboriginal minority representation on government advisory boards, and the creation of the anti-racism secretariat itself. Race Relations Thunder Bay particularly endorses the need for a distinct approach to anti-racism measures for aboriginal people in this and other regions of Ontario.

Many Ojibway and Cree residents are very mistrustful of provincial and federal anti-racism campaigns in which they are visually and representationally absent as active participants, beneficiaries and initiators of anti-racism print and broadcast strategies. This lack of media representation extends to public and private broadcasts and Supply and Services productions by the government itself.

In Thunder Bay we receive two commercial channels from urban Detroit as a major component of consumer service. Regular news coverage on a daily basis from downtown Detroit highlights racial tensions and strife in a major US metropolitan centre to Thunder Bay viewers. This urban racial strife becomes embedded in the consciousness of Thunder Bay residents: population 110,000; 25,000 children enrolled in elementary and secondary schools; 6,000 children living on welfare and family benefits with a single parent; the second highest rate of seniors in Canada after Victoria, British Columbia; a very high rate of illiteracy, alcohol and drug abuse, unemployment, and domestic and sexual violence compared to other centres in the province; and one of the highest rates of disabled persons compared to other centres in the province due to the at-risk former employment, for example logging, and individuals who are injured or disabled moving to Thunder Bay for needed services.

This is not Detroit. However, residents are fed daily the visual and audio imagery of urban and suburban Detroit and assume it as their own. The Rogers media disallow residents from looking at Thunder Bay, northwestern Ontario or the rest of Ontario or Canada, for that matter, in a non-fearful and objective manner.

Nowhere on Rogers cable from Detroit do we see or hear anything about the realities of life on reserves in northwestern Ontario, anything about the fact that between 80% and 90% of native women are survivors of sexual and physical assault, or anything about the fact that northwestern Ontario is a Third World entity in terms of its treatment of Ojibway and Cree people. We do not hear or see anything about the below-poverty-level existence of 6,000 children in single-parent homes in Thunder Bay.

Television is a major activity in a community where poverty is widespread and winters are minus 30 degrees Celsius, to the point where staying inside is not only physically necessary but economically imperative and becoming even more so. Do not underestimate the transformative power of television to aid this government's fiscal and moral vision. If equity is to be understood and assumed, a given in northwestern Ontario, native communication societies must have access to commercial air time as well as the parliamentary channel.

The 7.5 million anti-racism dollars over a two-year period and the pre- and post-secondary education moneys allocated in the budget are essential to offset the post-technology equity backlash that began occurring some years ago. Unemployed young and older males displace their frustration and anger on aboriginal people, women, visible minorities and by extension, their children.

By protecting all provincial residents equally, including the 40% increase necessitated in social assistance programs, the government of Ontario offers not only a vision but the reality of social partnership, and Race Relations Thunder Bay offers its support. This is not a hostage-taking fiscal plan, does it regard the people who are struggling to realign their very ordinary lives, in the midst of unprecedented global economic, ideological, ecological and perhaps unknown genetic restructuring, as somehow faceless and somewhat without as much value as the almighty dollar.

With the very significant leadership offered by the provincial government in this budget, something will be given in return. As more Ojibway and Cree people in northwestern Ontario become known as educators, broadcasters and political leaders, they will in turn teach us something about democracy that runs parallel with the NDP's vision.

Dr Clare Brant of Shannonville, Ontario, has written Native Ethics and Rules of Behaviour that the native "ethic of democracy, which underlies the ethic of non-interference, emphasizes the equality of all individuals, encourages economic homogeneity, decision-making by consensus, interdependence of mind, autonomy and a high degree of personal privacy." Autonomy and personal privacy do not preclude the importance of group survival, which "is more important than personal property. Consequently in native culture, individuals are expected to take no more than they need and to share freely." Your fiscal policies do not touch anyone of their dignity or their self-respect no matter what they are, and we thank you.

The Chair: We have three minutes. Starting with Kim Sutherland, you have one minute. Make it a short preamble.

Mr Sutherland: I just want to ask you how you thought an employment equity plan would impact. Do you think that would help in improving race relations?

Ms Sharman: It is improving race relations. I think there are going to be two things happening. I would rather speak of it in terms of an anti-racism strategy. I think employment equity is going to create equality down the road but the introduction of the legislation very much necessitates the need for the funding for the anti-racism strategy because there has been a backlash. There is going to be a backlash, as I said in here. We have already seen examples of the backlash.

Mrs McLeod: Perhaps I can give you an opportunity to expand a little bit on it because my question is in the same direction as Mr Sutherland's. You mentioned the backlash that you begin to see, particularly when there is a large level of unemployment. I have been concerned ss the province as well as in the northwest about the klash against the most fundamental issues of equity we see in a recession. I wonder if you would comment whether you have felt more of that backlash in recent nths, and perhaps expand a little more on the kind of omic opportunities you think are needed both in nae and non-native communities and begin to address se underlying fundamental issues.

Ms Sharman: That is a really difficult question to wer, because again we are in a post-technological employment period now. You cannot look at job creation in of the ways in which we have looked at them formerly, there are things occurring locally. It is going to take ryone's co-operation and everyone's concerted effort to k at the changing notion of work and have the changing ion of what work and production are so that they bene-everyone equally in the province.

Mr McLean: You relate to the water projects on reves. There has been a substantial increase in them and t has created a lot of jobs. Where does the funding come m for those water projects?

Ms Sharman: I am not familiar with this source. I ould assume there is a partial contribution from the prove-e through the minister responsible for native affairs, and artial contribution—

The Chair: Thank you. We have just run out of time.

STEPHEN McBRIDE

The Chair: We have Stephen McBride to make a prentation. Identify yourself for Hansard. You will have 15 nutes, and out of that 15 minutes, the time at the end ll be divided among the three parties for asking questions.

Dr McBride: I am a political scientist who does re-arch on economic policy. I have a forthcoming book and umber of articles on this subject. There is a written rsion of my brief, which I have passed over to the clerk.

In his budget speech, the Treasurer said the choice was tween fighting the deficit and fighting the recession. The ropose of my brief is to argue that in choosing to fight the ecession, the Ontario government made the politically and onomically responsible choice.

Politically, this is a new government. It had just won an ection in which a neo-conservative alternative was on fer from the provincial Conservative Party. The electorate d rejected that alternative. For the new government to en adopt neo-conservative economic policies and put its mphasis on restraining the deficit could only have fuelled nicism and disillusionment, which are already wide-read, with the political process, as well as undermining rhaps the long-term legitimacy of the political system.

Second, again politically, there is a widespread percepon that this recession is made in Ottawa and that federal olicies of high interest rates, an overvalued dollar, the mpact of the GST and the impact of the free trade agreement ve generated this recession. Pending a federal election, hich is at least two years away, to whom should Ontario izens look for relief from these federal policies? The gical and long-standing answer in a federal system is to look to the provincial government for relief, and I think in responding in this way the Ontario government has done the responsible thing.

Economically, I would make three points. The budget obviously rejects the currently fashionable monetarist economic theory. This theory is basically an updated version of the doctrine of sound finance, which was fashionable prior to the last Great Depression and during it. Based on my own research, I would say a number of aspects of this theory are either incorrect or they are misapplied to the Ontario situation. For example, monetarist economists believe that the deficit causes high interest rates, but certainly at the federal level in Canada high real interest rates preceded the current explosion of the deficit.

Second, excessive government expenditures are presumed to cause high deficits, but when you look at the facts, it seems the current deficit, federally at least, is generated by a mixture of high interest rates and foregone revenues through tax expenditures, many of which favour business.

Third, whatever one thinks of monetarist economics theoretically, there is no doubt that the fiscal positions of Ontario and the federal government are different. A table attached to the back of my brief summarizes the accumulated debts of the province and the federal government expressed as a percentage of gross provincial product on the one hand, and gross domestic product on the other. Ontario's debt in 1990-91 was 15% of the GPP. The federal debt was 57% of the gross national product. Obviously the room for manoeuvre of the two levels of government is entirely different.

Fourth, it seems to me that critics of the government who wish that it had made reducing the deficit its chief priority fail to calculate and factor in the social and economic costs of failing to fight the recession. For example, there is extensive literature which suggests that unemployment increases poverty rates, increases family breakdown, increases domestic violence and leads to more suicides, more admissions to mental hospitals, greater criminality and more admissions to prison. All of these represent major human costs, but if you start to put dollar figures on them, they also represent economic costs as well.

Similarly, failing to fund education, cutting back on areas like education, would simply produce a future generation, facing an increasingly internationally competitive economy, ill equipped to compete. The position I argue in the brief is that expenditures had to be maintained as a long-term investment in the future.

My conclusion, to leave some time for questions, is that these were not easy circumstances in which to bring down a budget. But in avoiding the pointless and in fact counterproductive path of simply axing expenditures, the provincial government has done a real service for the population of this province.

Mrs Sullivan: Professor McBride, this is a very interesting presentation you have made and certainly a thoughtful one. I would appreciate your comments on a choice the Treasurer has made in the budget, in relationship to the deficit of close to $10 billion, to have significantly more than half of that deficit on the operating rather than on the capital side of the budget. In other words, the Treasurer is borrowing this year for pens, papers and pencils and the gas for highway vehicles and so on and adding that operating deficit to the long-term debt. I would like your comments on doing that rather than making a choice of putting a significant injection of capital into a capital deficit, an injection of stimulus that way.

Dr McBride: I think it is an important question, and if that same choice were reflected in the long term one might have grounds for concern. It seems to me this budget was introduced in the very early stages of a recession and I think the choice made was reasonably logical under those conditions. But in the long run, obviously one should not finance, as you put it, pens and paper.

Mrs Sullivan: What do you see being the long-term effect on the debt, and the legacy that is left for the children of our province if operating deficits continue to be created? Certainly the Treasurer has predicted that this kind of deficit is going to continue for perhaps the next five years.

Dr McBride: I think there are two ways of looking at the long-term effects. One, which is fairly common, is to look at the debts which must be repaid by the future generation. The other, I think, is to look at the costs future generations would incur if spending were not maintained. If we move away from pens and papers towards social assistance programs, it does future generations no good to inherit a deteriorated education system, to have been brought up under conditions of malnutrition. Those programs which the government has maintained, even if they do not fall under the capital portion of the budget, are in fact an investment in the future.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, professor. I appreciated your brief very much. You touch on something in here—some of it in the form of just a short question and then a brief answer. In light of the responses you gave to Mrs Sullivan's questions, specifically what sorts of things would a government have had to look at in order to balance the budget this time if one had chosen to go down that other road? What kind of real effect would that have, particularly in a community like Thunder Bay?

Dr McBride: It depends on the scope of the cuts, obviously. Those cuts were not made and they could have been minor or severe. The sorts of things we are looking at are cutbacks in transfer payments to municipalities and to school boards, compounding the underfunding of universities, and to various social assistance programs and so forth. Those are the big items in the budget, so logically those must be the items which would have to be cut if expenditure cutting was the goal. In terms of its impact in Thunder Bay, Thunder Bay in many ways is not dissimilar to the rest of the province. Perhaps some of those social problems are a little more severe here, and therefore one would expect the general impact to be magnified in the north and perhaps in eastern Ontario as well, in the outlying regions of the province.

Mr Christopherson: There was also some discussion about not a lot of the deficit being put to capital works, and I think I would maybe like to correct the record from our perspective. There was the $700-million anti-recession program which basically was of capital intent, and I understand about $32 million of that money has found its way here in the Thunder Bay area. From an economic point of view, does it make good sense? Obviously in terms of generating jobs and local stimulus, it is important to have an injection of money, but does it make sense, from a long-range economic planning point of view, to be putting that money into infrastructure such as roads, public buildings, hospitals, schools, etc., at this time or should we be holding off? Should we rather have spent that money at a different time?

Dr McBride: Given the stage of the recession, I would argue that the spending of money per se has a stimulative effect and that is quite positive. One thing that often intrigues me about discussions of the deficit and public debt, especially the accumulated public debt which will of course increase as a result of this budget, is that the debt represents a liability for the government. But people very rarely put forward the other side of that table, which is the asset that spending produced. I think your references to infrastructure and so forth are quite to the point, that much of that debt represents or is offset by the roads, schools, universities, the investment in training and so forth that historically governments have undertaken, including this one.

The Chair: I have to cut you off at that part of the question.

Mrs McLeod: I will very quickly note my appreciation of the tables that reflect the fact there was a good fiscal position and that Ontario did benefit from that coming in this particular budget. But I would suggest that there is a bit of a tendency in your brief to subscribe to what I think is a very arbitrary either/or juxtaposition, that you either have the deficits or you cut back on social programs. The concern we would want to bring forward is that we need to be able to provide for those social programs through employment generation and real economic development that gives us the revenues to support social programs.

I wonder what evidence you would find in this budget of longer-term economic planning, with more permanent job creation so that we can ensure both a reduction in deficit for those future generations plus fuller employment and revenue for social programs support.

Dr McBride: To be fair to the office of the budget, probably is an interim and an emergency document but I do find some evidence—

Mrs McLeod: Even with the projections for four years in advance?

Dr McBride: I think the reference is in the budget, admittedly the programs are not put in place—for example, increased training and skills development and so forth, and I think will probably be developed in the future. I am sure you pose that question to your partisan opponents they will probably come up with a long list of factors but—

The Chair: Thank you, Mr McBride. I am sorry, you are so short on time.

Dr McBride: I hate to go out on a but, but there it is.

Mrs McLeod: I could answer the question for you, Mr McBride.

THUNDER BAY EMERGENCY SHELTER

The Chair: Identify yourself for Hansard, and welcome to the committee.

Mr Milne: My name is Keith Milne. Excuse me for giving such a bad cold. I am the manager of the Thunder Bay Emergency Shelter. We appreciate this opportunity to discuss some of the effects of the recent budget and how they've affected our organization and the clientele we represent. The shelter is an organization that is committed to providing food and shelter and the basic needs to disadvantaged persons within our community. Our clients are individuals with very few resources and they are the people who suffer most at the beginning of a recession and will be the last to recover if they ever do recover.

In the last 18 months we have seen a significant increase of people in need of our services. In 1990, we averaged 26.8 people needing overnight accommodation and in the first quarter of 1991 it has risen to 32.25. The people who are using our soup kitchen: in 1990, we averaged 60 people and in the first quarter of 1991 we have seen an average of 81 which is a significant increase of people who really have run out of resources and ended up on our doorstep looking for some kind of assistance for their basic needs.

A few areas of the 1991 budget have proved to be helpful, first, the responsible decision-making which is really an obvious orientation to caring about people, particularly those in the lower income. I think it is very important that as a government makes decisions, it balances its financial-fiscal decisions with the concerns of social implications, and balances the social decisions with the financial implications. I think this government has made an obvious choice that it was necessary to incur a deficit to ensure that the people of the lowest incomes were not impacted as automatically as if there were no deficit.

The anti-recession employment program—even though it was not very well publicized, at least from our point of view—has been very accessible. A concern of ours always is accessibility. A lot of times government policies and programs are made available and yet it takes a great amount of time and access some of that money. But the anti-recession employment program was very successful. We have benefited by being able to hire one person. The one concern about that program is that it is very temporary, and my concern is that we may have a number of people employed for a short term of maybe six months to a year and then we may encounter the problem of unemployment again.

The emphasis in the budget on reform of the social assistance program, which is really an extension of the liberal program that was started before the election, appears to be making real progress and involves service providers such as ourselves and we appreciate that. I think it is important to take into consideration the direct effect on recipients but also we need to be careful that the province does not abdicate the responsibility and simply pass on the responsibility and the costs to the municipalities.

Reform of the social assistance system needs uniformity so that people are not left vulnerable to the discretion or the whims or the political fancy of municipalities. Of particular concern regarding the delivery of service is those smaller communities and smaller cities that tend to pass the problem on and direct people, or in our experience we have people come to us who have been given a bus ticket from a community farther down the road and they just send them on to Thunder Bay. I think that needs to be taken into consideration, that sometimes smaller communities do not have any programs or do not have programs to help people and so they send them on to the larger areas.

We also appreciate the initiative towards affordable housing. The increase in funds in this area is very needed, and yet we need to be cautioned that the distribution needs to be equitable. Southern Ontario and Toronto are not the only areas with a need for affordable housing. One of the experiences I had when I was living in Saskatchewan was the program of sweat equity. I am wondering if this government might not want to look into that kind of program that would help young families and those of lower incomes to get their own homes. A sweat equity program could also be applicable to people who are homeless even now, as is done with some of the programs in Toronto.

There needs to be more money available for supportive housing programs combining funding from Housing, Community and Social Services, and Health, and due to the heightened process of deinstitutionalization, the funding must be available to provide the supportive-type housing that is needed within the community for vulnerable and disadvantaged persons. Particularly in Thunder Bay we need to see more funding because we have the psychiatric hospital which is downsizing the number of people staying there. It is a concern on a long-term basis that we need to have more funding in that area.

The area of emergency shelters and hostels or temporary housing was not specifically mentioned within the budget. In an ideal world shelters would not be needed, but unfortunately we do not live in an ideal world. I think it would be wise for the government to look at annualized funding arrangements that could be made available to emergency shelters, because they are a necessary last resort for people who are experiencing housing needs and other problems.

If emergency shelters were more focused towards a transitional role, such as women's shelters are, maybe we could see some progress in the whole area of the revolving door where people seem to be coming, leaving temporarily and coming back again and nothing seems to be done for them in the long term.

The money that has been directed towards food banks, or apparently, is appreciated but the fact is the directives from the government in this whole area have been very vague. We would not have known money was available for food banks except someone in the provincial office happened to take me aside and say, "Get a proposal in here for a food bank, because there is money here waiting." We are in the process of trying to put a proposal together, but the whole problem is that it is very unclear what they want to spend that money on and in what areas.

In conclusion I think the budget has taken the recession and the situation that Ontario is in, and has made a very wise choice, because it has oriented itself to the care of people. It is a very difficult situation and I think the government has a great challenge now to try and bring that deficit to a point where we can get back to a balanced budget, because I do not want our province to be caught in the perpetual trap of deficit financing. I think we should see it as a necessary evil, but something that should be done away with as soon as possible, as soon as it has served its purpose. In my reading I am not sure that the plan is really that well.

Mr McLean: I appreciate your comments. They are really down to earth. On the 32 people overnight, does the Ministry of Community and Social Services help fund that facility?

Mr Milne: Indirectly. We are on a fee-for-service agreement with the city social services, so 80% of that money would come from Comsoc and 20% from the municipality.

Mr McLean: Your soup kitchen, do you get funding to help with that and do you get a fair amount of supplies from the community?

Mr Milne: There is no funding available for it, or there is no funding given for the soup kitchen. A lot of our food is donated through the community.

Mr McLean: But there is funding, you indicated, for food banks.

Mr Milne: Apparently.

Mr McLean: That is interesting to hear. Is that in the food banks right across the province?

Mr Milne: We are not really sure. We have been told to get a proposal in.

Mr McLean: Is that through the Ministry of Community and Social Services?

Mr Milne: Yes, it is.

Mr McLean: Thank you, Mr Milne.

The Chair: No more questions from you?

Mr McLean: Not at this time. I will save the rest of my time, if that is all right.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. You mentioned the anti-recession program. A considerable amount of that $700 million was allocated to the north. I am interested in the effect on your clients. I assume they are mostly unemployed people, although there might be some low-income earners too who essentially have to use food banks. If the anti-recession money was not spent and programs were not maintained and the additional assistance were not given to municipalities, what do you think would have been the effect on your organization, which means essentially the effect on the community?

Mr Milne: I have not seen any clients actually benefit from that program.

Ms M. Ward: What I am asking is, do you think your client base would have been expanded a great deal?

Mr Milne: I think possibly, yes.

Ms M. Ward: You would have more people needing your services, needing emergency shelter and assistance with food if the anti-recession program were not in place and more jobs were lost and if the help was not given to the municipalities. A number of people have been moved from general welfare to family benefits, which is completely provincially funded. That has taken some load off the municipalities.

Mr Milne: I think if that had not happened, our numbers probably would have increased. The problem is once the money is used up, if we might not see an increase there. Hopefully things will be better, but it is hard to say.

Ms M. Ward: You are expecting things to be bad for a while then.

Mr Milne: We are expecting things to be bad for the other two years as far as what is happening on the street is concerned. It takes that much longer for people to recover when they have hit the bottom.

Ms M. Ward: The housing initiatives will be helping the people whom you are attempting to help, non-profit housing?

Mr Milne: There is some building going on in the region that should help directly some of our clientele.

Ms M. Ward: Both in terms of housing and also the construction, about 20,000 construction jobs expected to be created there.

Mr Milne: Right.

The Chair: You have four minutes left.

Ms M. Ward: I did not know if you wanted to rotate.

Mr Christopherson: Come back to us.

Mrs McLeod: Just for the record, if memory serves me correctly I think that the food bank fund is $1 million. That is for all programs across the province. It is a one-year-old fund, so it is available for some specific purposes, a variety of things. I do not think it is going to address the problem which I know the shelter has, which is the issue of core funding. In turn the core funding issue addresses the long-term role of the shelter.

You have indicated that shelters, like food banks and deficits, are something of a necessary evil at the present time but not something that you would want to see in an ideal world. In an ideal world we certainly would not want to see food banks continuing, but over the last weeks the use has actually increased substantially. I wonder if you are, first, seeing an increase in the number of people using the shelter. If you are, what kind of people are you seeing? Is there a change in the clientele or is it an increase of your traditional clientele? Then maybe I will ask you a little bit about the transitional role you think shelters should play. Are you seeing an increase in clients?

Mr Milne: Yes, we have seen an increase in clients. I am not sure that we are seeing an increase in the last few weeks, but in the last six to eight months we have seen an increase; not so much the traditional clientele but people who were working and have been unemployed. That is the area I am concerned about that may increase substantially in the next year, especially in Thunder Bay where we have seen so many layoffs and people losing their jobs and when unemployment insurance runs out.

I am a little hesitant to talk about the transitional role because I have gotten myself into some real hassles in the last few weeks about that, but I think there is an area where we can provide a better service. I am not sure whether it should be the shelters or social services.

municipalities, or who should provide the service, but in other areas, particularly in the women's shelters, they put a lot of emphasis on transition and taking people from a shelter, helping them make connections with programs that will help them in employment training, life skills, some of the very basic things that our clientele needs.

I think if those people are given opportunity, then we can bring them back to a point where they can take on a more valued social role within our community. Because we are the organization that deals with these people when they are at the very bottom of their cycle, we can help them access better programs, better education and hopefully can help them with a better future.

Mrs McLeod: That is a role potentially that would always have a place in any particular social structure short of the absolute ideal world. In the shorter term, with the numbers of people coming to the shelter now, are you finding that because of the unemployment people are needing both shelter and food or are they coming largely for a meal? What are the key needs you are seeing right now?

Mr Milne: Right now, there are more people in need of food than of shelter. That could be a seasonal thing as well, but I would say the increase has been primarily in the soup kitchen, people who are coming for one meal a day.

Mrs McLeod: That seems to fit with the trend across the province then, where we see the food bank in Toronto having its first ever summer food drive because of the sheer numbers of people and the state of desperation they are in.

Mr Milne: Right.

The Chair: Any one else from the opposition party with a question right now? You have two minutes left. I will put it down here and go to Mr McLean with about five minutes altogether.

Mr McLean: Since the SARC report has come in and has been implemented, I thought once that was implemented was going to kind of help do away with the soup kitchens, at least keep them cut down. Have you found in Thunder Bay that with the welfare rolls increased some of those people are still using the soup kitchens?

Mr Milne: Yes, there has been an increase in the two soup kitchens we have in Thunder Bay. The Thunder Bay food bank has also experienced a real increase where it is providing hampers to individuals and families much more than it was before. I think it is still a matter of fact that when you are receiving general welfare, there is more month in than there is money. Towards the end of the month they are just running out of money.

Mr McLean: Even with the increase they are getting?

Mr Milne: Yes.

Mr McLean: When we read some of the stories in the paper saying how much more some of these people are taking on welfare than what the average working person is making, it is hard to believe there are people out there who should be going hungry, if they are getting their full benefits of what is there for them to get. Obviously, there is a problem.

Mr Milne: Yes, I think there is a problem. I question whether the person on welfare is really receiving an average of what the average working person is receiving. Considering the fact that we have a fairly high cost of living in this area, it is just a fact that people are still in need.

Mr McLean: Is there a home here for battered wives, an overnight residence for battered women?

Mr Milne: Yes.

Mr McLean: Do you know what the average of their clientele is?

Mr Milne: No.

Mr Jamison: Thank you for your presentation. I found it very interesting. I would like to touch on certain things in the budget that I think may reflect on the wellbeing of your clientele; for example, tax breaks to low-income earners. I am sure some of your clientele are low-income earners. You have of course mentioned the provincial initiative for 35,000 non-profit housing units. We would like to see a fair share of that here. There was $32 million allocated for adult literacy, and literacy also equates in the picture, I believe. There was $32.5 million allocated to the retraining of workers who have been affected. These were examples of expenditures by this government in the midst of a very severe recession. What in your opinion would have been the effect on your clientele, both short-term and long-term, basically long-term, if initiatives like this were not presented?

Mr Milne: I think the effect would be that we would have more clients to deal with, more people who would be struggling. I am not sure that the tax breaks for low-income people even affect some of our clientele because I am not sure they even fill out their tax forms. I think the job training, a lot of that is directed to people who are losing their jobs immediately within the short term. Some of these people are long-term unemployed. They have not been employed for maybe two or three years.

Mr Jamison: Some of those people, I think, would potentially end up being on your list?

Mr Milne: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: If I could just pick on what Mr Jamison was saying about the skills training and what Mrs McLeod was saying, I was wondering if you could just identify the type of skills training that would be necessary for a good portion of your clientele. Are we talking about basic literacy skills, are we talking about people who have a grade 12 diploma or do not, or are we talking about people with college diplomas, university degrees, who need to be in some programs to refocus into a new area of the economy because their current area is in a major downturn?

Mr Milne: No, I think the majority of people we are dealing with are people who do not have grade 12 education—literacy training would be very valuable—and maybe do not have any basic skills as far as employment is concerned.

Mr Sutherland: If I can just pick up on that, what is your sense then, here in the Thunder Bay area, of literacy skills training that is available and how much more do you think would need to be done to start to have a real impact?

Mr Milne: My understanding is that most of the programs—and there are a number of literacy programs available here—have fairly extensive waiting lists. When we looked into trying to get some funding for a program about four or five months ago, we were told there was not any money for that, so now we have to try again.

Mrs Sullivan: I have been very interested in your presentation this morning. It tells of a situation here that is not unlike situations in other parts of the province. One of the things that you have talked about is an approach to emergency shelters relating to annualized funding arrangements. Certainly when the Liberal government brought in some SARC reforms, we thought there would be an improvement in lessening the number of people who required emergency assistance over a period of time and we were pleased, frankly, to see some of the initiatives in carrying on the SARC reforms. What we have not seen, and rarely does the suggestion come forward, is that emergency shelters should be funded on a continuing long-term, annualized basis as part of the Comsoc budget. Would you expand on that to a certain extent and tell us how you see that fitting into existing delivery of services? Should it be paid for 100% by the province? Should the delivery be through the municipality? How do you see that kind of approach working?

Mr Milne: I am not sure I have had time to explore it fully, but I do not think it should be 100% through the province. That would probably be the most effective and uniform delivery, if it was through the provincial Ministry of Community and Social Services. I think basically, from what I understand when I call around the province and try to find out funding arrangements for emergency shelters, everyone sees emergency shelters as something that is always going to be with us. There is always going to be a need for that last safety net. Maybe a portion of their budget should be funded in order to give them some stability in their funding situation. We should be looking at shelters as being the place of contact with people where they have fallen through the cracks from the rest of the system. From there, we can help them move onwards.

Mr McLean: I would like to follow up with regard to—and I mentioned this with the second presenter—the skills training programs. I would have thought that now would be the opportune time to have that skills department in full force in order to get the people who are now unemployed into some of the training programs we used to have. When we built the 23 community colleges in Ontario, I thought that was really what they were going to do, teach skills to our people who need and want to be taught them. Do you think that should be a priority with this government, to get that program back in full force again? The economist indicated that this will come in time, but I would have thought that now would be the opportune time to do it.

Mr Milne: Probably now or earlier. I think it does need to be a priority.

Mr McLean: I think so, too.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

ENVIRONMENT NORTH

The Chair: Our next group is Environment North with Don Smith as president. Would you please come forward and make your presentation on the budget heard to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. For the presentation you have one half-hour. Out of that half-hour try to keep some time at the end for questioning your brief from the three parties. Proceed.

Mr Smith: I will be very brief, I think. Welcome to Thunder Bay. I do not propose to read through this whole brief since I have the information here that I want to give you on paper. I just want to hit some of the highlights and let you know of all point out that I am representing an environmental advocacy group that is non-partisan, with people from different parties. I will not be pretending to be an economist or speaking on some of the more controversial aspects of the budget. What I want to do is give you a bit of an idea of how environmental advocacy groups saw the budget.

There were a lot of positive things in there, but overall, whole it was not good enough. We feel, and of course we are a specialty interest group, that the environment is an important enough area, with important enough problems sitting there, that it becomes an overriding kind of concern in the province. We expected to see a lot more effect in the budget of trying to deal with environmental problems.

We do want to commend the government on the initiatives that were in there: additional money to expand recycling and composting programs and to extend the blue box to the municipalities. That is of course particularly important in Thunder Bay, the largest municipality in Ontario that still not involved in a blue box recycling program. We last Tuesday night that they voted to ask the province, Ontario Multi-Material Recycling Inc for the money to put a blue box system in place? Of course, it was a bit of a deathbed change of heart since they just became aware of that meeting that it was going to be mandatory on June 1st anyway. Hopefully, some of that money you have in the budget we will still get in the city of Thunder Bay to defray costs.

Another item was increased taxes on gasoline and diesel fuel to promote conservation. We are certainly in favour of that. Global warming, that whole problem, is a very important one. It is one that worries a lot of people. I sort of hate to say this, but coming from the north where we are very dependent on fuel because of distances and whatever, I also have to throw in just a little rider. I think there is a need to equalize across the province, so that when you do this you use some sort of equalizing factors so the north will feel an equal amount of pain as the people in southern Ontario because straight across the board we would certainly be a lot more of the pain. I do not think that is fair.

Our overriding feeling is that when you speak about the economy you have to speak about the environment on the same breath. It is that important. That is what we do not see in this budget. We would like to have seen a number of things done that would indicate that the environment was that important to the government.

I will just list these since I think they are fairly important: to carry out research needed to establish baseline of

I develop environmental indicators so that change is measurable. Part of the problem is, if you do not have the background information, who is to know when any program you may put in place is helping, is hindering, or what kind of side effects you are having from it? If you do not have the data, you will never know. We feel there should be a comprehensive review of the environmental implications of all existing statutes, policies, programs and regulations and make any changes that are needed.

I am stealing a lot of my background from the information presented to the federal government by various citizen groups in terms of the green plan. One of the points made there was that the federal government was somewhat lacking that although it put a bit of money into energy efficiency whatever, on the other hand it has a number of programs in the area of agriculture that are very detrimental to the environment, and that really offsets. So you have to look at all of the programs in every area. That is what I mean by the overriding importance of the environment. A lot of programs that supposedly have nothing to do with the environment are indeed affecting it in a negative way.

We of course want you to examine all new programs to make sure they are environmentally positive before they are implemented. We think you should build environmental accountability into the budget process so that all expenditures are environmentally positive. We could not really see that that had been done. We would like to see established an independent environmental auditing process similar to the financial audit process we now have. I guess once a year at the federal and provincial levels the auditor gets to come in and tell government what it has been doing wrong from the financial-fiscal point of view. We would like to see something similar environmentally. We would like to see you fund pilot projects to test new programs to discover any negative side-effects before you implement them on a large scale.

The next point I want to make is dealing with economic growth. This is a tough area to deal with because it is difficult to suggest to people in this economy that we should stop growth and they should stop the drive to have more and more consumer goods, but our general feeling is that we have to do that. We have to dampen expectations and we have to stop thinking in terms that we have to have more and more growth. So we would like to see a change in the rhetoric, and that is something the government can do, to provide that kind of leadership role. Of course, not only change in the rhetoric; government can also take solid kinds of actions and be seen to practise what it preaches. You could get rid of all the limousines and drive around Toronto on bicycle. That would be a really symbolic sort of step.

Mr Mahoney: Health care costs would go up because of heart attacks.

Mr Smith: Right. Oh, no, they would come down; exercise is good for you. So government needs to be seen to be taking action in these areas. Fine paper recycling: I assume a lot of that is going on within a lot of your operations. All of the kinds of energy-saving things you should be doing, if you are not doing them yourself, it is pretty difficult to go to industries or to individuals and tell them they should.

The last point I want to make is economic instruments. The one you generally hear about is the whole idea of a green tax. Take something that is particularly bad for the environment—what, disposable diapers, Tetra Paks, those sorts of things—and tax them hard so that if people are going to use it they have to pay for it. But there are a whole range of sorts of things you can do. Not just taxes; it can be incentives, it can be subsidies. You could list heavy fines as an economic instrument for companies that pollute. There is a whole range of things and it is a very complex area, so I am certainly not going to sit here and suggest examples, because it is too complex, too difficult.

But what I would like to say is that if the Treasurer has not already directed this particular area to his Fair Tax Commission, then we would like to see him do that so that it gets serious review and a look is taken at the best ways to implement these economic instruments, because I believe that is one of the solid things that government has to do to try to solve environmental problems.

Just to conclude, I would like to say that we believe the time is ripe for government to move beyond—and all governments, but this one in particular since it is the one I am talking to today—the lipservice it has been paying to the environment. I believe the vast majority of Ontario residents understand the problems we are in, and they are looking for solid leadership.

Even if I bring it down to a local level I really believe that if we had had to take the whole question of blue box recycling to a plebiscite in this town 75% to 80% of the people would have voted yes, they want blue box recycling. You could hardly have convinced council of that, I do not believe, since it resisted moving this way for three years, and I think a lot of the same sort of thing would go on at the provincial level.

It is not as clear-cut there, but I think that any level of government that takes solid action on the environment will get a lot of support from the people in Ontario, because they understand what the problems are. They want to take solid action and they are just looking for leadership from government.

Mr Sutherland: I want to expand a little bit in terms of some of your suggestions in here. The comment about governments paying lipservice to the environment: I think that is a common view out there and I would suggest that is probably a common view among many environmental groups. At the same time, in terms of balancing that between taking some of the tough action you said, and you are not sure which ones we should—whether that is heavy fines, taxes or that—with the ever-growing cry that seems to come from different types of businesses—they are over-regulated, there are too many things they have to do there—I was wondering if maybe you would be able to elaborate a little more on what options you feel a government can do so it is doing more than paying lipservice in the eyes of the public yet at the same time helping to ensure that we retain our business and that business stays competitive.

Mr Smith: The first thing that pops into my mind is the point that I made about a solid comprehensive review of all the programs you now have in place. It is not just the environmentalists; it is the press that did a bit of an analysis. There actually was a press—I think it was Thomson newspapers or Southam—that got a consultant's group to look at federal programs and to find out that an awful lot of the actual programs that the government had in place in the area of agriculture were detrimental environmentally. I am sure we would find the same thing.

I think it is fair to say the provincial levels, Ontario included, have not come under the same kind of heat that the federal government has, and most of us environmentalists have found the federal government lacking, as you well know. But I am sure that if the same kind of heat, the same kind of inspection was put on the provincial governments, we would find a lot of the same things. So take a good look at the kind of programs you have out there, whether it is spraying in the forests. We had the fight over Bt versus chemicals in the forests, but there are still tons and tons of chemicals being sprayed on the forests and Ontario Hydro is spraying along its rights-of-way.

There are a lot of things going on out there that are very damaging environmentally, and government money is doing it. That is the first thing.

I guess the second comment is the economic instruments. I really do not want to get deeply into that, but I think there is a whole range of them. I think you need strong disincentives, fines for polluters. If you do not have that kind of muscle there, why should a polluter clean up if it can get away with it? So you have to have that kind of muscle there. At the same time you need the carrot. You have to identify the ways you want those industries to go and provide some incentives to help them do it.

Mr Sutherland: If I may just pick up from there, that would lead me to my next question in terms of making the linkage that being environmentally friendly is in the best interest of business. I think of a plant in my own riding, a manufacturing plant that I toured recently, where they went through a complete analysis of the garbage they were putting out and they have been able to reduce their garbage by 80%. They have a painting area, and by purchasing different nozzles they have been able to cut down on the amount of paint they have been using and excess paint. They have actually cut their costs and become more competitive.

It does not seem that we are getting that message out there or that certain industries and certain businesses are responding to that, that this is a way you can be more competitive and be environmentally friendly as well.

Mr Smith: It is going to take a while, but I think that message is getting out. Probably a really good example across the north—as you all know, pulp and paper is the big industry up here—is that in the pulp and paper industry the discussion right now is around chlorine.

We are, of course, members of the Coalition for Zero Discharge and we are saying to pulp and paper, get the chlorine out. Zero Discharge says, pay attention to what you are putting in the front gates of the plant and that will solve what comes out the pipe. We are saying, if you do not take chlorine in the front gate you will not be putting the dangerous persistent toxic chemicals out into the water supply.

It is only a matter of years, months maybe, until they get into that. They are into recycling now and mainly it has been public opinion that has forced them in that direction.

In terms of the whole question of persistent toxic chemicals, I believe Germany will not import any paper that has been bleached with chlorine. When that sort of thing spreads, and it will, you are going to have almost a consumer boycott situation; that in order to be competitive these companies are going to have to clean up, and they will because they will make the adjustments they have to make to stay alive.

Mr Sutherland: So you are suggesting economics will dictate that they have to be environmentally friendly.

Mr Smith: Oh yes, economics, I believe, will dictate, but I think there is also a real role for government. I do not think the government should sit back and wait for the marketplace to handle all of this. The government should be playing a proactive role and taking whatever action it can to move it along faster.

Mr Mahoney: I, first of all, want to congratulate the government for really ensuring that these hearings are done with people who share its viewpoints. If you look at the presenters we have had so far this morning and the balance of the list, I think I want to put on the record that this is quite obviously, a partisan sham.

I do have a question, however, having said that. Recognizing your non-partisan role, even though you were an NDP candidate and you currently work for an NDP member, appreciate the fact that you are taking such a non-partisan view of an analysis of a budget that many folks think is very damaging and yet we are hearing accolades this morning that really make my stomach turn.

"The companies will make adjustments to stay alive" was a quote that I just heard you say, and I think they will make adjustments. Buchanan made some adjustments and I wonder what you would say to the 1,600 people who are concerned about the impact of those adjustments. Abitibi-Price are making adjustments with some current layoffs and cutbacks and future layoffs possibly to come and, who knows, possibly even a shutdown.

Is there not a need—recognizing the significance of the environment, recognizing that I think everyone is concerned about the environment—to somehow balance the situation and come up with a long-term plan that allows these companies to survive rather than coming down with what clearly is a Marxist hammer in your suggestion curtailing—

Interjection.

Mr Mahoney: Well, there is no doubt about it. In fact it is scary stuff, I will tell you, when I read headlines "Curtail Economic Growth."

I am quite prepared to hear your answer. I think I probably know it, but what do you say to the people who have lost their jobs? "That's just too bad, and we'll get you a job raking in the forest."

Mr Smith: I suppose I have a bit more faith in the free enterprise system than you do. I believe they can and they will adjust. Actually, one of our leading council members told me last Tuesday night that recycling is responsible for the close of Abitibi-Price. I do not accept that at all. I do not believe that to be so. I take it that is the kind of thing you are saying.

Mr Mahoney: Do not put words in my mouth. You heard what I said, and I asked you, "What do you say to the people who have lost their jobs?"

Mr Smith: You are suggesting that I, as an environmentalist, should have to answer to the people who lost their jobs, and I am suggesting to you that they did not lose their jobs because of environmental matters, they lost their jobs because—

Mr Mahoney: Economic matters.

Mr Smith: —of economics, because of a recession that is presently going on, because of high interest rates, free trade. There are a whole number of issues, as you must well know, that are causing the deindustrialization of Ontario, and I do not believe that environmental factors are very high on that list. If you do, then you disprove me.

Under economic instruments I mentioned incentives and a lot of things. There are ways the government can, of course, get involved in helping industry weather the hard times, helping it adjust, and they are kinds of things we would be doing. That is certainly involved there.

Mr Mahoney: I could probably debate with him all day, but I know Mrs Sullivan has some questions.

Mrs Sullivan: I am shocked that any environmentalist can come before any committee of the Ontario Legislature with praise for this budget and I want to talk about some of the reasons and ask for your response.

In your brief you have indicated that you believe the government should carry out research needed to establish baseline data and develop environmental indicators so change is measurable.

I ask you to think about the municipal-industrial strategy for abatement program, where indeed that very process was undertaken. The government has put that entire program on hold, nothing has occurred, there has been enormous capital investment from the private sector, enormous investment of time and effort from municipalities and from the private sector, including the pulp and paper industry, which is very important to the economy here, and now the Minister of the Environment, with no additional funds in the budget, has indicated that she is not quite sure now or if she is going to proceed on that program.

I ask you to try to explain how indeed this budget can be positive. There is no new money for sewerage infrastructure. The water and sewage corporation, which was designed in fact to lever additional money for sewerage infrastructure, has been left out. The user-pay concept for water has been totally left out of this budget. The only initiative is the blue box program. Where is the positive effect for environmental purposes in this budget at all?

Mr Smith: I think you must be talking about a different paper than the one I presented. I thought what I did was quickly list about six of what I would call fairly small items that I felt were positive, and I managed to do that in about eight lines, and I spent the rest of the brief pointing out that this government, like most governments across Canada, are paying lip service and nothing more to environmental priorities.

Mr B. Murdoch: First, I would like to just echo Mr Mahoney's comments about this being well orchestrated. Either that or the people of Thunder Bay have no problems with deficit funding, because I can see the people who are coming here seem to be set up by the NDP government. That is fine; I guess that is the way these kinds of meetings go.

I have a couple of questions. You are happy with more taxes on our gasoline and diesel. What do you say to the people who need gasoline and diesel, like our farming industry and especially our tourist industry? It scares tourists away if we have these taxes. What would you say to that? Are there tax breaks you would give to them? How would you sit down with the farmer now and say: "We're going to raise your taxes. You're not making any money now, but we're going to charge you more to go out and cut your crops."

Mr Smith: I understand the problems it creates for people when we raise taxes on fuel; we in the north feel it much more than people in the south. But I am speaking here from an environmental advocacy position. I am saying that the situation in terms of global warming and putting hydrocarbons into the air is important enough that we are going to have to make those sacrifices. It is just that we are going to have to do it now.

On the other hand, we may want to put in something to protect certain groups. I guess I did make the argument that the north should not suffer any more than the south, so obviously I would like to see, after you bring in these tough measures to stop putting hydrocarbons into the air, that we also try to make the pain be borne equally. I made the north-south argument. I would be willing to accept the argument there could be other groups. You mentioned farmers. You may want to do something to adjust so that they do not feel the pain any more than somebody living in downtown Toronto. But we believe this is so important that we are going to have to take that action. We have to stop putting that kind of pollution into the air.

Mr B. Murdoch: Another industry would be the trucking industry, which the north depends upon. You do not want higher prices here or anywhere else. That is how our goods get to the north and the trucking industry would be affected too.

Mr Smith: I understand the downside, but it has to be done.

Mr B. Murdoch: I may be wrong, but what I get from your brief is that you have no problem with deficit funding, because you basically would like more money put into environmental programs and things like that, but also then you go on to say we should not be pushing for producing more goods and things like that, we should be slowing down. But then I wonder, how do we pay for our deficit funding? If we are going to be deficit funding for the next four years, if the economy does not turn around, then the government has no way of paying this deficit off. So how do you balance that act?

Mr Smith: It is a tough question and I agree, but I do not really have the answers. I am coming from a special-interest group. I am telling you what I want to see as an environmentalist in there, the kinds of things that I think we need to start doing. I understand there is going to be some pain. There is going to be some pain around Thunder Bay as well as with farmers, but these are things we have to do.

I did not say that I was in favour of a large deficit. You will not hear me saying anything about that in here. I am coming from a group and I do not have any kind of authorization to say that.

It seems to me that if we look under the economic instruments, there were options out there for the government to have collected more money in certain ways. They could have gone after certain items that are environmentally unfriendly and raised some money there. I would have been a lot happier to see them going after disposable diapers or whatever—put in your own environmentally unfriendly items—if they had gone after that as opposed to a blanket kind of taxation that catches everybody. That is what we should be doing.

Mr B. Murdoch: What we are seeing here this morning is that everybody seems to want more money, so would there be any areas you would maybe cut then, to help your area, being that you are for a special interest? Everyone here today has said, "Fine, but we want more money."

Mr Smith: I have not done the work to be able to pinpoint for you areas that would be cut, but I am sure there are some. I guess what I am saying is, having looked at the federal area, I am sure there are lots of areas where there are programs that this government and preceding governments have had in place where they are pouring money out that are environmentally negative. Cut them, stop them, after you do a comprehensive review.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Smith, for appearing before this committee.

Mr McLean: You stole my time.

The Chair: Yes, he did, Mr McLean. Thanks for attending our hearing here. It was well appreciated and informed.

LAKEHEAD SOCIAL PLANNING COUNCIL

The Chair: The next group is the Lakehead Social Planning Council, and Linda Gambee. You have half an hour for your presentation, and any remaining time will be divided among the three parties for the question and answer period. Proceed, please.

Ms Gambee: Good morning. I am speaking today on behalf of the Lakehead Social Planning Council, of which I am secretary on the board of directors. Welcome to Thunder Bay. I am sure you have heard that this morning, but welcome. It is refreshing to see a government that is taking the initiative to reach out to the people of Ontario by holding these public hearings so that we can participate; the provincial government, three parties together, across the province, on something as important as the budget. The budget and the economy are important to everyone. Our members and staff appreciate the efforts you took to get here.

The Lakehead Social Planning Council is a dynamic, not-for-profit planning agency which promotes effective, efficient, responsive community services by identifying and researching social issues, providing information and referral services and bringing people together to provide workable solutions to community concerns. The concerns we are working on at this period of time that are important to us are affordable housing, the aging population, unemployment and retraining and poverty.

Our reaction to the budget was mixed. We would like to have seen more funds committed to social assistance reforms based on the Transitions report and that the Transitions report should have been implemented as quickly as possible. At least, more work should have been done towards that end.

Affordable housing is a major problem in Thunder Bay, where the vacancy rate is 0.0% and there are so many families on the waiting list for subsidized housing. It is a myth that those who are on social services are all living in subsidized housing; it is about 10%. The rest of them are all paying market rent here in Thunder Bay. To this end, we are pleased with the provision of another commitment of 10,000 non-profit and co-op housing units, although this does not clearly meet the demand.

During the past week, I have been able to participate in a poverty tent city. Most of you might be aware of what took place in Toronto. I was on one here for the past week. I asked a number of the people who stayed out with me to look at their homes, to go into their homes to see how they rented in terms of affordable housing. These people are getting $700 a month on social services. They are paying $500 for rent and utilities and what is left over is what they have for the rest of the month. This has to be addressed.

The recent closure of one of the Abitibi-Price plants and the resulting loss of 400 jobs in our city, not to mention all the other jobs we have lost here, adds to the concerns about the growing number of unemployed in our community. In short, from a social service perspective, the announced expenditures do not come close to meeting the needs of the people.

However, we are coming out of a period of recession which has been hailed as the worst since the 1930s. The present government was already faced with an unexpected and severe deficit before setting any budget. The federal government has cut back on its funding for social assistance programs and has cut many federal government jobs in an effort to control its spiralling deficit.

We commend the present Ontario government for not following that pattern by not giving jobs away, giving them up, and for not freezing wages, which would hurt them disproportionately as well. We have many working poor in this country who are paid at $5, $6, $7 an hour who still participate in food banks and still go to get food wherever they can.

The gap between the rich and the poor in Canada has been steadily widening in recent years. Cutbacks to social programs only serve to widen that gap even more. That is why our organization supports the present Ontario budget in that it has included steps, albeit modest ones, towards employment, job creation and back-to-work initiatives. We believe that the $215 million earmarked for social assistance reform is a legitimate, necessary investment in the future of Ontario's neediest citizens, the poor.

Because of the recession, an unprecedented number of jobs have been lost in Ontario. Had the government added to this number by reducing government jobs even more, people would have been forced on to unemployment and then on to social assistance.

Maintaining and enhancing the labour force adds to the deficit now, but again it is an investment in the future. The anti-recession spending package is bringing many needed services and programs to the people of Ontario and particularly to economically depressed regions such as north-western Ontario. Yes, some of the jobs created are short-term, but they will allow people to keep working during the worst part of the recession, and coming out of the recession, hopefully they will be able to gain more employment. It also helps in that consumers who are working spend more than those collecting unemployment.

From the perspective of our concerns with poverty, affordable housing and employment issues, we feel the present budget contains positive measures. No one is happy with increasing deficits, but any budget set by any party in Ontario in 1991 would have been a deficit budget. We hope the present government will continue to work towards a plan for deficit reduction which at the same time will diminish the widening gap between rich and poor in our province.

I want to speak a few moments on poverty. The 10,000 new non-profit and co-op housing units to be built, the elimination or reduction of Ontario income tax for an additional 120,000 low-income Ontarians while income tax will rise moderately for those making over $84,000, the commitment not to piggyback Ontario sales tax on top of the federal GST and a $215-million package of social assistance reforms to provide benefits for those in greatest need, which will help people get into the labour force, increases fairness and accessibility and provides relief to municipalities hard hit by soaring welfare case loads.

It is a good start, but it does not go far enough. To be fair, we must stress that we understand that the federal government cutbacks that have tied the province's hands in some cases have hurt Canadians in all provinces, but Ontarians the most. Cutbacks to established programs will cost the people of Ontario over $1.6 billion this year alone. The result is increased pressure on provincial programs such as welfare and social services which by nature were designed to alleviate poverty.

Poverty in Thunder Bay is a subject near and dear to our hearts with the Lakehead Social Planning Council. When people think of poverty, the greatest majority of people thinking of poverty are thinking of those who live in homes, who have places to stay. We have many people, 100 to 200 people, on the streets in Thunder Bay. They live in the parks, they live under bushes, they live under bridges at the creeks. If they are lucky to get enough to get a room, they get that paid and then they get $60 a week to live on in Thunder Bay. That is what they are receiving, $60 a week to live on.

Our social services, because of case loads that are so high, have no movement in terms of counselling. They are no longer social workers; they are intake workers. This has to be addressed. The Transitions report has to be brought in. They have to be given new legislation. It has to be put into place. Poverty should be a number one concern in this city.

The provincial government had to make some tough decisions and choices, whichever government would have been in. It is very pleasing to know that the wellbeing of the people was put first before the deficit. They moved in the opposite direction of any other government. We believe the government made the right choice when it decided to fight the recession this year rather than the deficit. It was the only responsible decision that could have been made by any government.

We would like to thank the government of Ontario for holding public hearings on the budget and providing us with an opportunity to present our views on the economic situation. We all wish to have an economy which is highly productive yet is socially sustainable, an economy in which the benefits of growth are shared freely and fairly.

The budget is a major step in the right direction. We need more. It represents an investment in the people of Ontario to lay the groundwork for sustainable prosperity in the 1990s, and we believe that Ontario will lead the country in economic growth in 1992.

We are pleased that this year you decided to fight the recession in this budget. There are simply too many men, women and children suffering for us to have turned our backs on them.

We brought forth a few recommendations. There are many of them, but we picked out five. The first one is to implement the Transitions recommendations more quickly. Those are not the be-all and end-all, but there are some good things in that Transitions report and they need to be done fairly soon.

We need a commitment to more non-profit housing. The 10,000 units that were given to us are a good start, but it does not nearly meet the demands. We need to put more money into retraining programs for laid-off workers and those on social services. Many of those on social services, particularly single mothers with children, do not have the skills for them to go out to work and that has to be addressed.

We need to put pressure on the federal government to abolish the cap on the Canada assistance plan. That hurts us very badly, and we have to raise the minimum wage much more quickly. We cannot wait for a five-year span for that to come up. It has to be to 66% of the aggregate industrial wage. Thank you.

The Chair: Mr Mahoney has close to seven minutes.

Mr Mahoney: Okay, I will share it with Mrs McLeod. I would like to just ask you some questions on your statements that you commend the government for not following the pattern of the federal government in relationship to its spiralling deficit. Do you recognize that it is not only this year's deficit, which is like an overdraft that gets paid off at the end of the year? The way it gets paid off is that it is put on top of the debt, which is like the mortgage. This government has shown us a four-year plan of deficit financing.

You refer to it as a plan to reduce the deficit. I find that very creative thinking, but it actually shows a four-year plan of deficit financing that sees the debt, the mortgage, for this province going from $39 billion last year to $76 billion at the end of four years, doubling the debt. That is assuming the assumptions the government is making about its revenues are accurate. My sense is it will be $80 billion, $85 billion or maybe even $90 billion in debt that we will inherit.

My biggest concern is that either Mrs McLeod or I would like to be the Premier the next time around and we are going to have to find a way to deal with that debt. How can you say this is a plan for deficit reduction when they are doing it by putting it on top of the mortgage? Are we not, then, going to find ourselves in four years' time in the exact position the federal government is in today, with a mortgage that would choke a horse?

Ms Gambee: As a matter of fact, I did not say this was a budget for deficit reduction. What I said was that it was a budget to help those who needed it the most.

Mr Mahoney: I do not mean to be argumentative, but you say, "We hope the present government will continue to work towards a plan for deficit reduction, which at the same time will diminish the widening gap," etc, etc. You commend the government for not doing what the feds have done.

My contention to you is that if this was a one-year blip in budget financing, perhaps I would not be that concerned, but this government has announced a four-year plan of the same song that is just going to create more poverty. Your children and their children are going to live in poverty because nobody can afford the kind of debt these people are saddling us with. Yet I hear you commending them as being wonderful.

I recognize the fact that you are an NDP supporter and that is fine. No, that is very legitimate. I have no problem with that, and I recognize that fact.

Ms Gambee: I am here on behalf of the Lakehead Social Planning Council. I am not here as an NDP supporter. We believe this budget has helped the poor. We will stick by that as an organization.

Mr Mahoney: So you are not worried about the debt in four years' time?

Ms Gambee: Yes, we are worried about the debt, but we believe it can be handled. If any government had come in—it does not matter which government—and had taken over the deficit that was given to it from the previous government and went into a budget—

Mr Mahoney: Absolute nonsense. We will go to Mrs McLeod, Mr Chair.

Mrs McLeod: Maybe I will take a slightly different approach, and it may be a comment more than a question in the end, Linda, because I approach my concern about the budget sharing the same kind of commitments you have and the social planning council has for the provision of social programs and expanding social equity in our community and across the province.

I completely support the kinds of programs the social planning council is wanting to see enhanced, but as a result of that same commitment, I arrive at a very different conclusion about the budget than you have presented. Perhaps it is because we are looking not just to this budget, which is seen as a factor of a short-term recession, but we are looking towards future budgets and a belief that we are not in a short-term recession, that we are into some very major changes in our economic base in this province and that the projections of future budgets do nothing to begin to address what is a fundamental crisis in our economic situation.

As somebody who is absolutely committed to the social programs you are concerned about, that really worries me, and I say that in all honesty. As social service critic for the Liberal opposition, I was very much a supporter of seeing a continuation of the Transitions report on the social service reform, which we obviously were going to introduce in government.

The focus has to now be on opportunity planning. That has to be the next step, getting people back to work. Because of the unemployment situation we are facing, and I am sure you know, virtually every dollar, with very few exceptions, is going to just manage the increased welfare rolls of people out of work, so there is not a lot of money to put into the opportunity planning programs other than a little bit of pilot project money that is there.

It is understandable that the money is going to keep the social service network, the security network, in place because the dollars are needed there, but it worries me that we cannot get the basis for that economic development that will not be able to sustain the social programs we have now let alone expand them.

That is why I have to, as a social service critic, be concerned about the lack of long-term economic planning, the fact that there is no permanent job creation in this budget or even planned for in the future. It is either job maintenance in the public sector, tax-supported fields, or it is one-term-only, sector-specific job creation for this particular budget period. That worries me as somebody who is concerned about the social programs.

Ms Gambee: I agree there should be long-term jobs there, but jobs that are there for short periods or for contract jobs or whatever, are better than no jobs at all. That is one of our major concerns.

Mrs McLeod: If I could just comment, I think it is important that none of us be drawn into that arbitrary either/or choice. If it is either/or, something is going to be lost and that is frightening. There has to be long-term job creation. If it does not happen we are not going to be able to support the life this province has come to know.

Ms Gambee: But given that we are in a recession, we are not able to say there will not be any long-term jobs that will be given. We cannot project that at this point.

The other thing is, when we talk about social programs and we are worried about the future, well, we are worried about the future but we are worried about the present as well, and it has to be addressed now. We cannot say, "Let's go for four years and let's not help the people who need it because we're going to worry five years down the road."

that is baloney. Let's do it and let's do it now, and they did not. I do not care which government it is. They looked after the people who needed it. We still have to tax corporations, we still have to get money from other people, not from the people who are on the streets.

We have people who do not work because there are no jobs. We have people who have no homes, they have no running water, they have nothing and they need to be looked after now and this budget is addressing that.

Mr McLean: I certainly sympathize with those people in Thunder Bay who are living in poverty. I want to ask you a very simple question: Do you believe that the 5.7% increase the civil servants got—and some of them got 7%—is right at this time?

Ms Gambee: Yes, I do.

Mr McLean: So then you want to give to the rich and not look after the poor, the ones who you have very well dedicated need the help.

Ms Gambee: The other thing is, they got an increase, but their unemployment premiums went up, which helps those who are unemployed as well. Those types of things cost more money to the system. They have been without increases for—decent increases. There are a lot of people who may get 5.7% but they are not making a lot of money; 5.7% of $20,000 or $25,000 is not a heck of a lot of money when you look at the cost of living, and many of them do not have cost-of-living clauses.

Mr McLean: In that theory, then, why would it not be better to give them 15%, because then there would be more money to go into the welfare and the unemployment. Maybe 20% would be better, would it?

Ms Gambee: You are getting ridiculous.

Mr McLean: No, you are the one who is ridiculous.

Ms Gambee: No, this is crazy.

Mr McLean: You agree with the 5.7% raise. We have not had one for three years.

Mr Mahoney: No, we did not get one.

Mr McLean: And besides that, I am a farmer.

Ms Gambee: You are making a lot more than someone making $10,000.

Mr McLean: One of the previous presenters had indicated there should be an increase in gasoline tax and diesel fuel to promote conservation. Do you agree with that theory?

Ms Gambee: From an environmental point of view, I do; from a poverty position, it is difficult. But on the other hand, those who are living in poverty do not have vehicles. They are lucky to have enough money to catch a bus. So, yes, I do.

Mr McLean: You agree it is a proper thing to increase fuel tax. What do you say, then, to people, the tourists, and specifically farmers—I am one, and I do not know whether you know what farming is like these days, but people who put out the food on your table, I think, should be rewarded instead of penalized. Do you agree farmers should be paying more for their gasoline in the form of a tax?

Ms Gambee: I guess, if there are circumstances like that, our farmers need to be protected. There may be something that could be put in place to help farmers. I am not sure. I really do not want to comment because I really do not know a lot about the farming aspect.

Mr McLean: Food does not come from Loblaw's.

Mr B. Murdoch: I know in here you congratulated the government, and you and many other ones here today have also congratulated it for bringing this budget on the road, you might say, so that you could comment on it. I would like to point out it took a month of hammering heads against the wall to try to get them to do this, and you may want to put your congratulations somewhere else next time.

Ms Gambee: In all fairness, yes, I agree there was a lot of table slapping or whatever it was to get this to go on the road, but the government did not have to. They have a majority government and—

Mr B. Murdoch: They did not have to, yes, but I wanted to put that—

Ms Gambee: No, I understand that. I think I did congratulate everyone here for bringing it, as well.

Mr B. Ward: I find these public meetings very informative. We are getting a good cross-section of the community coming across and expressing their views. I really appreciate your taking the time to do this, because I recognize this is your own time and you did not have to.

For the new members of this committee, even though we may disagree with the point of view—and I am sure I will eventually disagree with someone, but I will still treat them with dignity. I think the questions should be pertinent to the presentation, rather than getting off track.

We had a week of meetings in Toronto. Provincial organizations gave their views and quite a cross-section of the province has come out in support of the budget, business organizations, social organizations, environmental organizations, labour organizations, and I am finding that in Thunder Bay as well; a good cross-section of the community that perhaps has not had the opportunity to voice its opinion on the budget is in fact coming out and saying we are heading in the right direction.

If in fact we had listened to our critics and had slashed social programs, education standards, health care, and we still had these public meetings, and the social planning council had come out at that time—and depending on where the cuts took place, but assuming it is across-the-board social programs and housing, etc, you would have been here to condemn the government, would you not?

Ms Gambee: Absolutely.

Mr B. Ward: From a social planning standpoint. So you do support the initiative. Perhaps you could expand on your views, to a degree, in answering the critics that in fact we took the wrong direction, that we should not have maintained our social programs, our health care, increased the affordable housing units across the province. Could you expand on how you would answer those critics at this time?

Ms Gambee: Let me just get this straight. What you are asking me is if the critics were to say we are not going to give affordable housing; we are not—

Mr B. Ward: What the critics are telling us is that we should have balanced the budget and reduced our social spending, reduced our health care, reduced our education standards.

Ms Gambee: My first remark would have been for those critics to be out on this poverty line with me for the last week, with the people who shared the week with me and finally had blankets and pillows, finally had some food to eat, eggs and things that they have not had in years when they were with us.

The other thing, I guess to the critics, just from a heart point of view, is that they have to open their eyes. You have to look at what is there. You cannot look at us in nice clothes and suits. You have to look at what you do not see, and you do not see those who are living in poverty. You have to look at the housing. You have to go into their homes. Take a look at them. Do not just listen to people. The critics come at it from a purely economical point of view and not from a point of view of need and, really, that addresses everything.

Mr B. Ward: This budget is for the fiscal year 1991 and part of 1992. There has been some criticism about potential future budgets. Say our next budget is May 1992, do you anticipate that all of a sudden our social problems will be gone, that we will have full employment, that in fact the problems we are experiencing now will evaporate, or is there going to be a little bit of a continuance—because I know the federal government is calling for a 10% national unemployment rate for the next two years anyway?

Ms Gambee: No, it is not going to go away. It is going to be there. In fact, when the next budget comes up, we will be looking for more, even more than we got in this budget—I like that look—because these things have to be looked after. It is the people of the country, the people of the province who pay for the programs, and if they are not working, if they cannot get employment, if they cannot get the skills, they are not going to be able to participate actively in the province's economy. It is not going to go away. It needs to be looked after, and we will always look for more—like any other group that is here; they are always going to be looking for more. We look at it that the people, the human resources of this province, have to be the number one priority.

Mr B. Ward: Do you not think it is a good investment for long-term economic growth to begin to rebuild our infrastructure, our public buildings, maintain our education standards and, in fact, improve, if possible, so that we have an educated mobile workforce that is highly skilled and, at the same time, attempting to cushion the economic blows that average people are experiencing? Is that not good investment in our future for potential economic growth—infrastructure, education?

Ms Gambee: Education is probably the number one issue that should be addressed, even in terms of poverty. I mean, our children going to school who are malnourished usually drop out or turn to crime, or those types of things, so the structure of education is the number one issue in poverty, besides being able to feed and clothe these people. There is nothing you can say, other than that infrastructure has to be put into place and has to be built on, even more than what we have now. We cannot afford to cut back on education. We just cannot.

Mr B. Ward: That is the key to our future, is it not?

Ms Gambee: It is the key to any economic growth and future, absolutely.

Mr B. Ward: And you cannot really get a handle on the direct benefits that has, but if we do not do it, we are going to be in trouble more so than we are.

Ms Gambee: Yes and no. You can get a hold on it in terms of we are becoming more of a technological society and those who are dropping out of school, particularly because of poverty, are not going to have that expertise, so therefore our welfare load will just increase, increase, increase, whereas if persons can be educated, then they can get a job—maybe not all the time in what they went to school to get, but they still get a higher-paying job.

Mr Sutherland: I just want to say that there are people who agree with you that no government would have been able to bring in a budget without a deficit, and even Mr Mahoney's colleague, Mr Conway, said in the Legislature that he did not think they would be able to bring in a budget without a $7-billion deficit.

I guess what we are trying to get is a sense of putting a real face on the recession. You can talk statistics; you can talk recovery, but can you give us a real face on what you see?

Ms Gambee: I am not quite sure I understand the question.

Mr Sutherland: Rather than the statistical perspective, the real impact of the recession on people in their everyday lives.

Ms Gambee: Certainly. I can tell you that a number of people, not only just the last week—I also participated in two forums with the Minister of Community and Social Services and talking to people who are on the system. There are people on this system because of the recession; they have lost their jobs due to federal cutbacks or freezes in jobs or those types of things. They have lost their homes; they have lost their cars. Many of them, because of financial obligations, have lost their wives, or their husbands, their children, and now they no longer live in housing at all. Many of them are in the streets; some of them are in rooming homes.

If you want to put a face on recession hurting, that is not just one or two or three people. We have many, many people.

Mr McLean: Mr Ward has indicated to you that the opposition parties wanted to slash education, slash social services—the opposition people and critics, which was indicated very strongly on this side of the table. Do you believe that would have happened if any other government but the NDP was in power, that they would have slashed all those programs?

Ms Gambee: I think that is a hypothetical question. I am not sure whether they would or not. I do not know if they would have increased it. They may have maintained it at the same level, which is not good enough.

Mr B. Murdoch: Well, I just heard “all these critics,” and I wondered where they came from because I did not hear the critics that Mr Ward must have heard, that we are going to slash all these programs.

I did hear critics say that they did not think that deficit funding was the way to go, and that there is enough money and enough revenue being brought into the government and if it is properly spent, programs could maybe be extended, but not by deficit funding. I think that is what the critics said. He must not have been listening to this well enough. I think that all the governments had been looking over your programs and trying to do the best they could, but I just wonder where do you think this money is going to come from to pay? As you have heard, they are going to double, in the next four years, the deficit. Do you think that by making more poor people we are going to be okay?

Ms Gambee: I am not an economist, so I am not particularly aware of budgets or those types of things. But when you look at a teller who pays more taxes than a bank, there is something wrong in this country. There are obvious places to go and get money. One of your comments I agree with wholeheartedly. Many programs out there could not only be expanded but joined together to eliminate duplication of services. I very wholeheartedly believe in that. There are many programs that duplicate their services that can be joined together so that money could be freed up for somewhere else, but that still is not going to be enough money. I am not an economist. No matter what you say, money had to be spent on social service programs, and it had to come from somewhere.

Mr B. Murdoch: There never seems to be enough money for everyone, as you have probably heard a few other people say here today. Everyone seems to want more money, and that is fine. I guess that is their prerogative. But I think the critics were telling the government that there is money coming in. If it was spent more wisely, they might be able to do a better job.

Ms Gambee: That goes for any party that is in.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation. Time has run out and we appreciate your attendance here.

IWA-CANADA, LOCAL 2693

The Chair: The next group to come before the committee is the International Woodworkers of America. Would you please come forward and introduce yourselves to us and for records for Hansard. You can begin your presentation. You have one half-hour, and right after your presentation, there will be a question and answer period, depending on the length of your report.

Mr Lorenowich: Mike Skaley was to appear with me, but unfortunately he could not make it. I am John Lorenowich, first vice-president of Local 2693, IWA-Canada. It is not International Woodworkers; it is IWA-Canada.

I welcome this committee to Thunder Bay.

IWA-Canada represents 3,500 working people in north-western Ontario who harvest the province's forests for the pulp and paper industry and for the sawmilling industry.

Our union and the working people that it represents are extremely pleased to see that this government is showing a concern for the people of Ontario, and we believe that holding these types of public hearings across the province is evidence of that concern. My members accept your conduct as an example of the one element that has been lacking in previous provincial governments, previous provincial budgets, and certainly what is totally lacking in the federal government. You have inserted into your very responsible budget the element that has long been lacking, and that is, compassion.

Our industry faces a number of problems, created largely by the policies of the federal government. We are facing the worst level of unemployment that we have had in the last 50 years. We are facing plant closures in various communities, including Kapuskasing, Thunder Bay and Pine Falls, Manitoba. These have been caused directly by the federal Tory government policies of artificially maintaining the value of the Canadian dollar at a high level so that we cannot export our products into American and world markets at a competitive advantage. The Tory government has done nothing to remove the 15% surtax on our softwood lumber products, which has directly forced the closing or cutback in many sawmills.

We accept as a fact that Ontario has faced and is continuing to face the worst recession that has occurred in this country in 50 years. In the last such major recession, the federal Tory government showed no compassion. They have not changed on this occasion. The unemployment in northern Ontario, being far above the national average, has caused and is causing a great deal of hardship to individuals and to families. We applaud and thank you for having the compassion to include in your budget the expenditure of moneys that will prevent the economy from causing further hardship and to prevent the hardship from causing greater misery.

We appreciate the employee wage protection fund to protect employees who lose jobs and require severance pay or termination pay. Regarding the $57 million provided for in the budget to assist small business firms, there are sawmills in our area that would not have remained in business had these funds not been available. There are members of ours who are working today directly as a result of the assistance that your budget has given to permit these firms to continue in business.

Our members have been the beneficiaries of the $32.5 million in additional funding for the training and assistance in finding work for laid-off workers, as well as the $32-million item in the budget for the funding of adult literacy programs. Our members have been the beneficiaries of that item also.

The children of our members can continue to obtain a higher education as a result of the $36-million increase in the budget for the Ontario student assistance program. We thank you for the government policy of conducting an audit of Ontario's forest resources and embarking upon a sustainable forest policy.

My members are aware that the Bay Street friends of the Tories have embarked upon a very expensive campaign to attempt to discredit your budget, but we are also aware that many economists have stated that the NDP's $9.7-billion deficit is not a monster. We are also aware of these economists who state that because of our recession, that is outside of any government's control, any Ontario government, regardless of stripe, would have had to run a deficit or dramatically slash programs. We are grateful to you for not slashing programs and thereby creating further hardships. As stated by Nancy Riche, executive vice-president of the CLC: "Since 1984 we have had a market economy based on a Conservative agenda. It has not worked."

You have presented a budget that has not followed the Conservative agenda, and has attempted to minimize the hardships that have been created, and has started this province on its path out of the recession. The news media and various pollsters have indicated that there is a crisis facing various politicians in this country; that Canadians are looking for leadership that will restore their faith in a widely discredited political system.

The Ontario budget, which has shown that one can balance the need for fiscal responsibility with compassion, will go a long way to eliminate the crisis of confidence, at least in Ontario. The 3,500 members that I represent will not soon forget the efforts that this government has made on our behalf. I thank you.

Mr McLean: The audit for the forestry industry: Give me details on that, if you could.

Mr Lorenowich: It will show what is available, and hopefully it can be retained on a sustainable basis once you know exactly what is available. It can be distributed among the companies that normally harvest this product, and it can be retained on a sustainable basis once they know what is out there.

Mr McLean: Is the forest industry planting three for every one tree that they cut now?

Mr Lorenowich: Not quite. They are on the way to that, but they are replacing one for one.

Mr McLean: Is our forestry being maintained? Are we losing it or are we cutting it faster than it is reproducing?

Mr Lorenowich: At the present rate, they are cutting faster than it is reproducing. They are increasing their tree planting. Their silviculture programs are increasing on a yearly basis. It is just about up to where it should be. It is not quite, though.

Mr McLean: How many forestry workers have been laid off in the last two or three years? Is it substantial?

Mr Lorenowich: Probably about 500 or 600 in our local, mostly through automation and sawmills shutting down.

Mr McLean: You say 500 or 600? So there is $32 million for laid-off workers, for help for them? Is that what you had indicated in your remarks?

Mr Lorenowich: Yes.

Mr McLean: How much would that be for each person who is laid off, on average?

Mr Lorenowich: That is not just for our people; that is for throughout the province.

Mr McLean: Oh, okay. That is right across Ontario, not only for forest workers.

Right. The other question I have is with regard to some of the larger mills. I was reading somewhere not long ago—maybe it was in a magazine—that people have been laid off from different mills and the number who have been rehired in some places is pretty near nil.

Mr Lorenowich: That is correct in the paper mill yes. There is one right in Thunder Bay that is shut down at the present moment.

Mr McLean: The large mill out here, is it? The large one.

Mr Lorenowich: Not CP Forest. CP Forest is running.

Mr McLean: Has their labour force been substantially reduced?

Mr Lorenowich: Not substantially, to my knowledge anyway. We are not connected with the paper mills per se. We are the woodlands. We supply the raw material.

Mr B. Murdoch: I have just two things. One, I remind you, do not give government too much credit for bringing the budget on the road. They did make the final decision but it took quite a bit of head-knocking to get them to do that. I just thought I would remind you, do not give them all the credit.

You mentioned something in there about the small business grants?

Mr Lorenowich: Yes.

Mr B. Murdoch: Could you elaborate a bit more on that? Because I have been looking for small business grants for a lot of businesses that are going out. I thought maybe you could help me. You did mention it in there.

Mr Lorenowich: We did have a sawmill in Sapaw that was shut down. It was shut down for about seven or eight months. There was no way it was going to reopen. We had a number of meetings with the government people. We did receive money. We received—not the local itself but the company—$1.5 million from the Ontario Development Corp and $2 million from the heritage fund. That sawmill is now working. That money is being used to revamp that mill into metric. They have to look for an overseas market. Because of that softwood lumber tax they cannot compete with the United States, so they have to look for overseas markets. This mill is now running and there are 144 people employed there. That was lost. It was gone.

Mr B. Murdoch: When you mentioned that, I thought maybe there was a new special fund put up for small businesses.

Mr Lorenowich: No, I think the fund has always been there, but it has been maintained.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. You mentioned you had 3,500 members. In response to Mr McLean, you said about 500 or 600 have been laid off. When?

Mr Lorenowich: Over the last three or four years.

Ms M. Ward: You also mentioned the tax on the softwood lumber. That was really part of my question. You have been feeling the effects for a while, since the free trade agreement probably—or before, because that tax actually came in prior to the free trade agreement.

Mr Lorenowich: That is correct, yes. We have had two sawmills in our jurisdiction that have closed, both Kimberly-Clark sawmills.

Ms M. Ward: Has your membership declined also?

Mr Lorenowich: Yes. We used to have about 4,000 members in this local about three or four years ago.

Ms M. Ward: Do you ever expect to get back to the point where you were in this industry?

Mr Lorenowich: Not in this industry. We have to get it and organize it better.

Ms M. Ward: Yes. The training programs and the adult literacy program should be a fairly substantial help to our members. Actually, some of that is being delivered through unions—the workplace literacy programs and the mills training. The labour movement is quite involved in that.

Mr Lorenowich: You are talking about the basic education for skills training program? We have had that going to two locations and we are looking at starting it up in three or four other locations, right on the work site.

Ms M. Ward: So your members will be learning new skills because there basically are not those jobs to go back to. You do not expect that you will get back to your previous state?

Mr Lorenowich: That is correct, yes.

Mr Jamison: I would just like to come back to where you said this one mill that was helped through the ODC and the manufacturer's recovery program had to retool metric. By that, you had indicated you are looking at other offshore markets for that wood.

Mr Lorenowich: Yes, European markets.

Mr Jamison: Obviously we are into a free trade agreement, if that is what you want to call it, but in this particular case, with the 15% tariff that is placed on your product, what is the effect on your industry here? What is the difference? What difference does that make? Put it that way.

Mr Lorenowich: It makes a big difference. When it first came in, the dollar had a lot lower value. Now you have added the 15%, plus the dollar has gone up a danged lot of cents. That is like putting an extra 25 cents on the dollar in the cost of our product on the American market. They just do not buy it at that price. They have, in turn, reopened a number of their mills that were shut down over the last three- or four-year period and they have just run us out of the market. We have still got about, I think, a 23% share of the American lumber market, but it was up to about 28% or 29% before free trade. It has dropped dramatically, and with that drop there have been a number of closures, not just in Ontario but right across the country, of sawmills.

Mr Jamison: To go on from that, you talked about this plant that was refurbished and over $3 million invested in new technology and retooling that plant.

Mr Lorenowich: That is right.

Mr Jamison: You also talked about the adult literacy. I want to talk about the workforce for a second. Obviously, like any other workforce, you have a mixture of people here who have different ethnic origins and different educational skills. People who have been there a great number of years may not have their education up to standard for the industry, because there seems to be a grade 12 standard across the board now. Especially in the area of literacy, with the introduction of technology, these kind of things, without those programs, the training and adult literacy programs, would your workforce have been able to adapt, for instance, in the position of this mill being retooled and technologies being brought in?

Mr Lorenowich: Most of them do adapt on their own, but there are small pockets in each group that just do not adapt unless they are taught. These are the pockets we have been working on at the present time. It has not occurred in that particular sawmill. It has occurred in our woods operations, where we have a number of different nationalities who have taken it to learn just basic English, the rudiments of reading and writing, just enough, as you say, to get along to technological change. We have a number of changes in the woods. Where it was the bucksaw and the horse skidding the wood out before, years ago, now you have fantastic pieces of equipment out there that are worth millions of dollars each. You have to know how to run them.

Mr Mahoney: Just to clarify this—I think there was an attempt to clarify it, but I want to make sure it is on the record as being clear—the sawmill did not get saved by the $57 million in small business money. The sawmill was saved by the Ontario Development Corp, more specifically the Northern Ontario Development Corp, by a program that was put in place by the previous government. I do not mind at all that you are supportive of this government, but I just want to make sure that when you give it credit for something, it really did it. In this case, they did not. Having said that, I am delighted that the sawmill has been saved. I think that is the important issue and the bottom line.

With regard to the budget, we have yet to hear the details of how that $57 million will be spent or made available to small business. That information has not been made clear and it would appear that there is some wrangling going on. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant and the advocate for small business could tell us exactly when the money is going to start. He got it in his briefcase. He is now going to release it. Wonderful. This is progressive government at its best. They are just flowing the information out in mounds and mounds of paper.

Mr Jamison: The brochure has been out for four months.

Mr Mahoney: But you will admit that program did not save the sawmill, I am sure.

I want to question you on the OSAP program, because the head office has been moved here, which again was implemented and initiated by the former government. OSAP is a tremendous program, but we all recognize that there was an 8% increase by this government, contrary to the promise that it had made in the agenda for power that was put out prior to the election—I am sorry, it is the Agenda for People. There was an 8% increase in the tuition fee. How does that relate, in your knowledge, to the increase in the OSAP funding?

Mr Lorenowich: I do not have too much knowledge on that. What we are saying is that programs, as you say, may have been in place prior to this government taking power. Now they have kept these programs. They have also expanded on a good number of these programs, rather than making cutbacks. I have a son who works in that very building you are talking about. I am very pleased that he is working and he got into that building.

Mr Mahoney: I am sure you are. There was an increase in tuition fees of 8%. That was part of the budget announcement, contrary to what had been promised.

Let me ask you now, as the vice-president of a union, of a local—and I have some understanding of this because my dad was national director of the steelworkers for 26 years and a vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress. I grew up in the labour movement. I recall the days of Bill Mahoney and Johnny Barker and Larry Sefton and a lot of those good folks when they were very pragmatic in their approach to dealing with the corporations, when they recognized that the best way to protect the jobs for the rank and file in the union, in the local, was to ensure that the company could open its door on Monday morning and perhaps make a small profit on Friday afternoon. The workers would then have a place to work and they could participate and should be paid fairly.
